Mr. SPENCER—It may be remembered, by some at least, that, when this report now under consideration was made, I took the opportunity, as a member of the committee, to dissent, not on the ground of any opposition to an organized system of charities as connected with the administration of the government of the State, but upon the ground that it was not only unnecessary, but that it was improper to embody it in a Constitution of the State; and the suggestion which has been made by the amendment of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] seems to demonstrate the impropriety and the impolicy of making a system of charities a part of the framework of the Constitution. It involves, under a constitutional provision, an inquiry into the religious opinions of those who may become public officers. Before the Governor can nominate, and before the Senate can assent to a nomination, there must be an examination in some form as to the religious opinions of those, or a part of those, at least, who are to become members of this proposed board. Now, has it ever been heard of before, in a form of government like ours, where religious opinions are tolerated, and where no man has any business whatever to inquire into the religious opinions of any other person, that such an inquiry should be made at least under the authority of the Constitution, in regard to the religious opinions of the proposed incumbent of an office? I submit there never has been such an instance.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Will my friend allow me a moment? The gentleman will bear witness that when this subject was discussed in the committee on charitable institutions, an amendment, such as has now been suggested by my colleague [Mr. Curtis], was adopted in committee; but to remove the various objections which the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] has raised here, we thought proper to leave the selection of this commission to the Governor of the State and the Legislature, who have, in times past, undoubtedly made selections without regard to the religious opinions of commissioners, whereas the amendment of my colleague [Mr. Curtis] makes it necessarily offensive, in the way suggested by the gentleman now upon the floor [Mr. Spencer].

Mr. SPENCER—But looking farther through the article we find another provision, which makes it necessary, before any institution can receive aid from this board of charities, that there should still be an inquiry into the religious opinions of at least a majority of those under whom the institution is proposed to be conducted. And the whole subject is involved in the same difficulties from beginning to end. I do not propose to discuss at length the propriety of making this article a part of the Constitution at present, but the amendment of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] suggested this difficulty to my mind and I now present it here.

Mr. DUGANNE—I merely rise to ask the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] if it is not already provided in the charter of the Cornell University that such qualifications should be necessary, in order to become a trustee of that insititution?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—That is not in the constitution.

Mr. SPENCER—I do not know how that may be. I have not examined the charter of that institution. It is enough that the question is presented in that form here.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I have listened with attention, and with great interest, to the address of my honorable friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], a member of this committee, on the subject of charity in general. I have no difference with him in regard to his sentiments and his opinions on that general subject, but I think he will excuse me for saying that his address, able and interesting as it has been, has but a very remote, if any, relation whatever, to the constitutional article which is under consideration. I am under the impression, Mr. Chairman, that if we take up that article section by section, and endeavor to amend it and succeed in amending it in its various details—and it will certainly require manifold amendments—I say I am under the strong impression that when we get through with the work we shall come to the conclusion that it is not expedient for this Convention to meddle with the subject at all. I feel the importance, Mr. Chairman, of hastening forward to the close of the labors of this Convention. In regard to those subjects upon which the Convention must act, I am in favor of acting with deliberation and with care; but in regard to this subject, and to some others, in regard to which there is no call for us to act at all, I am in favor of an early and a summary disposition of them. I have risen, therefore, now, for the purpose of moving that this committee rise and report, to the end that the Convention may refuse leave to sit again, if it shall so please, and that this article may therefore be disposed of in that manner. In support of that motion I will detain the Convention for a short time upon the general subject involved in this article. The article is framed, I believe, with very imperfect conceptions of the existing state of the law, and it is proper, certainly, if we are to act upon the matter at all, that we should have some accurate notions of what the law of the State is on the subject of charity. I will make a few general observations upon that point. Whoever will look over the legislation of this State, from the origin of the State government to the present time, as I have had occasion to do in the course of my professional life, will find that there are in the State several hundred charitable institutions of almost every conceivable name and nature which are capable under the legislative authority to receive gifts and donations for benevolent, scientific and charitable purposes. You may find these institutions which have their origin in special acts of the legislature, in every corner of the State. You find them of a religious character, of a scientific character. You find hospitals and orphan asylums, benevolent and humane institutions of almost every conceivable kind, owing their existence to the special laws of the State, passed upon due application made to the legislative power for the charter of those institutions. Now, in the first place, any person of a charitable disposition can increase the endowment and the usefulness of any one of these institutions, within those wise and wholesome limitations and restraints which the legislative power has prescribed. But, in addition to this special legislation of the State, which is spread over its entire history from the origin of our government to the present time, there is a variety of general laws of the State for the founding of institutions for charity, learning and benevolence. As long ago, I think, as the year 1784, a general law was passed for the incorporation of religious societies, with capacity within certain limits to take gifts and donations of property for the spreading of religion, and the dissemination of the Holy Scriptures, and religious learning of every description. That law has been amended from time to time, and it is now in force—it is now the law of the State, and there is not, probably, a town in this State which has not its institutions of that character, capable of receiving gifts for the purposes contemplated by those societies, and within the limitations which the Legislature has prescribed. We have general laws also for the foundation of library societies, for literary, scientific, charitable and benevolent societies of every description under which, without a special charter from the Legislature, corporations may be formed for these objects with power to take gifts under limitations which are very liberal in their character. I beg leave to call the attention of the committe to one of these general laws, under which a great many charitable societies have already been formed within the State. The acts of 1848 may be called our law of charitable uses. It provides that—

Digitized by Google

"Any five or more persons of full age, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be citizens of this State, who shall desire to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, scientific, or missionary purposes, may make, sign and acknowledge before any officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of deeds in this State and file in the office of the Secretary of State, and also in the office of the clerk of the county in which the business of such society is to be conducted, a certificate in writing, in which shall be stated the name or title by which such society shall be known in law, * * *."

To be approved by a judge of the supreme court, and when that certificate is filed the persons named in it become a corporation for the purpose indicated, whether literary, scientific, benevolent or charitable, with power to take real and personal property for the purposes of the incorporation. And it is provided that all the institutions formed under that law shall be subject to the visitations of the judges of the supreme court or of any person appointed by that court, and it contains a wise and wholesome restriction, providing that no person leaving a wife, or child, or parent, shall devise or bequeath to such institution or corporation, more than one-fourth of his estate. Now, Mr. Chairman, if any man is humanely disposed, and has a praiseworthy ambition to distinguish his name by doing something for the benefit of his race, he can look over this legislation of the State, and he will find ample opportunity and scope for his benevolent intentions. He can endow any one of the institutions of the State deriving their existence under its general or the special laws, and under the statute to which I have called the attention of the committee. He can found a new institution, and he can give it his own name, or any other name which he pleases, and having so founded it, according to the laws of the State, he may endow it in his life-time, or he may endow it by his last will and testament, under the limitations prescribed in the law. Such is in brief the law of charity in the State of New York, and it may be added that if the existing written laws of the State do not fully meet the views of any benevolent gentleman of wealth who desires to endow or to found a charitable institution, the right is always open to him to go to the Legislature and ask for a charter for that institution, and the charter will be granted, under such wise limitations as the law may prescribe. Such applications are always listened to with the greatest favor. This is the law of charity within the State of New York. Now, the grand purpose of the article which is under consideration is to establish another law of charity. The struggle has been going on in the courts of the State for some years, to determine the question whether, over and above, beyond, and outside of these written laws, any man, in disregard of the claims of family and kindred, in disregard of all the written laws of the State, and the wise limitation which they place upon gifts of this character may not devote the whole of his estate by will and testament to the founding of any institution or for any purpose whatsoever which the imagination of man can conceive, which may happen to suit his views or his caprice. I say that struggle has been going on in the courts of the State for some years, and the law has now become as well settled as it is on any other subject whatever, and the law now is that gifts to so-called charities, that is, public gifts, whatever their name or nature may be, as distinguished from private limitations of property, must be made, must take effect, and can only take effect, under and according to the written laws of the State. That has been the final judgment of the courts of this State, and it has been pronounced with so much caution, and care, and deliberation, that it may now be regarded as the irreversible judgment of the judicial branch of our government. Those who have failed to establish in the courts the law of charity in the State according to their peculiar views and notions, are now endeavoring to incorporate it into the Constitution of the State, and that is the great purpose of the article under consideration. Let me call the attention of the committee, for a moment, to this article. It begins by establishing a magnificent State board, to be called a board of charities, with power to visit and inspect the charitable institutions of the State of every nature, whether public or private. Now, sir, I am not aware of the necessity of placing in the Constitution any such power of visitation and examination. According to the laws to which I have called the attention of the committee, we have already ample power of visitation of these charities. There is not an incorporated charity in the State which is not, in the most full and absolute sense, responsible for its conduct to the courts of the State. It is expressly provided, moreover, that these institutions may be visited and examined by the supreme court, or any of its judges, or by any person appointed by that court. Any one, therefore, has only to make a complaint or a request to that tribunal for the visitation of a charity, and it will be visited and examined. It is provided in the second section of this article that any person or persons may establish or increase the endowment of a charitable institution for the support of the poor, the advancment of learning, or other lawful or public purposes. In short, any body may establish an institution for any lawful and public purpose. That is the plain English of the article. Now, sir, what is a lawful and a public purpose? It is here that we see the purpose to change the law in the manner that I have indicated. What is a lawful and a public purpose? To begin with, sir, what is a charity? I ask any gentleman who thinks himself competent, to define before this Convention what is and what is not a charity? In that country from which we derive most of our laws and institutions, charities are defined by a legislative enactment. Something like two hundred and fifty years ago, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, an act of the British Parliament was passed, called the act of charitable uses, which defined precisely by an enumeration what were charities and gave them effect. That act is to-day in force, and is the foundation of the huge and complex system of charity law in England. That statute was repealed in this State soon after the formation of the first Constitution of this State, and it has never been re-enacted by the Legislature. It is not in force in this State. I ask again, therefore, what is a charity? As we have no statutory or legislative definition can any man tell me what is a charity? A donation to found a Protestant Episcopal church, most of us would regard as charitable, and as praiseworthy; but suppose another individual makes a donation by his last will and testament to establish a post obit, or a perpetual lamp, with a compensation to a priest to say prayers for the benefit of his soul and the souls of his ancestors forever. One of them is a charity of a Protestant complexion, the other is a charity of a Roman Catholic complexion, yet each of them under our Constitution has exactly the same merit, for by our written Constitutions all discrimination and preference between religious creeds and beliefs is forever abolished; and if one of these gifts is to be sustained without the written laws of the State, the other must be sustained on the same principle. We should regard, perhaps a donation —I am not certain of it, but I think we ought to regard a charitable donation — to circulate the Constitution of the United States as praiseworthy in itself, in the absence of any legislation to sustain that donation; I speak, of course, of a supposable gift, not made to any of these incorporated charities which are authorized by law to take such gifts. It would be praiseworthy in itself. But all political as well as all religious opinions are free in this country. A donation to circulate a partisan newspaper or a violent political tract would have the same legal and constitutional merit, and if you depart from the written laws of the State you have got to give effect to both of those gifts on the same principle, or to neither of them. A gift to circulate the Holy Scriptures would be regarded as a praiseworthy and a charitable gift; but suppose some individual, with a vast estate of a million dollars, disinheriting his heirs, should give the whole of it for that object without the sanction of the written laws of the State, give it to an institution founded by himself, without law, and in the absence of law, endeavoring by that magnificent gift to purchase the favor of Heaven in atonement for a life, perhaps of avarice. Will that stand, or will it not? Ought it to stand, or ought it not to stand? The purpose of circulating the Holy Scriptures is undoubtedly a praiseworthy one, but if you say that that gift shall stand in the absence of the written laws of the State, how will you treat a like gift to circulate the Koran or the Mormon gospel? When you depart from the laws of the State, you are afloat, you have no definition of what is praiseworthy, or what is charitable. The Koran and the Mormon gospel, under the Constitution of this State, have the same legal merits as the Holy Scriptures. There is no law, and it has been held and adjudged there never was any law, in this State for upholding gifts and donations of any kind to public purposes, except the written laws of the State. They must be made under legislative sanction, either expressed in the special acts and charters to which I have referred, or in the general laws of the State on authorizing corporations to be formed for public objects. This article upon which our attention is now engaged, proposes to change that great principle of law; for it provides that any body may found any institution for any lawful purpose. Any body may therefore devote his estate to the building of a pyramid, for that is a lawful purpose; it is, in itself, an innocent purpose, and is condemned by no law whatever. Every body, sir, would consider it a lawful and a praiseworthy gift, it may be, to build a statue of the father of his country. We have no law for it, unless it may be done, or is done, under some of the written laws of the State. But suppose a man makes a donation outside of this written law, that is not through one of these incorporated institutions, for that very object, it is easy enough to say that that donation should stand. But suppose another man makes a like donation to erect a statue of Jefferson Davis. He has the same sanction of the law and the same right to his opinions that the other man has. Both these gifts must stand or fall according to the same legal principles precisely. They are both lawful in themselves, and they are both public in their character, because they are not private, and do not depend on a private limitation of property. This article proposes to subvert that principle of law to which I have referred, and to enable any man to select his own purpose, to disinherit his own family, and without any written law whatever to devote his estate as he pleases; not wholly, I admit, without restraint, because it is provided in the next section that all gifts to these public objects, by will, must undergo the examination of this board of charity commissioners, and if a gift shall happen to suit the opinions or the caprice of that board, it shall stand, otherwise it must fall. What is this but substituting the opinion or the caprice of the board for the law of the land? It is my judgment that these gifts should stand or fall according to the law of the land, and according to some general rule applicable to all cases, and not according to the discretion or the caprice of any man, or of any board whatever. How will it work? In my opinion this is the most mischievous provision that can be incorporated into the Constitution. Here is a magnificent gift made to establish a Protestant institution of learning. Very well. If a majority of the board are Protestant in their inclinations they will probably overlook the claims of family and of kindred, overlook all the proprieties and all the justice of the question, and will confirm that gift. But suppose it be an equally magnificent gift to found such an institution in this State as the Pope and the cardinals of Rome would establish, that gift will be voided, and thus we shall have charities take effect or not to take effect, according to the religion or the denominational views and impressions of this magnificent board of charities, instead of according to the law of the State. It is made the duty of the board of charities, it is true, to examine into the condition of the testator's family or of any claimants on his bounty. But I prefer to leave the testator's family to the protection of established rules of law which operate alike in all cases, instead of the discretion of any man or any board. I prefer to have their rights and claims adjudicated upon in the lawful and customary tribunals of the State instead of this board of charities. If, according to the law of the land, the gift can take effect, let it take effect. If, according to the law of the land, it cannot take effect, then I say the estate belongs to the testator's legal successors, to his family and children. This, sir, is a very extraordinary subject to incorporate into the fundamental law of the State. I do not say that some amendment of legislation may may not be wise. I know of one change which I think ought to be made in the laws of the State, and that is a simple change in the law of perpetuity so that a charitable or private gift or conveyance may take effect if it happens to be suspended for a little longer time than is permitted by the existing law of the State. I will go for that change; and I entertain no doubt whatever that if the attention of the Legislature were called to the subject the change would be made without the least hesitation. But, I repeat, this is a most extraordinary subject to incorporate into the constitutional law of the State. No attempt of the kind was ever made before. Nothing of the kind is found in any of the Constitutions of this State. Nothing of the kind can be found in any Constitution of any of the United States. It is without precedent, without example, and, I think, ought not to be adopted by this Convention. For the purpose of saving probably several days' time in the discussion of the details of this article—and I might examine them much more at length—I hope that the motion I have made will prevail, and that the subject may be disposed of without a further consumption of time.

Mr. BELL—I hope the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will withdraw that motion for the present.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Why should I withdraw it? It is debatable, I suppose.

Mr. E. BROOKS—No, sir, it is not debatable, except to a very limited extent.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I withdraw it for the moment, out of deference to the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] if he wishes to speak.

Mr. BELL—I regard this subject of too great importance to be thus summarily disposed of. I did not expect to say a word upon the subject this morning, supposing that the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature would be considered. I have been very much interested in the able and exhaustive speech of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], who has covered the whole ground, in theory at least. I only regret that his remarks were not more practical. Every member of this Convention will, I doubt not, concede that provision should be made somewhere for the support of the poor, the destitute and the outcasts of the State. The only point of difference will be, I apprehend, how this desirable end may be best reached. There are several distinct propositions already before us, and in the minds of the people throughout the State, by which relief should be afforded to this class of our people:

1. The voluntary system is urged, whereby all our charitable institutions shall be sustained by private contributions from the charitable, in accordance with the law recited at length, by my learned friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

2. By a system that shall encourage private benefactions to the greatest extent possible, and then empowers the several counties and cities to provide whatever deficiencies there may be needed by tax on their respective counties or cities. There is much merit in this last proposition. The appropriations now made by the State to orphan asylums are raised by tax, and apportioned among the various counties, in proportion to their taxable property. Nothing is gained by passing these donations through the State treasury, but much may be saved by allowing the local authorities to manage these matters from their more intimate knowledge of the wants and merits of the objects of charity within their own bounds than any Legislature or State board of commissioners can possess.

3. A continuation of the present system of appropriations by the Legislature. Many serious objections are urged against this plan. It is too expensive, it is liable to abuse. The signers of the thousand petitions which the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] informs us have been presented to this Convention and referred to his committee, assert that an unjustifiable share of these appropriations is bestowed upon the Roman Catholic institutions. However this may be, I will only say in this connection, that I consider this mode of dispensing charities subject to much abuse. It is well known by all in any degree familiar with legislation, that near the close of each session of the Legislature, by a process known as "log-rolling," larger appropriations are made to these local charities than they could possibly obtain from their own counties, when these appropriations are distributed over the different portions of the State. The charity "bill" is sure to command the requisite two-thirds vote, however much it may deplete the State treasury. I have seen the charity and supply bills loaded down in this way until hundreds of thousands of dollars have been appropriated, where probably one-half of the amount might have sufficed. This system is not confined to actual charities, but sectarian and religious denominations come in for a share, and frequently appropriations are, in this manner, obtained for objects outside of charitable institutions. The next proposition that I will notice is that reported by the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions. I consider this a great improvement on the present system of legislative appropriation, for by this system each appropriation must be subjected to the scrutiny of a board of commissioners, that are not all of one denomination but shall represent the different denominations or possibly no denomination. A charity cannot, therefore, be sectarian, but must have some show of merit before it can pass this board. I am of the opinion that this plan is subject, to a certain extent, to the criticism of the honorable gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. although as before stated it is a vast improvement upon the present system. Any plan that takes the control out of the hands of those benevolent individuals who have hearts to feel and money to contribute for the well-being of these little outcasts, is wrong in theory, and generally ends disastrously. Whatever else we may do, let us not quench the zeal or relax the efforts of those who found and manage these institutions. State control and large State appropriations tend to dry up individual benevolence. Should this whole matter be left with the people, with authority vested in the several boards of supervisors to supply deficiencies, I imagine that the institutions would be well sustained. Can it be supposed that these local authorities have less interest in the care and education of the destitute children in their midst than the Legislature or any State board can have? In the speech of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Charities [Mr. E. Brooks], he referred, and very appropriately, I think, to the causes of orphanage, pauperism and destitution. I regret that he did not dwell more particularly on the great, and I may say, universal cause of taxation, pauperism and crime. The policy of the State, in my opinion, has been essentially wrong in regard to this matter. With one hand the State sets in motion an institution that scatters pauperism and crime throughout its limits broadcast, and with the other hand it undertakes to heal those wounds and to provide remedies for the injury thus done. I refer to the present license system. For the sum of thirty dollars men are authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in every town and county in the State. Herein you have a key to this whole system of destitution, orphanage and crime with which the people are burdened. The thirty dollars put in the county treasury causes an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Our whole system is radically wrong in this regard. We should commence at the fountain—we should remove the cause, if we would avoid the effect. We might as well license small-pox throughout the State, and then establish asylums and posthouses to cure the disease thus caused. If we would, with one blow, strike from our statute books the present license system, we would diminish by nine-tenths the cost of supporting paupers, criminals and orphan children. Let us look reasonably on this subject, and not undertake to purify the stream while the fountain is impure; nor to make the waters sweet while the fountain is bitter. I hope that this subject may be fully discussed, and that we may not report progress until we come to a better understanding concerning it. Let us ascertain what the necessities of the case are, and then we will be prepared to apply appropriate remedies. The best remedy is to remove the cause.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I renew my motion that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Is that motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN—No, sir.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—With the instructions that the gentleman proposes to give, it is undoubtedly debatable.

Mr. COMSTOCK—There were no instructions. We cannot instruct the Convention. But I stated my object in making the motion. I will withdraw the motion, for the time being, if the gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I have no objection that the Convention rise and report progress, but I trust, in the discussion of this subject, after we get in Convention, we shall be subject to no limit as to time—of five or twenty minutes; though, probably twenty minutes will be long enough for any one, after the instructive speech we have had from the chairman of the committee. As the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] has said, this question is one of an organic character and one that the Convention can afford to spend time upon. Whether, in this great subject, the law shall intervene, of which the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has spoken, or whether it shall not, and the matter shall be left to private philanthrophy, is a question of the utmost importance. It is a question that will bear the closest investigation. No gentleman can say his conclusions are fixed and immovable on this subject. Facts may be deduced, arguments brought forward, to show things differently from the way they have seemed. For one, I confess that I have long believed that we attempt to govern ourselves entirely too much in all these matters—that much legislation and many acts are founded in error. I believe that these things had much better be left, not only in the counties or towns, but as I have said in the matter of elections to school districts, or even to the family,—to the spontaneous disposition, induced by the practical knowledge we all possess of the need for the exercise of personal charity. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] asks how we define the word "charity." I thought my colleague [Mr. E. Brooks] had well defined it in the answer made to the question asked the Saviour, as to who was a man's neighbor. I am willing even now to drop this whole question in the Constitution, and leave it to the statute law. It is very proper for the sovereignty of the State to protect itself, and to protect the citizens. But so long as the question is presented, and the claim urged for further aid through public beneficence, beyond the contributions of individuals, the question is very proper to be considered what further aid, and in what manner, it shall be given. We see the efforts that society is continually making through various associations for charitable purposes. There are the Odd Fellows, and the Masonic system which extends even to the despotisms of Europe; and if the State should provide for those wants, these societies are all wrong in their theory of aid. If the State attempts to provide in this matter, we should either do one thing or the other—we should say, instead of leaving it to private philanthropy, that there shall be no real meritorious suffering but what the State will relieve. I will ask my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] do not the Constitution and laws of this State say, in theory, that every man has now a public and official claim on some State, county, or town authority for assistance when he needs it—when he is incapable of self-support? In the city of New York are we not taxed to an immense extent, and in the remotest counties of the State taxed for it to a large extent? Is there any limitation on the amount which may be taxed and the amount to be raised? Take the average income of property in this State, although no board of commissioners would do it, they have the right to tax it to a very large extent for the relief of such deserving persons. We have got a system of laws, founded upon the Constitution—many probably not strictly authorized by our Constitution—the theory of which is that no man who has claims shall suffer, that the rich shall pay for their support if they are in need. We also have hundreds of charters for charitable institutions supported by such liberal men as Cooper, Peabody, and others, who attempt to do what the State says that the State shall do. The question is a grave one whether we should perpetuate the system of State interference, as we shall do to a great extent if we constitutionalize it. We have fallen into the habit of constitutionalizing many things which have been heretofore only temporary, and under the laws of the State, as I mentioned in discussing some portions of the judiciary article. The question is whether we shall attempt to perfect this system of charities and constitutionalize it, and look to the ministers of the law to carry it out effectually, or drop the matter, and leave it to private charities and the benevolence of private individuals. Thirty years ago Roman Catholics would not send their children to our schools, on the ground that they did not recognize the teachings of religion, although they were required to contribute to the support of those schools. In the city of New York the Roman Catholic schools, which I have had occasion to examine, are similar to our public schools in every respect, except that the principles of religion are recognized and certain forms of prayer and religious observances required from the scholars. That same system still exists in the city of New York, and yet the parents of Roman Catholic children are compelled to support an institution which is not recognized by them. This question covers the educational ground which we have not yet treated of. I believe the majority of the people think many of these charities can be better carried on by private individuals; that we should have fewer and clearer provisions in the Constitution and general laws that can be understood; and, above all, leave these duties resting as close upon the home circle and hearth as possible. Any efforts of ours that will tend toward that result I think will be of benefit. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will disclaim the idea of limitation of debate in Convention.

Mr. PROSSER—Is a substitute in order?

The CHAIRMAN—It is in order.

Mr. PROSSER—I propose the following substitute:

"ART. —. SEC. —. No appropriation for charitable purposes shall be made by the Legislature after the adoption of this Constitution, except to such institutions as shall be governed and maintained wholly by the State."

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of opinion that that substitute is not now in order.

Mr. PROSSER—Then I misunderstood the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair was not aware that the substitute to be offered was a substitute for the whole article.

Mr. PROSSER—It is.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It is evident that the field for debate upon this question is almost without limit. I therefore renew my motion that the committee rise and report—

Mr. E. BROOKS—I hope my friend will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will do so.

Mr. E. BROOKS — I should be very much grieved and disappointed if it should be the judgment of this committee to give this subject the go by, after the experience we have had in its consideration, from the assembling of this Convention in June last, to the present time. My friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has said that in his judgment the remarks which I made this morning were hardly germane to the subject of this article. If he will recall the history of the appointment of the Committee upon Charities and Charitable Institutions, he will remember that it grew out of a very general discussion at an early meeting of the Convention for the formation of its committees, in which discussion it was determined that such a committee was necessary; and he will also remember that a very large number of memorials relating to this subject have been presented to this body. They have been commented upon in the public press, and the public attention has been given very largely to them, and in my judgment it will prove to be economical, wise and timely, to act upon this subject now. The gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], has also alluded to some abuses which have grown out of charitable appropriations in the history of the Legislature of which he has been for several years a member, and I think all the members of the Legislature will bear witness to the same abuse. If this article shall receive the sanction of the Convention, it will undoubtedly prevent those abuses and save the State large amounts of money. It is no uncommon practice in the Legislature for a gentleman representing one county, and for example I will take my own county, to rise and and move that some private society shall receive one thousand dollars. A gentleman representing the county of Jefferson, or the county of Erie, or the county of Oswego, or some other county asks a similar appropriation for an institution in his county, and there seems to be a general understanding among members, without any examination or investigation of the merit of these applications. Thus members, by a kindly consideration of the claims of each other, secure a joint support for their respective appropriations. Under this system great abuses have grown up in the State, and a great many thousands of dollars have been appropriated during the last few years for charities which were more properly objects of private benevolence, and which in most cases could have been carried on very well by private persons interested in them, but which, under this custom, have been aided by the State in the manner I have named. Now, this is a very great evil, and if this article is adopted it will prevent the recurrence of such abuses, for no appropriation of money can be made except upon the examination and report of the commission on charities. I desire also to say in behalf of this article generally, that it is not the work of my own hands, but was prepared by one of the leading legal members of the Convention, who is now unfortunately absent and has been absent during the last few weeks of our deliberations. I mean Mr. Dwight, of the city of New York. I desire to say further that the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions gave it great consideration at the time. Now the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] and the gentleman from New York of whom I have spoken [Mr. Dwight] in a very important contest in this State growing out of the question of charity, fortunately or unfortunately, differed widely in their views upon this subject, and I do not think that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has treated this article in a manner which is warranted by its terms. For example, he has said that the purpose of the first section is to allow an unlimited visiting by this board of charities to all the public and private benevolences in the State. With all respect to my friend, it does no such thing; but in direct terms it prohibits the performance of any such duty. Let us see, sir, what the article says. "The Legislature shall establish a board of commissioners of charity consisting of eight persons, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, who shall have power to visit, inspect, and require reports from charitable institutions, of every nature and description whatever, whether established by individuals, or supported or aided by the State, except religious organizations of a sectarian character, penal and correctional institutions otherwise controlled by law." Why, sir, the exception is as broad as language can make it, and is, it seems to me, all that any member of this Convention can reasonably desire. Sir, why should not a board of charities visit the charitable institutions of the State? What harm can possibly arise from such visitation? Have they not a right to do it? Sir, the State appropriates public money to aid or support these charities. Is there any doubt of the power of the officers of the State to visit these institutions, and to report to the Legislature upon their merits and demerits?

Mr. COMSTOCK—Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BROOKS—Yes, sir.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I think the gentleman has misunderstood me. I only said on the subject of this visitation, that there is ample power of visitation now vested in the supreme court, or in the appointees of the supreme court—power more ample than is conferred here.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Well, sir, that may be true, and I will add that the Legislature of 1867, in the exercise of a wise discretion, in my judgment, appointed a board of State charities to do the very work which is proposed in this article. Now, the question may properly come from the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] and others, if the State Legislature has done this and can do it, why not leave it to the Legislature? My answer is, that it is wise to put it in the fundamental law of the State, and to say there that this thing shall be done, and not to make it merely discretionary with the Legislature to say whether it will or will not do what is here proposed. It is for this purpose I desire that this board of commissioners should be created. I entertain as strong objections against legislative boards generally, as any other gentleman of this body; but the labors of this charitable commission are to be a free-will offering on the part of the gentlemen selected by the Governor, and by the Legislature. It is impossible for me, with my limited judgment of what is right, to see, either that the principle is wrong or that any abuse can possibly grow out of it. It was with this view, sir, that this article was framed by the committee, after some two or three months' careful deliberation. As to the objection that the matter belongs to the Legislature, why, sir, there has not been an article introduced into this body, with the single exception of the judicial article, in regard to which the argument has not been made, "all this belongs properly to the Legislature, and should be exercised by the State through its Legislature, rather than by being made mandatory by the Constitution." As I said in opening this discussion in regard to this second section, I was disposed to leave it to the legal members of the Convention and the committee; but unfortunately most of the gentlemen associated with me in the committee are absent. It seems to me, however, that no abuse can grow out of the adoption of this article in whole or part, and I think that my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] did not state it fairly when he referred to the first sentence or two of the second section, and omitted to dwell with fair consideration upon the second sentence of the same section. Let us read the whole of the first seven lines and see if there is not ample power in the Legislature to do by law what he says there is power to do by legislative enactment, and whether any abuses can grow out of the exercise of that power:

"Any person or persons may establish or increase the endowment of a charitable institution for the support of the poor, the advancement of learning and other lawful and public purpose. Such institution shall be established, and its funds administered in accordance with the rules of the court of equity, but the Legislature shall have power to limit the amount which a testator may devise or bequeath for charitable purposes."

My friend has dwelt upon the phrase "lawful and public purpose," as showing what may be done under the exercise of this authority. I put it to him if he believes that any such thing as he intimates will be done, whether public opinion would not frown upon the attempt, and whether the Legislature would dare enact any such provision as he has made—for example, to build a pyramid and call it a charitable institution? Why, sir, the very illustration of the gentleman shows how far he goes out of the way in making it. Nobody believes, in regard to these charities, that they mean any thing more than what is understood and expressed. However much, under the technicality of law in England and in other countries, the meaning of the term "charity" may be extended, in this country every man understands a charity to be that which relieves the minds, bodies and necessities of the great mass of the poor belonging to the State. When my friend asks me what is a charity, I answer him in language which I have before used. Whatever conserves or preserves the bodies and goods, as well as the minds of men, may become a charity, but in no intelligent, enlightened sense is a pyramid a charity. Neither is a monument to Jefferson Davis a charity, nor, in a proper sense of the word, is a monument to George Washington a charity, nor an appropriation for the support of a priest or for the support of any particular religious denomination. The very idea of presenting such a view to the Convention, or to a legislative body, is, it seems to me, with all respect to the gentleman, almost an absurdity. I desire, sir, that this subject may not be mixed up with any such irrelevant matters. I have, with very great labor, entered upon the consideration of this whole subject, and have discussed it in its entire length and breadth. My friend from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] has complained that I did not go enough into details, that I did not dwell upon what he considered the great cause that makes charity necessary, viz.: intemperance. Sir, I gave every statistical fact connected with the history of this State for the last twenty years, showing how many men and women had been the victims of intemperance, and who thereby had become dependent upon the State. I gave every important item in regard to the schools of the State, its prisons and poor-houses, and in regard to the institutions for the education of the deaf and dumb, the blind and insane. All these facts have been presented to this Convention in detail, in order to prove that there is reason why the people of the State should take these charities under their fostering care. My friend from Erie [Mr. Prosser] proposes an amendment (not now in order, but no doubt to be submitted hereafter) to the effect that no money shall be given to any charitable institution unless the charity is supported and controlled entirely by the State. Now, sir, I cannot conceive of any provision more unjust than this. Those who seek relief may be the maimed, the halt, the blind, the dumb. They may be orphans whose fathers sacrificed their lives in the service of the country. They may be widows left wholly dependent, and having a special claim upon the State, and yet my friend from Erie [Mr. Prosser] would close the treasury of the State against them unless they were inmates of some institution wholly supported and governed by the State. Sir, in an enlightened commonwealth like this, I do not believe that this will ever be done by legislative or constitutional enactment, or in any other way. Now, sir, in conclusion, if the judgment of this Convention shall decree that this subject must be dismissed summarily, as proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], I am content; but I do say that, if any just regard is had for principles of economy, any wish to correct great public evils, any desire to dispense with a wise hand the charities of this State, under regulations to be made by law, in my judgment, the provision which has been submitted to this body by this committee will be adopted. Before I take my seat let me also say that if the subject be not dismissed, I shall move to strike out that provision in the third section, article two, paragraph two, contained in the words "and that it is not religious or sectarian in its character." When this article was submitted to the Convention, in August last, it was under the operation and influence of the memorials to which I have already made extensive reference; but the more attention I give to this subject the more prompt I am to come to the conclusion that it is unwise, unjust, and unchristian, to ask what is the creed or what the religious faith of any person who is a needy applicant for State relief. The only reason why, in certain parts of this State, the children of Roman Catholics and their parents have received more money, perhaps, than those of other denominations, is no doubt the fact that, unfortunately, in the majority of cases they are among the poorer classes, and I will not for one discriminate against a sect on account of the poverty of those who embrace it, no do I intend to inquire, directly or indirectly, what is the faith of any who are really needy and who seek relief.

Mr. DEVELIN—I do not propose to enter at present into a discussion of the section under consideration. I rise simply to correct a mis statement, or rather an error in a statement of fact which has been made by the gentleman wh has just taken his seat [Mr. Brooks] gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curti Catholic institutions of this State ha a larger amount of aid from the St than those of any other denominati do not justify the assertion: the Ca tions of this State have not receive of the contributions from the Sta charitable purposes. The Chri divided into two great denomina estant and the Catholic, which s other like opposing armies; and may be a Baptist, or an Episc byterian, or a Universalis member of any church of he is a Protestant. of the State funds than any other denomination. All these sects are included and incorporated in the one denomination of "Protestant," and thus in the aggregate receive their bounties as Protestant organizations.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I did not say what the gentleman says I said. I said, if it should prove to be a fact that Roman Catholics had received more aid than any other denomination—

Mr. PROSSER—I now offer a substitute for the first section as follows:

"No appropriation for charitable purposes shall be made by the Legislature after the adoption of this Constitution, except to such institutions as shall be wholly under the control and management of the State."

There are, in my judgment, reasons for the Legislature dispensing some charities, and prominent among them may be mentioned, those for the education and relief of the blind, the idiotic, the deaf and dumb, and the insane; because, sir, in the several counties of the State these unfortunates could not be so well cared for by the local authorities as by the State. These, in my judgment comprise substantially all the charities which it is necessary or proper for the State to dispense; and I think the State should not be in partnership in this business; and that it can do the work better and more wisely when it has entire supervision over the institutions to which it dispenses its charities.

Mr. MURPHY—I expressed my views briefly in the discussion which took place in August last, to which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Charities has referred, and I am happy here, sir, to congratulate the State and the Convention that that honorable gentleman has withdrawn from the consideration of this body the proposition to appoint a board of commissioners with power, to which I then stated some objections, to determine whether charitable institutions are of a sectarian character or not. I am, however, of opinion that this article should not in any form be incorporated in the Constitution. The reason for the action which the Convention is asked to take upon this subject is stated by the honorable chairman of that committee to be the thousand petitions which have been sent from the different parts of the State asking us to adopt a provision against allowing the Legislature to give aid to sectarian institutions. I do not know any thing about these memorials. Perhaps they were as numerous as the gentleman states, and perhaps also that they were of a stereotype character, sent out by a particular individual or group of individuals from some one point, and signed without a proper consideration of the whole subject The article which the committee have introduced, however, goes much further than would be required to obviate the objections suggested in the memorials. These memorials, aimed at an abuse which has been referred to as existing in the Legislature, this system of "log-rolling" by which these appropriations for charitable institutions are obtained. Now, sir, for one, I must protest that the statement made by the honorable gentleman here in regard to that matter, is not correct. It is true that there was an appropriation made for his county, for an institution there, to the amount of one thousand dollars, but it was not made in that hasty way, nor by means of any such combination as the gentleman speaks of. The grants that have been made for charities by the Legislature, of late years have all come under the consideration of appropriate committees—for four years past under the consideration of the committee of which the honorable gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] was a member, and every such application was strictly considered, and no grant was accomplished by reason of any such combination as that which the gentleman has spoken of. Now, sir, I have already avowed the principle, and I avow it here again today, and I shall urge it upon the consideration of this Convention that it is a matter of economy, as well as of right and justice, that the State should aid these private institutions in carrying on their good work. The poor and destitute among us have to be provided for by the community. There are scattered throughout the State bodies of individuals who make it their business to seek out these sufferers and give them such relief as it is in their power to give—relief which cannot be afforded through the usual instrumentalities of the law. They form your orphan asylums, hospitals, dispensaries, and other charitable institutions, for the express purpose of relieving human misery. They give their own time and means to that object, and they get subscriptions from all who are willing to give and aid in their work. Still, they find that they are not competent to do all that is to be done, to relieve all the cases that come before them, and so they apply to the Legislature and say, "give us a little aid, a simple subsidy to help us to carry on this charitable work." Now, is it not much better to have the work done in this way than to throw upon the counties the duty of raising by law the money required to aid these sufferers, or to leave their distresses unrelieved? I think there is no one who has considered the subject but will agree with me that this is the best course to be pursued. But it is said that abuses exist under this system, and particularly these abuses in the matter of improper combinations in the Legislature to secure such appropriations. I have already said that, to my own knowledge, that is not so. Now, let us look at it in another aspect. The committee have favored us with figures. They have given us the whole amount of charities that have been dispensed in this State for such purposes as I have mentioned—orphan asylums, hospitals, dispensaries, and kindred institutions, for the last twenty years, and we find that less than $80,000 a year has been appropriated for such purposes during that time. Is there any abuse evident in this? Where is there any thing to be alarmed at? I think we will find the Legislature entirely competent to dispose properly of this whole matter, and that they will never give charity to any institution without seeing that it is deserved, and that there will always be vigilance on the part of the representatives of the tax payers of Chautauqua to see that the charities in the county of Kings do not receive from the public treasury more than they are entitled to, and vice versa. There is always a close, critical examination of these claims when they come before the Legislature. Representatives of other sections of the State always examine them closely, as a matter of self-interest, and they will not be likely to vote for them unless they consider the objects deserving. If the appropriations are equally distributed throughout the State and the institutions in all parts of it receive a little where is the harm, as long as the money is properly appropriated for the purpose for which it is intended? Who has ever yet heard any complaint that money voted for such purpose has been misappropriated. And what matters it upon what persons these moneys be expended, provided they be expended for charitable purposes? What matter whether the man who receives aid be Catholic, Turk or Hindoo? If he be a member of the community and a human being he is entitled to our charity without any inquiry being made into his religious belief. So much on the general subject. I objected to this bill particularly for the reason that I referred to a few moments ago when I said that I was happy to learn that the chairman of this committee would withdraw that part of the section. However, since he has come to that determination I shall say nothing now upon that point.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am entirely opposed to the whole scheme contained in this article. We have decreed that there shall be no gift of the public funds for charitable purposes without a vote of two-thirds of the members elected to both houses of the Legislature, and for that reason I am satisfied that the people of this State will be taken very good care of in that respect without the establishment of such a board as is proposed in this article. I believe, therefore, that there is no need of creating such a board by the Constitution. I am opposed to the creation of such a board for another reason. It is provided in the article that the Legislature shall make no gift to charities until a report upon it shall have been made by this board. We are asked, therefore, to create a body with powers not only co-ordinate with the powers possessed by your House of Assembly and your Senate; but in respect to this matter superior; because there can be no action on the part of either house favorable to charitable institutions, until the matter shall have received the sanction of those eight men. Now, I believe that if eight men should be thus selected, they would probably be from a fair average of the men of this State. And I think that my imagination will not be held to run very differently from that of other gentlemen in this Convention, when I say that I fancy that after this power should have been in existence five years or thereabouts, there would not be an institution where the surgeonship should be of value, where the stewardship should be of value, where there should be an office of value or any kind of office in the gift of these institution, but that office would be filled with the relatives or the proteges or friends of the members of the commission. That would be the necessary and inevitable result. Here are men holding privileged and irresponsible positions. They are selected by the Governor, and we do not know who is to be Governor. They are selected for reasons, but we do not know for what reasons. They are placed in this position, and they are to stand as an obstruction in the way of the action of the men selected by the electors of this State to dispense the government of the State, and are to be superior to, and have a controlling power over the action of the Legislature itself. For this reason, sir, above all, I am utterly opposed to the creation of any such board. If it be answered that the last Legislature created a board of visitors, I say yes; but did the last Legislature, or did any Legislature in this State, or in any country deriving its laws and traditions from the Anglo-Saxons upon the other side of the water, ever create a body with powers such as are sought to be conferred upon this commission?

Mr. E. BROOKS—Yes.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—These commissioners, created by the Legislature last year, were authorized to examine and report, not to obstruct, not to direct the Legislature where to bestow its bounty and when to withhold it. Sir, this would be the creation of a very dangerous power, and I trust that we are not prepared to stray so far from the traditions of the people from whom we have derived our blood upon this side of the water, or upon the other side, as to create such a power in this State of New York.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The gentleman has asked a question, which, if he will allow me, I shall be very happy to answer. I say yes; there are many, very many, instances in which the governments of the world have created commissioners with ten times the power proposed in this article to be given to these commissioners. All that this article proposes to give to this board is the power of visitation and the power to make reports to the Legislature, leaving the Legislature to say whether the money shall be granted or not.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. E. BROOKS—Yes, sir.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I desire to ask the gentleman in what instances either the State of New York, since it has been organized, or Great Britain, since the Reformation, has ever created a commission without whose consent the legislative power could not act?

Mr. E. BROOKS—Why, sir, the gentleman surely has not read this article through in its letter and spirit, or he would not put such an inquiry as that.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Perhaps the gentleman and myself may be led to criticise this article from different stand-points, and I will content myself now with passing to the review of the branch of this proposition, which I deem most dangerous to the well-being of the community. I think it is the evident intention of the second and third sections to destroy our present limitations upon trusts, and to allow hereafter an unlimited power of creating trusts for charitable uses for all coming time. The second section says: "Any person or persons may establish or increase the endowment of a charitable institution for the support of the poor, the advancement of learning, and other lawful and public purposes." Now, what is meant by these three lines? Is it not meant that there shall be a power for increasing these funds in any way in which they may be increased? And if that power be given by the Constitution of the State to increase the endowment of such institutions in any mode by which the endowment may be increased, does it not directly allow the lands of this State to be granted in trust and in perpetuity and dispensed in perpetuity to an unlimited extent? To show further the mischief that does not lurk in this article, but which is patent upon the face of it, we find in the seventeenth and eighteenth lines of the third section, this proposition: "It shall be no objection to a charitable trust that it is perpetual." Now, sir under this proposition to create apparently, a simple board of visitors for purposes of charity, it is proposed to create a state of things under which, in process of time, one-half, aye, the whole of the lands of the State of New York may be held in trust, and managed in what, in the language of the books is called "mortmain." Those gentlemen, or rather this gentleman, for it seems to be the work of Mr. Dwight of New York, have drawn this article with a special disregard of the legislation of the State on this subject, from the time it was organized down to the present time. The article must have been drawn with a singular disregard or forgetfulness of the interests of the State, as between the living, active man managing his own property for his own interests, and thus promoting the interests and well-being of the State, and the management of property by trustees and by clergymen, or by any incompetent persons, in whose hands property, as the history of the world shows, is more likely to go to ruin than it is to prosper. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has well alluded to the state of things that existed in England previous to the statute of Queen Elizabeth. I refer to it now for the purpose of stating another fact, that just previous to the time of Queen Elizabeth, it was ascertained that three-fifths of the entire soil of England was held in "mortmain," having been absorbed for charitable and religious purposes, by the gifts and grants of various kinds, and perhaps if it had not been for a violent revolution, such as we have never yet had in this country, and such, I trust, as we never will have, three-fifths of the land in England would be held in "mortmain" down to the present day. Now, sir, that is not a state of things that I desire to see here. My sympathies do not run in that direction. On the contrary, I believe that it was one of the wisest acts of the fathers of this State in the olden time, to make the provisions in regard to trusts that now exist in the law of this State. And under that law what do we see? Individuals have the power to grant for benevolent purposes, the lands which are necessary for the immediate use of these corporations, but when you go beyond that to the agricultural lands, they are held by living individuals, and are managed by the living man with his living hands, and thus prosperity is seen upon every side. This is a proposition to carry us back to a state of things where the gift of land for the endowment of institutions of this character shall be absolutely unlimited, and I am opposed to it. I care very little whether these lands should be given to the Catholic church, or to any particular Protestant church, or to benevolences not religious. No matter to whom they might be given, it is not for the interests of the State that these lands should be held in such wise as not to be susceptible of alienation. We have provided, in other parts of our laws, that a man who is owner of land which he has earned by his labor, shall not be at liberty to entail it for more than twenty-one years beyond two lives now in being, and that is a wise proposition, because the men who formed the system of government under which we live were satisfied that it was for the interests of the State that land should be transferable at short periods, and should not be, in the language of this Constitution, tied up forever. Again, sir, I do not sympathize with the proposition of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser]. I would give State aid to relieve these charities. I am not a Catholic. I am the farthest from it, perhaps, that a man can well be, and have respect for the God that they worship. But, sir, my Protestantism has not taught me that when I see a naked, barefooted child in the month of January, tracking its little feet in the snow, to ask, before I relieve its necessities, what is the faith in which it is being brought up; and, notwithstanding the multitude of petitions that have come here, I do not believe that that is the sentiment of the State. I believe the sentiment of the State would be to relieve Catholic orphans as well as Protestant orphans, and if we pass no article upon this subject, the other provision that we have made, requiring a two-thirds vote of the members of both branches of the Legislature in order to appropriate the funds of the State for charitable purposes, will, I am satisfied, fully and adequately protect the interests of the State. Now, I have the most profound respect for the hearts of the gentlemen who made this report, and in all that the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has said upon the benevolent operations of the day and of the past, I sympathize most cordially. I simply wish to say at this time, that I dissent entirely from the mode of doing good which that committee have proposed to this Convention. I not only dissent entirely from that mode of doing good, but I am prepared to say that I think that, as compared with the proposition contained in this article, Pandora's box was a casket of innocent and refreshing perfumes. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL—I wish to say a few words in reply to my honorable friend from Kings [Mr. Murphy] who has spoken of his legislative experience, and with whom I have had a very pleasant association on the Finance Committee of the Senate for several years. His memory or mine must be very much at fault in regard to the character and the amount of the appropriations for charitable societies and charitable purposes which have hitherto been made by the State. My recollection is that the appropriations by the Legislature have been very fitful and capricious. In some years they have been wholly withheld, as in 1860 for instance, and in other years they have been made very lavishly, and, as I think, recklessly. I do not wonder that the gentleman who has listened to the urgent importunities of so many thousand applicants for appropriations from the State in aid of these charities should have a very tender heart on the subject. It is a position which will try a man in this respect more than any other in which I have ever been placed; if a man has any of the milk of human kindness in his heart he cannot fail to be moved by the appeals that are made to him by the benevolent ladies who in most instances have charge of these institutions. Now, sir, the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] will confirm what I say when I state that a general appropriation to be divided pro rata among the different counties has been made for several years past, of from forty to eighty thousand dollars; and yet his recollection is that there never has been as much as eighty thousand dollars appropriated at any one session to the charities of the State.

Mr. MURPHY—Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BELL—Certainly, sir.

Mr. MURPHY—My statement was that the average amount expended for the last twenty years, according to the report of the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions, did not exceed eighty thousand dollars annually. I did not say that there was no year in which a greater sum was appropriated; and in confirmation of what I did say, if the gentleman will permit me, I will read from the report in question.

"In twenty full years we have paid as a State for all the public, private, religious, educational and charitable institutions, chartered, incorporated and not chartered, including, of course, what are called State, charitable and other institutions, such as orphan asylums, hospitals, dispensaries, colleges, universities, normal schools, agricultural colleges, etc., etc., $6,920,881 (not over one-fifth of a mill upon the assessed value of the State), and of this amount the orphan asylums and kindred institutions have received $617,120.16, the hospitals and kindred institutions $823,289.53, and all the dispensaries $142,579.05, making a total in over twenty years of $1,582,981.74."

Mr. BELL—That may all be correct, and I have no doubt it is. I have entire confidence in any report that the gentleman may make of his own knowledge; but that is not the point. I stated that these appropriations were yearly increasing to a fearful extent. I presume that the average for twenty years past may not have exceeded eighty thousand dollars. In 1860 no appropriation was made to these institutions, while in 1861, thereafter and large appropriations were made. For several years past nearly half a million dollars have been appropriated.

Mr. MURPHY—I challenge that statement.

Mr. BELL—Well, it may be that I have named too large a sum. I do not assume to give the amount with entire accuracy, neither do I pretend to assert that this sum was appropriated directly to outside charities; what I mean is, that directly and indirectly, a very large amount, approximating half a million, was appropriated to the various charitable institutions of the State, and that the amount of these appropriations is constantly increasing.

Mr. E. BROOKS—If the gentleman will allow me, I can give him the precise figures in regard to the class of appropriations to which allusion has been made, I mean for the orphan asylums, hospitals, etc. Here is the language of the act appropriating money to these institutions: "For the orphan asylums, homes for the friendless and other charitable institutions of like character, for their maintenance, eighty thousand dollars, to be paid as follows, viz.: The said amount shall be divided among the several counties in proportion to their respective valuations, as established by the State board of equalization, and the sums thus awarded to each county, except the county of Cayuga, shall be paid to the following incorporated orphan asylums and institutions, in proportion to the number of orphans and homeless persons maintained in them during the present fiscal year: For the hospitals of the State, except the New York Hospital, the Bellevue Hospital, the St. Luke's Hospital, in the city of New York, but including the Women's Hospital, the Mount Sinai Hospital, the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, the Hospital of the Poor of St. Francis, the Ladies' Relief Association of Elmira, for the Soldiers' Home, the St. Mary's Hospital at Rochester, the Rochester City Hospital, the Buffalo General Hospital, the St. Mary's Lying-in Women's and Foundling Hospital at Buffalo, to be divided among these institutions in proportion to the number of beneficiary patients in them for whom no other provision has been made, and the time that such patients shall have been under treatment during the present fiscal year, fifty-five thousand dollars."

I think that will cover all appropriations of a miscellaneous character.

Mr. BELL—Can the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] give the aggregate amount?

Mr. E. BROOKS—It is short of two hundred thousand dollars, for hospitals, orphan asylums and this class of charities, and only one hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars for the items herein stated.

Mr. BELL—I think that amount must be too small. I find that in 1865, over $400,000 were appropriated as I have just stated. However, it is not material to my object now to get at the precise amount. I only say that is rapidly increasing from year to year to a fearful extent, as will be seen from the appropriations contained in the laws of the last few sessions of the Legislature. In regard to the log-rolling operations in the Legislature, by which these appropriations are obtained, I will say that it has been customary for the Committee of Ways and Means and of the Finance Committee of the Senate to examine the different applications which has been referred to them with such argument as may be presented, and make up as judicious appropriation as possible and to submit it to the body of which they are a committee, but in every session some member rises in his place and moves an appropriation to some institution in his locality outside of the report—a process which, to use a familiar term known in the Legislature, is called "jumping in" an appropriation. Another member from another portion of the State will "jump in" an appropriation for his locality; and so on, appropriations for different localities will be "jumped in" until the bills have been literally loaded down with appropriations to institutions which, in many instances, have made no formal application for aid. In order to confine these appropriations to institutions that have evidence of usefulness the committee have been obliged to get the bill referred back to them for further examination and to subject these different appropriations to greater scrutiny than could be had in the body itself. In this way very large appropriations have been added to the bill. For example, it may occur that, unless you make an appropriation for Rochester, the Rochester members will oppose the bill reported by the committee. But if you make an appropriation for Rochester you also make an appropriation for Buffalo, an appropriation for Utica, an appropriation for Troy, an appropriation for Albany, an appropriation for New York; all these large points must be taken care of before you can pass the bill. The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] understands the process perfectly well.

Mr. MURPHY—I do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL—I do not wonder, Mr. Chairman, that his denial excites the laughter of the members of this Convention. In the way that I have explained, the bill has been annually loaded down with large sums of doubtful utility, in order to secure worthy appropriations. In the way I have described very many appropriations of doubtful character have been made under the plea that money expended for charity is money well expended—a proposition to which, taken in its general sense, I give a cordial support. Much worse appropriations are made than those which are made to sustain those charities, and if the Legislature do nothing worse than to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, I think they deserve greater credit than they now receive.

The hour of two having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the chair, and announced that the Convention would, under the standing rule, take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock and again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions, Mr. OPDYKE, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the substitute offered by Mr. Prosser.

Mr. PROSSER—I desire to withdraw the pending proposition, if it is in order to do so.

The CHAIRMAN—No action having been taken on the substitute of the gentleman, he can withdraw it.

Mr. PROSSER—Then I withdraw the proposition, and offer the following substitute in its stead.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

SEC. 1. No appropriation for charitable purposes shall be made by the Legislature after the adoption of this Constitution, except to such institutions as shall be governed and maintained wholly by the State.

Mr. PROSSER—This substitute differs very little from the one I previously offered. The substitute I offered first, contained a clause that such appropriation should be made only where such institutions were maintained by the State. The phrase "maintained" very likely was objectionable, and I think so myself on further reflection. What I seek is to confine legislative appropriations of this character to such institutions as are controlled and managed by the State. When the Legislature shall have made sufficient appppropriations to those institutions, I think that their duties in that regard are wisely ended. If I understand aright, the petitions and remonstrances which have come up here, they have referred to the action of the Legislature entirely outside of State institutions. I have never heard a word of complaint, though such complaints may have been made, that the Legislature has made lavish appropriations for charities to sustain State institutions. As I said this morning, I think there are good reasons why the Legislature should have power to make appropriations for the blind, the idiotic, the insane, and the deaf and dumb. For sir, those unfortunates are not of sufficient numbers in many of the counties of the State to enable such counties to cheaply and wisely care for them as the State can do where it has the care of larger numbers. This, I think, is the only reason why the Legislature should ever make such appropriations at all, and when they have gone through, and provided for such institutions, I think it is far wiser, and better in every way for the counties to look after the remaining claims for charity. It seems to me, sir, almost an absurdity for the Legislature to raise by tax broadcast over the State, from all the counties of the State, for the purpose of charities other than what I have named, to be returned to the same counties again to be distributed for charitable purposes. It is much wiser done, in my judgment, by the boards of supervisors. In some of the counties, they may be so fortunate as not to need to raise any money at all by taxation for such purposes, beyond what the Legislature has provided for the support of these State institutions. Not that I am in any sense averse to providing largely for charities—quite the contrary. But, sir, we might as well raise, through the Legislature, by taxation all over the State, money to provide for all the poor of the State, as to do what has been done for the last few years. The subject is so generally understood, Mr. Chairman, that it cannot be necessary for me to descant upon it further. Every delegate in the Convention fully understands what is proposed now by the offering of the substitute for the first section of the report of the Committee on Charities. Of course, if the substitute I have offered is adopted for the first section of the report, it will result in the remainder of the report of the Committee on Charities being stricken out.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It was not my purpose, in submitting the motion this morning to rise and report progress, to preclude debate in the Convention upon the general question whether we shall go on with the amendment and perfection of the article. The simple motion to rise and report was not debatable, and, therefore, I felt myself under the necessity of withdrawing the motion from time to time, on the request of gentlemen who wished to speak. I think my purpose would be better attained by moving that the committee rise and report the article to the Convention, with the recommendation that no action be had thereon. That motion, I suppose, will be debatable in this committee, and if the Chair is of that opinion, I will make that motion now.

Mr. ALVORD—I will inform my colleague [Mr. Comstock] that, according to my understanding of parliamentary law, there is but one motion he can make, and that is, to rise and report progress; he cannot couple with it any such condition as he has suggested.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I respectfully submit that the motion to report the article to the Convention with the recommendation that no action be had thereon, is in order, and is also debatable. My colleague [Mr. Alvord], thinks that such a motion cannot be made. While I accord to him superior knowledge of parliamentary law, I think I cannot yield to his view in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], is not now in order.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Then I renew my motion that the committee do now rise and report progress.

Mr. ALVORD—Will my colleague withdraw his motion for a moment to enable me to say a few words on the pending question.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will do so.

Mr. ALVORD—I am entirely opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the substitute offered by my friend from Erie [Mr. Prosser]. I think he does not understand the reason why certain lines of charity are under the supervision of the State, and that certain others which are entitled to as much consideration, from the nature of the case, cannot be so situated. The blind, the idiotic, the deaf and dumb, and the insane bear a very small proportion in numbers to those who are objects of charity within the limits of this State. They can, even in as large a State as ours, be taken care of in one or two institutions of the State. They are permitted by that fact to be under a certain course of discipline and management, so far as both regards the mind and the body, and which is uniform in its operation. The light of science can be brought to bear upon their cases vastly better than it can when these are few in numbers and scattered all over the State in different localities. But sir, it is not so with the orphans. The orphans are a numerous body, and it would be an utter impossibility to collect them together in a State institution in consequence of their numbers; not because, as I understand it, that they are not as much the objects of truly meritorious charity as these other cases which the gentleman [Mr. Prosser] has named in his place. And, sir, there are those who are suddenly stricken down by illness or accident. They are large in numbers, and they are scattered all over the State, and it is a physical impossibility to carry them to certain places in the State, which shall be called State institutions, for the purpose of giving them the aid that their necessitous condition requires. Therefore, there is an impossibility, so far as these two classes, and I might name others, being provided for in State institutions, and the only reason why there are certain State institutions, so called in the strict sense of the term, in reference to the other objects of charity I have named, is because of the fewness of their number and of the necessity of uniformity in their care and treatment. But, sir, while I am opposed to the substitute of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser], I am also opposed to the article before us reported by the Committee on Charities. I believe, sir, that there is sufficient of power in the Legislature to do all that may be necessary in this State in that direction. We have specified in the financial article that we have adopted that no money shall be given either to public or private charities in the State except by a two-thirds vote of the Legislature. In doing that we have thrown all the safeguards necessary around the subject of State donations to charities. I am aware that there are numerous petitions coming up from all parts of the State against giving State aid for sectarian purposes; but I am not aware that this cry which has been raised throughout the State is entitled to any consideration, because, so far as regards the foundations of these charities, in the very nature of the case, in almost all of these institutions of charity throughout our land, so far as regards their administration, they fall into some sectarian hands. They are the creation of benevolent people—people who have organized them because they have an abundance of means—and there are very many instances, both under Protestant and Romanish auspices, where the institutions have been the emanations of the piety of individuals. Such persons consider it a part of their religion that they should perform these acts of charity and kindness to their fellow-beings, and they must of necessity, under the circumstances, gather themselves together, animated by the religious feeling, in order to establish their work of benevolence. But, sir, I have not, in the whole of my experience as a legislator in this State, ever seen any attempt on the part of any religious denomination, merely for the purpose of proselyting or building up their particular church, coming to the Legislature for aid for charitable purposes. I have yet to learn that there has been any charity under the control of a denomination which has attempted to exclude an orphan, or a person diseased or infirm, because he happened to differ with the institution in religious belief. They are open to all who are needy, and all who, as objects of benevolence, are entitled to the aid for which the institution was erected. Now, under these circumstances, while the conservators of these institutions may be of a denominational character, their object is to take care of the poor and needy, for they conceive that to be a part of their religious duty, and they go no further toward proselyting than to extend these necessary benefits to these unfortunate individuals. And, sir, I repeat, that I have never heard of any one of these charities coming before the Legislature of this State, and undertaking to get money from the State treasury ostensibly in aid of their charity, but really for the purpose of building up their sect or religious creed. I believe, sir, that we can leave this matter where it has been left in the past, with the Legislature, and especially with the guards which we have put around it, and that to them eminently belong the duty of providing for charities under this clause of the Constitution. We have said to them that they may give away moneys in charity. Leave it for the people represented in the Legislature of this State, as from time to time the exigencies shall demand, to give money in support of these charities, and these legalized institutions. Why, sir, it is necessary to take care of the orphan who has been left without father and mother in this world, for the benefit of society in the future, as it is necessary to take care of the deaf and dumb, the blind, and the insane; it is necessary, that they may start right in their course of life, and that they be nurtured and cared for in their infancy, that they may become good citizens as they reach mature years, as it is necessary to take care of any other object of charity within the limits of the State—and it is right and proper for the great body politic to put their hands into the coffers of the State from time to time, as may be required, and give forth of the means of the people for the purpose of benefiting directly the people themselves, by seeing to it that this great mass of human beings, orphans as they are, shall not come up to be a terror to the people of the State. Believing, sir, that this whole matter can be well left in the hands of the Legislature, and that the people, jealous of their rights, will look carefully, and see to it that there shall be no diversion of the funds of the State in a direction which shall be antagonistic to the religious views or ideas of any particular portion of the people of this State, I trust this Conventton will have made up their minds, before they get through with this matter, that it is best, at least in this respect, to leave well enough alone.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I now renew the motion that the committee do rise and report. I wish to take the sense of the committee upon this matter. Before I take it I desire to say a word upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser]. The substitute is a very simple proposition that the State shall never give any thing to charity, unless the charity is one that is endowed and supported by the State.

Mr. PROSSER—Not endowed.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Supported exclusively by the State; is that it?

Mr. PROSSER—Wholly controlled by the State in its management.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If it be the wish of the Convention to adopt such a proposition as that, I think its proper place is in the financial article. It has no necessary connection with this splendid scheme of charity law, embraced in the report of the Committee on Charities. We seem to forget sometimes all we have done. In the consideration of the financial article we have adopted a clause that no money shall be donated by the Legislature for any charity, whether public or private, except by a vote of two-thirds of the members elected to both houses. I suppose that was the will of the Convention on that subject finally expressed, as we adopted it in the finance article. If the Convention chooses to change its will upon this subject, the proper place to make the change is in the article on finance. I repeat, it has no connection whatever with this scheme of charity which is placed before the committee by the Committee on Charities. I now renew my motion that the committee rise and report, to the end that the Convention may refuse leave to sit again. The question of granting leave will be debatable in the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN—The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr, Comstock], that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I do not understand the Chair to have correctly stated the motion. I understand the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is made with the intention of killing this article. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. VAN COTT—I move as an amendment that the committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the article; that I believe is the object of the mover.

The CHAIRMAN—The motion is not amendable. The Chair added the words "and ask leave to sit again," to make the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] perfect and regular.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I supposed that the motion in form would include the asking leave to sit again. I shall oppose granting leave, and it will then be for the Convention to decide whether they will go on with this subject.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Comstock, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and it was declared carried.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I call for a division.

The question was again put on the motion of Mr. Comstock, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 41 ayes—the noes not being counted.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I call for a count. I insist upon my rights as a member of this Convention to have a count of the noes.

The CHAIRMAN called for the members voting in the negative to rise, and on a count they were declared to be 28.

Mr. E. BROOKS—There is no quorum present.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. OPDYKE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions, had made some progress therein, and on a vote being taken, it being discovered that there was no quorum present, had instructed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention.

Mr. ALVORD—I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention that we again resolve ourselves into Committee of the Whole upon this report.

Mr. FOLGER—I object.

The PRESIDENT directed the Secretary to call the roll of the Convention.

Mr. MERRITT—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared lost.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call of the roll of the Convention, when the following delegates responded to their names:

Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Alvord, Archer, Baker, Barto, Beadle, Bell, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Carpenter, Case, Chesebro, Cochran, Comstock, Corning, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Eddy, Ely, Ferry, Folger, Fowler, Fullerton, Gould, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hatch, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Merritt, Miller, Morris, Opdyke, Potter, President, Prosser, Reynolds, Robertson, Roy, Rumsey, Seaver, Sheldon, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, S. Townsend, Van Cott, Wakeman, Wales, Wickham, Williams —64.

The PRESIDENT—If there is no motion made for a call of the Convention the only alternative is for the Chair to declare the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

No motion was made for a call of the Convention.

So the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. SPRAGUE.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GOULD asked leave of absence for Mr. Hutchins until Wednesday next, in consequence of the death of his father-in-law.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD asked leave of absence for Mr. Mattice until Wednesday next, in consequence of the death of his father.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD asked leave of absence for Mr. Axtell, who is absent attending a soldiers' convention at Philadelphia, until Monday next.

Objection being made, the question was put on granting leave, and it was denied.

Mr. GRAVES offered the following resolution:

WHEREAS, The work of this Convention has been delayed, and its session unnecessarily extended by the neglect of many of its members to attend its daily sessions, to the prejudice of the public rights and the great annoyance of those members who have been punctual in the discharge of their duties; therefore,

Resolved, That the honorable Legislature, now in session in this city, be earnestly solicited to immediately amend the act, calling this Convention, so as to clothe it with power to compel the attendance of its members, and to inflict such punishment for non-attendance as the public interest demands, and justice requires.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], rising to debate this resolution, it lies upon the table under the rule.

Mr. ARCHER—I offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Frank M. Jones be, and he hereby is appointed assistant sergeant-at-arms, in place of John H. Kemper.

Mr. GRAVES—I ask to amend that resolution, by inserting the name of R. T. Windsor.

Mr. ALVORD—If I understand aright, under a resolution which was passed yesterday, offered by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], the question in regard to those officers is before the President of the Convention, and until he shall act thereon, by recommending to this Convention, or until that resolution shall be rescinded, this resolution is out of order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not understand that he has power in any contingency to appoint an assistant sergeant-at-arms. The purport of the resolution adopted yesterday seemed to be that none of the vacancies now existing in the body should be filled unless the presiding officer should deem it necessary. He did not suppose that he had any discretion as to the matter of the assistant sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. MERRITT—It is well understood that the assistant sergeant-at-arms has been appointed Sergeant-at-Arms in the Senate; therefore, that vacancy is one referred to in the resolution. It seems to me, therefore, it is not competent to fill it without reconsideration of the resolution passed yesterday.

Mr. GOULD—I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Gould, and it was declared carried.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions, Mr. OPDYKE, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be the motion of Mr. Comstock, that the committee now rise and report progress.

Mr. COMSTOCK—As it seems to be the wish of some members of the committee to debate further on this subject, I withdraw the motion for the time, giving notice, however, that at some time before the close of the morning session I shall renew it.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman having withdrawn his motion, the question reverts upon the proposition of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser], as a substitute for the first section.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the substitute offered by Mr. Prosser, as follows:

"No appropriation for charitable purposes shall be made by the Legislature after the adoption of this Constitution, except to such institutions as shall be wholly under the control and management of the State."

Mr. BELL—I am of the opinion that several of these institutions are not wholly under the control of the State; that they are managed by trustees, or directors, chosen from voluntary associations. They have been recognized by the State, but still they cannot properly be considered State institutions. They partake of the donations from the State, but still they are managed by private individuals, as for instance the deaf and dumb asylum of New York, which is a very important and a very necessary institution, is managed by an association of private individuals. They choose their own directors and trustees, and receive an annual appropriation from the State of from thirty to forty-five thousand dollars. The same may be said of the institution for the blind. Therefore, I move to amend the amendment in that particular, so that it shall read "wholly or in part under the control of the State." I also wish to add to that amendment as follows:

"But in case private benefactions shall prove insufficient for the proper care and support of the local public charities, the several boards of supervisors and municipal authorities may by tax, or otherwise, supply such deficiency."

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair will inform the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], that an amendment is not in order. The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser] may consent to a modification of his amendment.

Mr. BELL—Then I will withdraw it until an opportunity is offered to make the amendment.

Mr. PROSSER—I will suggest to the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], that perhaps his ideas may be reached under this phraseology: "under the general management of the State."

Mr. BELL—I do not know that it is general, I think the management is wholly invested in trustees. The State has no management further than making appropriations.

Mr. PROSSER—Are they not subject to the State control at all?

Mr. BELL—They are subject to its visitation, and are required to report annually to the Legislature. I am not particular, however, which form it takes.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I will state, with the consent of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], how these institutions are managed. The deaf and dumb, the blind, and the idiotic asylum and all the leading institutions of the State are under the management of boards of trustees. In regard to the deaf and dumb institution, the State a few years since thought proper, at the instance of the trustees, I believe, to take control of that institution. They did so for about one year and found it a very great elephant, entirely uncontrollable through the State officers. They had no time to give to the superintendence and care of the institution; and by an act of the Legislature the institution was returned to the management of the board of trustees. The amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser], literally interpreted, would deny to all these institutions any benefit whatsoever from the general appropriations of the State. I think it, therefore, entirely obnoxious in that respect; and I do not think that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], is calculated to reach the difficulty, if difficulty there be. Nor do I think there is really any proper discrimination in regard to a deaf and dumb person, or a blind person, or an idiotic person, belonging to a county of this State, if local charities are to be supported entirely by localities, than there is in regard to these different general charities which are presented for our consideration. The argument has been made here, that after all, it is taking the tax from the people in one way, and imposing it upon the people in another. If that rule is to apply, inasmuch as the deaf and dumb, and blind are sent from the respective counties of this State there would be as much justice in imposing upon the boards of supervisors the duty of raising the necessary money by tax for supporting this class of persons, as there would be for any other class. But, in my judgment the whole proposition is erroneous, unjust, and ought to be rejected by the Convention. Take the city of New York, for example, and I illustrated it very briefly yesterday. There is in the New York hospital a very large number of persons, and nearly three-fourths of that number are composed of seamen, most of them, or many of them foreign born. On coming into the port of New York from other ports, they become maimed and hurt and in various ways they are dependent. In this condition they are sent to the New York hospital. With what justice can the State say that the board of supervisors should impose by local tax the necessary means for the support of this class of persons? There are a great many people in the city of New York from time to time who are drawn there by various considerations, some suffering from poverty, some waylaid and distressed in various ways, and these enter into some of our institutions for support. As a general rule this class of persons are supported by private charity. There are fifty such charities in the city of New York at least. Orphan asylums, half orphan asylums, nurseries, children's hospitals, hospitals for mature people, dispensaries, etc., etc. Take, for example, the dispensaries of the State. A little sum of money is raised, a few thousand dollars, in order to give medicine to the sick poor, whereby a great many lives are saved, and a great deal of sickness prevented. A majority of these persons are very apt to be transient persons, and when you realize, for example, that between two and three hundred thousand immigrants arrive at the port of New York every year, you must see that there is a necessity for making some general provision, outside and beyond any locality, for taking care of them. I do not believe we can manage this thing better in the future than in the past, except by that proper supervision which may be created by the Legislature through a board of commissioners, or which may be authorized by this Convention and made mandatory upon the Legislature. I hope, sir, that the amendment which has been made and the amendment which is suggested, will both be voted down, and that the question will be left where it is.

Mr. BELL—I did not suppose when I gave way for an explanation that the gentleman was going to make a speech.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. BELL—I offered this amendment, which I understand is now accepted by the mover, for this reason: most of these institutions were in the main originally organized by private individuals of means and large benevolence. It never occurred to them that they would apply to the State for the means for support until they found that the State was willing to make such contributions; and my observation is that as soon as the State took these matters under its control the original founders, to a great extent, relaxed their benevolent efforts, and relied mainly upon the State for their support. This has done a great deal of harm in the way of withering the benevolence of the individuals who founded them. They have not made that effort for private benefaction that they might have done or would have done had they not supposed that any deficiency that might exist for the maintenance and support of those under their care would be made up from the State treasury. This, I consider, sir, a great misfortune; I believe that these institutions should be conducted mainly by the charitable who have means at their disposal to supply all their needs; for charity is reciprocal in its operation. While the charitable are doing good they are also receiving good themselves; and I do not desire that we shall incorporate in this instrument any provision that will have a tendency in any degree to relax the efforts of the charitable throughout this State. But should it happen that a sufficient amount of means for the care and support of the inmates in these institutions could not be obtained from private individuals there should be some relief provided; and I think the proper relief is through the different local authorities, by the authorities of the county in which they are located. This amounts in effect to the present State appropriation of eighty thousand dollars. It is always provided in that appropriation that it shall be divided among the several counties of the State, in proportion to their equalized assessed valuation; and that it shall be distributed on that plan. Now here is unnecessary machinery, of making an appropriation of eighty or one hundred thousand dollars, taxing the people of the State for that amount, paying it into the State treasury, and then paying it back to these institutions. Why not allow this appropriation to be made by the local authorities, collected from the various counties and applied directly to the object for which it is levied and appropriated? We would save the percentage and a large amount of trouble, to say nothing more. Then another argument in favor of this plan is that no unnecessary appropriation could be obtained by the municipal authorities, or by the board of supervisors. They must have evidence that the appropriation was necessary, that it would be well expended. The whole subject would be under their immediate eye, and cannot be subject to that abuse that it may be if given in gross by the Legislature. I therefore offer the amendment, with the consent of the mover.

Mr. PROSSER—I consent to that amendment, as it seems necessary.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment offered by Mr. Bell, as follows:

"But in case private benefactions shall prove insufficient for the proper care and support of the local public charities, the several boards of supervisors and municipal authorities, may by tax, or otherwise, supply such defficiency.

Mr. GRAVES—Is this amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN—It is not an amendment. It is a modification accepted by the mover.

Mr. GRAVES—Is the original amendment and modification in order? If I understand the question it is upon the first section of the report of the Committee on Charities. That section refers only to the appointment of charitable commissions, to take charge of charitable institutions as they now exist, and to report that examination to the Legislature, and also to report any omission of duty on the part of the trustees. This amendment, offered here, relates to the whole report, and not to the section under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN—When the substitute was first offered, the Chair rejected it as out of order on the ground that it was a substitute for the whole article. The mover subsequently presented it is a substitute for the first section, and in that form it has been accepted by the Chair and has been considered; consequently the Chair cannot change its decision.

Mr. MILLER—I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to restricting the aid of the State to merely those institutions that are owned and controlled by the State; and if I understand aright the two amendments now pending, they propose some such restriction as this. I am of the opinion that, as a matter of economy, and as a matter of wisdom, we had better allow private philanthropic individuals to endow charitable institutions, and to look to the State for State aid, if they prove to be of public benefit, and of public importance. It seems to me that this is wise as a matter of economy. We all recognize that the State owes it as a duty to the poor and to the unfortunate people of the State, to provide some relief; but if private, liberal minded individuals will from their private means defray nineteen-twentieths of this expense, and leave but one-twentieth for the State to supply, it seems to me wise to accept of such a donation, and not by constitutional restrictions deny ourselves the benefit of such liberality. But, sir, I am in favor of the principle that the State shall have the right of visitation wherever they grant any aid. I think the right of visitation should go to this extent, that any institution that demands aid of the State shall show its accounts, shall be subject to visitation, and show that the money that it has received from the State has been properly and judiciously applied, I am not so positve that we had better have this article in the Constitution. I know that the subject is now, by the present Constitution, under the control of the Legislature, and in that respect it is, perhaps, left more free to be modified as circumstances shall dictate as best. But I am quite positive that if we are to put any thing upon this subject into the Constitution, we should not tie up the hands of the State, so as to restrain and restrict the State from giving aid to charities that are in part under the control of individuals, and are supported in part by private donations. Let me name an instance, an institution that is not local but one which, in its benefits, reaches to the whole State, and perhaps even further than that. Take the case of the Inebriate Asylum established at Binghamton. That institution, as many of the members of this Convention know, has been under a cloud for a number of years, and yet is receiving by law aid from the State, because it receives ten per cent of the license money. That institution is receiving over a hundred thousand dollars a year. I think, under its present organization and management, that institution is doing much good and is calculated to do much good; but I do insist that if the people of this State are to contribute to that institution or to any other, such an amount of money, it is very proper and it is necessary that it shall be subject to visitation by the proper authority, so that the people may know how their money is being used. I mention the institution at Binghamton merely as an illustration. There are others of this class that receive aid from the State, standing in the same category. Much money has been raised by private donations and private liberality and generosity, and they are now receiving aid from the State, and I insist that, as far as they do receive aid from the State, wherever State aid goes there should be some visitation under the direction and authority of the State. In reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser], I may state this fact, that the board of public charities in the State of Massachusetts, which has been in existence for three or four years to the very great acceptance of the people of that State, and I think to the great benefit of that State; that board recommends in their report of this year that the State shall not build any more State institutions but shall confine itself for the present to assisting institutions founded upon private donations as the more economical and best way of reaching the objects of charity. Now I would not tie up the legislators of this State so that they could not exercise their duty in the direction of charities in any other way than this; but I do insist that when such a board speaks after the experience of three or four years and says it is the best way, that we ought not to prohibit ourselves by constitutional restriction from adopting and using it.

Mr. GOULD—I fully concur in the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Miller], and I desire to give one or two reasons in addition to those that have been given by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller], why it is desirable that this change proposed by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser] should not take place. I suppose that we all recognize it to be the duty of the State to do those things, and to perform those functions on behalf of its inhabitants, which they are utterly incapable of performing for themselves. There are many charities which cannot be performed by private means. For instance, if the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser] should be adopted, it will utterly exclude all State aid from the hospitals of the State. Let us see what the hospitals have done for the public, what they have done for the private comfort and convenience of individuals, which could not have been performed if those institutions had not been in existence. There are many diseases which are very rarely found in private practice which are multiplied in the hospitals. Physicians who have charge of hospitals have an opportunity of seeing them in the aggregate, and they are enabled to learn the law which regulates them and to discover the remedies by which those diseases may be overcome. Let me state a single instance. There is a disease of the bowels which is very frequent, and which has heretofore been almost always confounded with bilious colic, and yet these diseases have always proved fatal. There never has been a single instance until recently in which any cure of them has been effected. Physicians in private practice were utterly unable to discriminate between these two diseases, many of whose symptoms were so entirely similar. It is caused by the introduction of a foreign body into the portion of the bowels called the appendix vermiformis. The physicians of the hospital at Troy have discovered the diagnosis of those two diseases. They have discovered surgical remedies by which that disease may be entirely overcome so that men need not die, as they have always died in times past when this disease makes its appearance. That discovery was made in the Marshall infirmary at Troy, an institution which is a beneficiary of this State, which has been fostered by its bounty, and without that fostering care this discovery would not have been made. Any gentleman who swallows a cherry stone, a piece of oyster shell or other similar body accidentally is liable to this disease. He may have it, or may not. We may, therefore, any one of us be indebted to this discovery for the preservation of our lives. Now, I contend that this discovery, beneficial alike to the rich and the poor, in absolute money value, far transcends any amount which the State has given to the Marshall infirmary. Then again, there is a large class of female diseases, the remedies for which have been discovered in the hospitals devoted to the special diseases of females, which never could have been discovered in private practice. There is one of the most terrible diseases of the female sex, known as the recto vaginæ fistula. There was no means known of remedying that difficulty until very recently; but by hospital practice the silver suture has been applied, which is an absolute remedy for it and restores those unhappy females to health and comfort and usefulness. Many instances of this kind could be given where it was utterly impossible without the aid of hospitals and the range of observation which they afford, diagnose the diseases and to discover the remedies adapted to their cure. And now shall we deliberately lay it down in the fundamental law, that these institutions which have done so much for humanity shall be utterly thrown out of existence for want of State charity? There are many other of these institutions which must go down unless they have the aid of the State—institutions which have been exceedingly beneficent in their operation, which have done a vast and incalculable amount of good, and which must go down unless they have the aid of the State. I for one do not believe in cutting off these beneficent sources of charity. I do not believe that the people of this State desire to cut them off, and I do believe that it would be one great cause of having this Constitution rejected by the people if it should contain a provision of this character. There is another very important class of institutions—the orphan asylums. Many of these institutions are so deeply radicated in the affections of the people that they would go on whether they had State aid or not; but some of the most important and some of the most beneficent of these institutions would go down unless they had the aid of the State. These institutions are situated along the great lines of travel—along the Central railroad, along the Hudson river; and those counties lying on either side are not provided with these orphan asylums. The consequence is that the orphan children in these contiguous counties filter into those which are provided with these institutions; and if there was no State aid the whole care of these orphans would be cast on the counties of the State situated on the great lines of travel. I do not see any justice in this or any good reason for it. I do not see why the counties on the great lines of travel should be compelled to support those orphans who reside on either side, north and south. I think there is a manifest justice in the aid given to them by the State in order to compensate, in some degree, those counties for the orphans which they maintain, who were born and have their residence out of those counties. These orphan asylums are really doing an immense amount of good. If you examine the statistics of our State prisons you will find that very considerably more than one-half of the prisoners of this State were orphans in their youth, so that the absence of parental care and parental instruction in early life has been the cause of their falling into the ways of crime. By taking these children in early life and giving them a virtuous education we may deter them from crime and save the expense of their trial and imprisonment as well as the amount of their depredations. It is therefore an economical application of the funds of the State; for we may rest assured that the orphan who is uneducated and who falls into the ways of crime will tax the community to ten times the extent by his course that he would if he were reputably and respectably educated in one of these orphan asylums. But it has been said by the distinguished gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] that there is very great danger in this matter. In my opinion the article provided by the Committee on Charities meets the case exactly, and obviates those dangers. He has cited the old statutes in England of mortmain and of uses and trusts and charitable uses, and has told us that these laws were passed in order to meet a very great and prevailing difficulty. Undoubtedly they were; but when those acts were passed the church was not divided into sects. It was one; and it was found by experience that the priests of that church stood like vampires and ghouls by the bedside of dying men and absolutely robbed the heirs—the wife and children—of their just and legitimate inheritance. This was a very great evil doubtless. It was one that required all the energies and all the ingenuity of the Legislature to prevent. But our forefathers in England did not resort to that cowardly maxim that what was not cured must be endured, but rather to the better maxim that what could not be endured must be cured; and they did cure it. But we are in different circumstances now. The church is divided into many sects. Each one of these sects is a good and sufficient watch on the others; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] is adopted, that will furnish ample security against the ecclesiastical spoliation so justly complained of. If these commissioners who are to watch over the charities of the State, are prevented from being at any time a majority of any one denomination, then each denomination will keep watch over the others; and statutes of uses and trusts and charitable uses will not be needed. The circumstances in this State now are entirely different from what they were in England when the law referred to was first adopted. It seems to me that the people of this State are almost unanimous in regard to this matter. We have had petitions without number praying that no sectarian appropriations should be made. It seems to me that this report meets the case exactly; that of having no appropriations made by the Legislature except such as are recommended by this board where there is not a majority of any one denomination, that will meet the case exactly, and we prevent any sectarian legislation whatever. I trust, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser] will not be adopted, and that we will concur in that proposed by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis].

Mr. SMITH—I am very much inclined to favor the disposition of this whole matter indicated by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], and leave it where it now rests, with the Legislature. But before giving my vote upon the question, there is a matter upon which I desire information. It is well known to you, sir, and to all the members of this body, that we have received various memorials and petitions from all parts of the State against donations for sectarian purposes. They ask that an inhibition upon the Legislature in relation to this matter be placed in the Constitution; and I suppose this demand is founded upon the idea very generally prevalent throughout the State, that there has been, in the last few years, in the donations for charitable purposes, a great disproportion in favor of the Roman Catholics. Now, whether this be well founded or not, I do not know; and it is upon this point that I desire information. At an early stage of our session there was laid upon our tables a statement headed, "Shall the State support the churches?" By this statement it appears that in 1866, there was donated by the State for sectarian purposes $129,025.49, and that of this amount $124,174.14 was given to the Roman Catholics, or to institutions controlled by them exclusively. It would seem that more than nine-tenths of the whole amount donated was, from some cause, given to the Roman Catholics. Now, whether this statement be correct or not, I am unable to say, for I have not verified it. It refers to the Comptroller's report, and to the Session Laws of that year. But from the various institutions named here which were the recipients of the State bounty, I should judge the statement to be correct. The names of the institutions indicate, in at least nine-tenths of the cases, that they are Roman Catholic. More than two-thirds of them have the prefix of "St." and it is fair to presume that all these saints are Catholics, though I would not be quite willing to admit that all the Catholics are saints. Several others, not having that prefix, also indicate that they are Catholic in their character. I do not object to donations to Catholic institutions. They should have their fair share. They should be treated like all others, and the State should make no distinction whatever among religious denominations. If the Legislature has discriminated in favor of the Catholics for political purposes, or from other considerations, then there is reason for listening to the voice of the people when they demand that there shall be an inhibition in the Constitution against these donations. I make these suggestions, and refer to this document, for the purpose of eliciting an explanation, if an explanation can be made.

Mr. CASSIDY—That document to which the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] refers was circulated on the desks of members early in the session of the Convention. It was evidently got up by preconcert. It was circulated throughout the State, and, as a consequence, numerous petitions have come in protesting against donating the public money for sectarian purposes. I do not hesitate to say that it is false from beginning to end. It has all the characteristics of a forgery. It has been exposed as a deliberate and well contrived falsehood. Nobody disputes it. It has no name signed to it; it is an anonymous pamphlet, a half sheet, and has been largely circulated through the newspapers. It impressed the whole country with the belief that it was correct, because it detailed and specified item after item. The attention of a member of the Committee on Ways and Means in the last House of Assembly—the editor of the Utica Herald, who had reported that year to sustain the donations for charitable purposes—was drawn to it. That year, the preceding year and several years before, the two houses of the Legislature were in the hands of the republican party. I merely allude to this as a fact to illustrate the falsehood of the statement. The rule which obtained in the Legislature was to grant these donations to the several counties in proportion to the number of the inmates of the public institutions. There was no discrimination in favor of the Roman Catholics. On the contrary, a careful study of the figures will show that the Roman Catholics, so far from receiving an undue proportion, received a very, very small proportion of what would be due to them according to their relative numbers. The editor of the Utica Herald, a member of the committee, exposed this fundamental error and falsehood of the statement, and gave the authority of his own name to the contradiction.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I have it here.

Mr. CASSIDY—If the gentleman will read what he says I think it will make the refutation complete.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I am glad the honorable gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] has raised this question, because I think it is well that we should, in deliberating on a question of so much importance, come at the true state of the case. I have the memorial to which my friend has alluded, and although it may not go to the extent of falsehood mentioned by the honorable gentleman from Albany [Mr. Cassidy], that it is an entire falsehood, it comes under one of those definitions laid down by Lord Paley, where he says that a man may state ninety-nine facts, and every one of them be a falsehood, because when the hundredth fact is given it overthrows all that has been stated before. This is precisely one of those cases. It has just enough truth in it to make a pretension; but, in point of fact and result, it is no true statement at all. Now, one of the facts cited in this memorial as evidence of sectarian partiality is $8,000 donated to the St. Mary's Hospital at Rochester; but it is distinctly stated in the bill to be for the expenditure in the care and reception of soldiers, under the direction of Dr. Backus, the medical officer of the post. Now here is this $8,000 put down as a sectarian appropriation for the support of Roman Catholics, while in the very language of the act it is declared that the money shall be expended under the direction of the military officer, for the support of soldiers in that place. They had to take this hospital in Rochester for the soldiers because there was no other proper place to receive them. Let me state another fact to illustrate the subterfuge of this memorial. The Elmira Female College, a Protestant institution, received $25,000 as a similar donation, but it is not mentioned in the array of facts at all, which purports to be a true statement of all the facts in the case. My friend from Albany [Mr. Cassidy] has alluded to what the editor of the Utica Herald said in reference to this memorial. Every man who knows him, knows that he was a very prominent member of the last Legislature, and a member of the Committee of Ways and Means; I mean Mr. Roberts, of Utica. Upon this subject of orphan asylums he says in reply to this memorial:

"All reorganized orphan asylums and established hospitals are included, and moneys are distributed in proportion to the number of orphans and patients cared for." That is all; in proportion to the number of orphans cared for in these respective counties. Says some gentleman, "a large number of these orphans are the children of Roman Catholic parents or are Roman Catholics themselves." What of it? The tax is made only in proportion to the assessment made upon the respective counties; and if there happens to be more of this denomination in the institutions, it only shows that more care is exercised by them in providing for their own poor than is exercised by those belonging to other denominations. "The appropriation," he adds, "is given for orphans and hospital patients, according to their number." "We have not calculated," he says, "what sect has the most of these unfortunate creatures under its care. Provided relief is offered them by the State under any circumstances, no system can be more impartial and more just than a per capita distribution, if, under such a rule, the Catholics receive for disbursement more than the Protestants. And he very properly asks, "shall complaint be made because the former care for more orphans and more patients than the latter." Sir, that is the whole story. There are more of these people gathered up in the highways and byways and streets of our cities and placed in institutions, than those of any other denomination; and when the appropriation is made, it is made upon the basis of the assessment of money, and distributed to the counties in the same proportion." I think this answers the very proper inquiry raised by my friend from Fulton [Mr. Smith], as to the correctness of the statements which have been made. One word more, with the indulgence of the committee, for being the chairman of the Committee on Charities, I naturally feel a great interest in a question like this—and this in reference to the amendment of my colleague from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] and in reference to the remarks made by my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould]. The Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions labored six weeks very diligently in examining this subject. If my friend from Onondaga

[Mr. Comstock] will pardon me, it was in this collection and in this spirit that I resisted the motion made yesterday to undo the labors of a committee, who had given so much attention to this subject, by an attempt to dismiss it after a discussion of an hour or two. I thought that unjust. We had the subject raised by my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] in the committee. A motion was made there that this commission should consist of persons belonging to different denominations. Well, sir, when we realize that there are at least some twenty active denominations in this State it would be almost impossible, quite impossible numerically, to select eight men from these twenty denominations, and it was, therefore, left very appropriately in the discretion of the Governor and the Legislature to say who those eight persons should be, the presumption being that they would be selected from those best fitted to discharge this important duty. Now, a word in regard to what has been said in reference to the question of sects by my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould]. He would have no sectarian appropriations made; that is, he would have no money appropriated to Catholic institutions per se, or to Methodist institutions, or to Presbyterian or Episcopalian institutions per se. Sir, you cannot distinguish in this way in the dispensation of the charities of the State. Go into the institution for the deaf and dumb, for example, and you will find that a very large majority of the trustees of that body are Protestants—not a Catholic there; not that they are excluded, but that as a matter of fact they are not there. Nor are they in the institutions for the education of the blind, for the care of the insane, or in any of the leading institutions of the State for which the State charities are appropriated. I think that every gentleman who reflects upon this subject will come to the conclusion that it is wise not to name directly or indirectly any sect in connection with this matter, or, in dispensing charities, to have any thing to do with sects, even by suggestion.

Mr. GOULD—I wish to say one word in answer to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I did not take ground against sectarian appropriations per se. I merely wished to secure a benefit to the State so that, if charity was given to a sectarian institution, and if we have a board of examiners such as is proposed by this committee, and if each of them belongs to a different denomination, they will take care that no appropriation is made to any single sect, as such, unless that sect yields an advantage to the whole community which will compensate for it. Now, for instance, there are the Sisters of Charity. I suppose there is not a Protestant denomination on earth that would not be willing to have appropriations made to them, for they really do an amount of good to the community which no Protestant would wish to see destroyed. I only desire that no sectarian appropriations shall be made (and that I understand to be the prayer of the numerous petitions that have come before us) for sectarian purposes, or for the advancement of the faith of any particular sect; and that if they ask for appropriations they shall give guaranties that they will return an amount of good to the community generally, sufficient to compensate for what they receive from the community. It is undoubtedly true that we cannot have all the various sects represented. Nor is it necessary that they should be, if the leading sects are represented, each one will take care that the other will not obtain an undue advantage over the other.

Mr. CURTIS—If it is in order, I should like to say one word in explanation.

The CHAIRMAN—It is in order.

Mr. CURTIS—The Convention has already decided that the State may give aid to charitable institutions. There are a large number of petitions before us, requesting the Convention to decree that no aid shall be given with a sectarian bias. The article reported by my friend [Mr. E. Brooks] expressly provides that none of this State aid shall be given to any institution, a majority of whose managers are of any particular sect. The article, therefore, concedes the principle that there is to be some safeguard against sectarian bias. That being conceded, wisely or unwisely, it seems to me proper to place that safeguard where I propose to place it, and not where it is placed in the article. That is the substance of my proposition.

Mr. PROSSER—At the suggestion of some delegates I assent to the following modification:

"No appropriations for charitable purposes shall be made by the Legislature after the adoption of this Constitution, except to institutions over which the State shall exercise a general supervision and management."

Mr. DUGANNE — I think, sir, that in the course of my life, I may have become interested from time to time in the question of private and political benevolence as much as any of my honorable colleagues, and I have been always of the impression that, could it be made practicable, it would be wise to sever and divorce completely the State aid from private aid. My grounds for this belief were that it was difficult, sometimes impossible, to distinguish how much of the support asked for by private institutions would be devoted to the object of charity alone, and how much might be devoted by some of those institutions in proselyting to particular creeds. And therefore, as I may say, my objection to it has been founded upon that objection, which operates equally in every free mind against the union of church and State in any particular. But, sir, I recognize in the report of this committee an earnest effort to strike the golden mean between indiscriminate charity and that charity which is to be alone distributed by the State in its capacity of a great commonwealth. I see very little objection, Mr. Chairman, to the report as submitted before us. It provides against that particular objection which is founded upon the well-based fear that charity may be debased or misappropriated to sectarian purposes, and if this report and the article could have eliminated from it the other objection on which the argument of my friend from Ontario was founded, in reference to the perpetuation of gifts in trusts, so as to aggregate landed estate in possession of any particular class or sect, I think that we could reach the gist of the whole matter, and that the report would be entirely unobjectionable. I propose, therefore, if

I have the opportunity—I believe it is not now in order—to submit an amendment which at the same time that it strengthens the universal character of the report, will rid it of the objection which is based upon the clause in line 17. I am aware, and I think that every other gentleman will bear me witness, that there is a process of aggregation of landed estates going on now under the auspices of a sectarian regime which must produce at some future time a state of affairs approximating very much to that which was occasioned by this condition of mortmain in England. I think that it is a subject of daily report that large sectarian institutions based upon the aggregation and possession of real estate are being founded all over this country—institutions which I may say are entirely antagonistic to the spirit of republicanism as we understand it. I need not say what these institutions are; they will occur to every member of the Convention. But it is well for us in a Constitutional Convention, knowing, as we do the rapidity with which certain faiths and creeds stride toward the possession of property, and thereby an aggregation of power—it is well for us as republicans, and as members of a republican State, to insert in our Constitution some clause which will arrest this march of sectarian power, at the proper time, while it can be arrested. I say that I am in favor of this report, and I shall vote for it, if I have the opportunity to propose such amendments as I think will render it as nearly perfect as an article can be in the Constitution.

Mr. ALVORD—It has been well remarked by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], that there are a great many ways of telling a falsehood extant in the world, and I have the pleasure now of presenting to this Convention, the mode in which these appropriations are enumerated in this anonymous communication, were made by the Legislature. The act appropropriates to these orphan asylums, home associations, etc., throughout the State, eighty thousand dollars; sixty thousand dollars more than is mentioned here, to start with. The following amounts subject to the aforesaid conditions are hereby appropriated as follows:

Mr. PROSSER—What are the conditions?

Mr. ALVORD—I was going to read them to you. The conditions are:

"The Treasurer shall pay, on the warrant of the Comptroller, out of moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the several amounts specified in this act, to the persons duly authorized to receive the same; but no amount here indicated shall be paid to any institution or person representing it, unless otherwise ordered, till the president and secretary, or the managers of such institution, shall have made to him a report of their operations, attested by their official seal, pursuant to chapter 419 of the Laws of 1864, entitled 'An act requiring officers of scientific and eleemosynary institutions to make annual reports;' and it shall the duty of the Comptroller to withhold any appropriation here made to any hospital, asylum, association or institution, when it shall appear that the money so appropriated will not be duly and properly made for the purposes specified in its charter and constitution and by-laws, or as defined in this act; and he shall report to the Legislature the grounds and causes for withholding such appropriation; but he shall not be required henceforth to transmit the reports of any such scientific or eleemosynary institution to the Legislature, except when the same shall be demanded by resolution."

Then it goes on to say:

"The following amounts, subject to the aforesaid conditions, are hereby appropriated as follows, viz.: The orphan asylums, homes for the friendless, and other charitable institutions of like character, for their maintenance, eighty thousand dollars, to be paid as follows, namely: the said amount shall be divided among the several counties in proportion to their respective valuations, as the same shall have been established by the State board of equalization. The sums thus awarded to each county shall be paid to the following incorporated orphan asylums and institutions in proportion to the number of orphans and homeless persons maintained in them during the present fiscal year, except in the county of Cayuga."

Now that gentlemen have this matter before them, let me read one or two of these special appropriations, which they will find have neither name nor place in this anonymous document.

"The Albany orphan asylum, the Albany guardian society and home for the friendless, the association of the sheltering arms in the city of New York, the Brooklyn orphan asylum, the Brooklyn industrial school association and home for destitute children, the Buffalo orphan asylum, the Cayuga asylum for orphans, the children's day home at Troy."

Mr. BELL—I would inquire of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] if he is reading from the act of 1866, or from the act of 1867?

Mr. ALVORD—I am reading from the act of 1866, which purports to be this very act, this very chapter is quoted in this anonymous communication sent in to this Convention, and I therefore pronounce without hesitation that it is from the beginning to the end a falsehood. No fairer, no more equal distribution of aid by the State to institutions of this kind was ever made under the light of the sun than is made under chapter 774 of the Laws of 1866; and I repeat what I said yesterday, that in all my legislative experience, in all these cases where State aid has been granted to institutions of this character, it has been based, not upon the question whether the institution belonged to this or that religious denomination, but upon the numbers who are taken care of by the charity, and only upon that. The distributions were made from time to time, based upon the numbers maintained in these institutions throughout the State. I say now, again, and I hope we have about finished this discussion, that there is no necessity whatever of our undertaking to interfere in the fundamental law with this question. It should be left where it has been left in the past, to the Legislature, and if there are any good grounds for the people feeling nervous upon this subject, they can from time to time, through their Legislature, speak their will in regard to it. But if, by our constitutional law we close up the avenues through which the needy can get aid from the State, although we may be conscientiously doing what we think right and necessary, I am afraid that we shall certainly by that operation do vast injury and damage to those who may depend upon the charity of the community for support, and thus incidentally injure the whole people.

Mr. BELL.—I regret exceedingly sir, that sectarianism has been drawn into this discussion. I do not think that it has any place in any action that we shall take on this subject. I think that the munificence of the State should be like the rain and the sunshine—free to all; and when objects of charity are to be sought out, it should be the last question, or, rather, it should not be a question at all, to what church or party the indigent persons belong. It has no place in this discussion, but I feel, in justice to the petitioners, and I know not who they are, and know not by whom this article was sent, I ought to say that I think my honorable friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has made too sweeping remarks in regard to these petitions; that he has not treated them as the petitioners drew them. I am not aware, sir, that the appropriation of $80,000 was taken into consideration in this petition, neither, indeed, do I think it had any place here. I think it was not properly a subject on which they should have animadverted. The object of this, if I understand it, is to show the sectarian appropriations; and I do not consider this appropriation of $80,000, divided among the respective counties in proportion to their assessed valuation, to have any thing to do with sectarianism. It is a bounty to the entire State in proportion to the assessed valuation of the counties. But they have set forth here appropriations that they consider purely sectarian, and they object to money being appropriated from the State for sectarian purposes. Now, to prove that they may have some show of reason in that matter, I will read from the appropriations that the gentleman failed to read. I will not take up the time of the Convention by reading those that he has already read. "For the St. Stephen's church in Twenty-eighth street, in the city of New York, to aid in the maintenance of schools, $1,000; for St. Gabriel's church, Twenty-seventh street, in the city of New York, for the maintenance of schools, $1,000; for the church of the Holy Innocents, for the maintenance of schools under its charge, $1,000," etc.—appropriations that are made to churches, and not to charitable institutions as such, but entirely out of the list of what is fairly considered in the common acceptation of the term "charities." Now, this is the object of the petitioners, and their statements are not so far from the truth as would seem from the sweeping remarks of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. Now, sir, let us not be governed by any sectarian bias or feeling on this subject, but lay down some general principle by which all the destitute and helpless in the State can be provided for. If abuses have arisen from appropriations by the Legislature, let us confine their appropriations to institutions that are under the general management of the State, and let those that are got up by private individuals be supported by private beneficence as far as that will go, and when that fails, from any cause whatever, then allow the local authorities to supply deficiencies. Let us do this, and we have accomplished all that a wise forethought for the relief of that class of our people can demand.

The question was put on the adoption of the substitute of Mr. Prosser, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. E. Brooks to amend section 1, line three, by inserting after the word "shall" the words "not be members of one religious denomination, and five of whom shall;" so that the clause would read: "A majority of whose members shall not be members of one religious denomination, and five of whom shall constitute a quorum."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SPENCER—If there are no further amendments in the way of perfecting that section, I propose, for the purpose of presenting the question proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], to move to strike out the first section. That motion will determine the sense of the committee upon the propriety of acting at all upon the article.

Mr. SILVESTER—I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this motion will not prevail. As a member of the Committee on Charities, although I have not been present during much of the discussion that has taken place upon the report, I naturally feel an interest in the report which we have presented and the article which we have submitted to the Convention. Of course, sir, I can and do find no fault that this article is submitted to the most searching and deliberate scrutiny of the Convention, before passing upon any section or part of it; but, I trust that the motion which the gentleman has just made and which is a renewal of the motion which was made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] yesterday, will not prevail. At an early stage in the history of this Convention, this subject was considered to be one of such importance that this committee was ordered by a special vote of the Convention. The arrangement of the different subjects which should be submitted for the deliberation and consideration of this body was intrusted to a select committee appointed by the President, and after very deliberate reflection that committee submitted the titles of various committees, which they thought essential for the consideration of the subjects to be presented to this Convention. Among that list of committees was not embraced one upon this subject, but the Convention by a unanimous vote considered this subject to be one of such importance that a special committee was created by a direct vote of the Convention, to consider this subject, and report an article to the Convention for its deliberation and adoption or rejection. A committee was appointed; they had many long and laborious sessions before arriving at any conclusion with respect to this subject, and they have submitted the result of their deliberations in the article and the report which are now before the Convention. Very many petitions were presented to this Convention early in its session, and during the whole course of the session, with respect to this subject. The number of petitions submitted to the Convention up to the present time, show that the people of the State feel an interest in the matter; that they desire that this Convention should take some action upon it, and that they consider it of sufficient importance to send petitions in regard to it to this Convention and to ask that this body shall pass upon the subject. Now, two courses seem to have been adopted in this Convention; one by the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, and the other by this committee. The Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature sought to meet the views of the petitioners by entirely cutting off all appropriations from charitable objects. That subject was presented to the Convention, and the Convention by their votes showed that they did not agree with the view taken by the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, and that they were not willing to say, by a vote of this Convention, that no charitable object should hereafter receive any aid from the State. They did, however, modify the power of the Legislature to make such grants by providing that they could be made only by a vote of two-thirds. The Committee on Charities sought to reach the object which the various petitioners desired to have accomplished, not by abolishing, but by regulating. We were not willing to say that the great State of New York should not assist, not only the charitable institutions of the State, but of private individuals. For one, sir, as a member of the Committee on Charities, my views agree with the views of that committee. I was not willing to say, as my deliberate act, either in the committee or in the Convention, that hereafter public or private charities should not receive any aid from the State. I believe that it is not only the duty but the interest of the State to foster and to cherish, in a judicious manner, not only public but private charities. The reasons I will not occupy the time of the Convention with stating. But the committee sought merely to regulate these charities, and we have provided a plan which, as I contend, is simple, and which, if carried out, will accomplish the result desired, by providing a board to be appointed, consisting of a certain number of members to whom all applications for aid for charitable purposes are first to be submitted, and to receive their approval or disapproval. This provides against most of the objections which have been urged by those who have presented these petitions to the Convention. It provides, it seems to me, against any possible objection which can be urged against the State granting its aid to private or public charity. We provide that before this aid shall be granted the claims of the applicants shall first be submitted to a board, that board to investigate the propriety of aiding the charity; if that board reports favorably, the matter will be submitted to the Legislature, and then there is a still further check, by means of the provision which has been already adopted by this Convention, requiring a two-thirds vote of the Legislature before they can appropriate any money to charitable objects. Now, sir, I know that it has been said here, and the argument has been already urged, that this whole subject can be left to the Legislature, and that the Legislature can provide for this board and provide for regulating the whole subject of charities. It is true, sir, that they can do so, but the very fact that we have these petitions presented here, shows that although the Legislature has made a provision very similar to this in the act of 1867 providing for such a board, the people of the State desired that something should be placed in the organic law with respect to this subject some safeguard upon which they might rely, and to which they might trust. I do not believe, sir, that the people of this State desire that aid should be entirely cut off from all charities, but that they desire that the subject should be regulated in some manner. Under this plan which requires the submitting to a board all applications for charity, upon the report of which, favorable or unfavorable, will depend the granting of aid to those charities, this regulation will be provided. I trust, therefore, that this section will not be stricken out, but that members of the committee will give it their calm and deliberate reflection, because it will accomplish the result sought by the petitions that have been presented, that of regulating the granting of aid to charities; while it will not deprive any charity of that aid which it should receive, and which would be beneficial to the receivers, and at the same time beneficial to the State. In this way charity will be bestowed in the manner in which the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] intended it should be, equal, generous and free; equally upon all without discrimination, and in a manner which is deserved, just and meritorious, and which will accomplish the greatest aid for the unfortunate, which will benefit the State in the greatest manner, while, at the same time, it will also benefit the recipients. I trust, sir, that this committee will not by its vote strike out this section.

Mr. SPENCER—I desire to say a single word in support of the motion I have made. Very many, if not most of the charitable institutions of the State, are organized in the interest of some sect or religious denomination. It will be impossible to organize a board like the one proposed by this article, without encountering a conflict between the different sects and religious denominations of the State; and it will be impossible, in the nature of things, when we consider the prejudices, and the often excited feelings growing out of religious controversies, and the efforts to acquire religious ascendency, to avoid such a conflict in relation to this board; and whenever the question of appointing such a board shall come up before the Governor or before the Senate, applicants of the several different religious denominations, either separately or in combination, will be on hand for the purpose of presenting their claims; and so hostility will be excited on the part of those who are not in the organization. Now, it seems to me that it is entirely unnecessary to embody any provision of this kind in the Constitution, and that it will serve no good purpose whatever. It is not a necessary or essential part of the framework of the government of this State, and if we are to adopt the principle of creating subordinate departments like these in the government of the State, we may go on ad infinitum until every single subordinate department in the administration of the government becomes a fundamental part of the law of the State, and the Constitution which we shall make will become as cumbersome as the statutes and acts of the Legislature of which so much complaint has been made here. It seems to me that the quickest and the best way to dispose of this matter, is to strike out this section at once and by that means dispose of the entire article so that we may proceed to some subject properly appertaining a fundamental law for the government of the State.

Mr. DEVELIN—I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], not only for the reasons submitted by him and the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], to the committee, but also because of certain objectionable clauses in it, to which special attention, I think, has not been called. The board of commissioners contemplated by this section is authorized to visit, and inspect, and require reports from charitable institutions established by individuals. Now, if any gentleman of sufficient means, feeling an interest in his race, or from other worthy motives, establishes a charitable institution, and invests a fund, the interest of which shall accrue to its benefit, and be sufficient for its support, what right has the State to interfere by the proposed commission, or in any other manner, and to examine its operations? As well might it invade a household, subject its privacy to the public gaze and legislate as to its proprieties and conduct. If the funds be diverted from their intended object the courts possess ample power to apply and enforce a remedy. The section also declares that the board shall visit, inspect, and require reports from all institutions "except religious organizations of a sectarian character." To these words, "religious organizations of a sectarian character" there can be but one meaning. They apply in a legal sense to ecclesiastical corporations and to them only. There is no "religious organization of a sectarian character," as far as I am aware, in the State of New York, except churches. The Sisters of Charity, although composed of ladies devoted to a religious life, are not in the law "a religious organization of a sectarian character," and they would not be pronounced to be such by the courts. They form simply a charitable institution incorporated under the general law referred to by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], last evening, for the incorporation of charitable, benevolent and missionary societies. They, therefore, would, by the section under discussion, be subject to visitation and inspection by this commission. Again, the ladies of the Good Shepherd, another Catholic institution organized for the purpose of relieving and bringing back to a better life females who may have fallen from virtue, are not "a religious organization of a sectarian character," but like the Sisters of Charity, though laboring, however, in a different field, are a charitable institution incorporated under the general law to which I have already referred. The Sisters of Mercy, too, another Catholic institution in New York, incorporated for the purpose of assisting women, either denizens or strangers, but unemployed in the city; of teaching them to cook, wash, iron, and perform housework generally, and of obtaining employment for them, is not "a religious organization of a sectarian character," but like the other two mentioned corporations are, a charitable institution incorporated under the same general law. This commission would thus be authorized to visit and inspect the last institution also. Other similar orders of charity, I could name, but for the argument the above will suffice. Now, as a Catholic, I strenuously object to any provision, constitutional or other, that would for a moment subject these self-sacrificing and noble ladies to such an inquisition. I oppose the creation of this board of commissioners with the view of invading the houses and homes of these retiring and delicate ladies, who, from the high est motives, have withdrawn from the outer world and are unaccustomed to its business. In many cases prurient curiosity, rather than a sense of duty, would lead the commissioners to visit and inspect these institutions, and require reports of their doings. The country had an experiment and an example of this kind a few years ago in Massachusetts. A committee was appointed there by the Legislature, or the lower house of it, called the "General Court," to visit and inspect the institutions of the Sisters of Charity. The action of that committee was disgraceful in the extreme—so much so that it won for itself the opprobious name of the "smelling committee," and its action excited the indignation of the people of Boston and of the State at large. The ladies were subjected to many indignities, and annoyed and insulted almost beyond belief. Altogether, the conduct of the members of the committee was so disgraceful that, under the storm of public indignation which burst upon it from every quarter, it was dissolved, and one member, for his offensive questions, impertinent suggestions, and attempted familiarity, was expelled from the house. I submit, therefore, that there is good reason for objecting to the appointment of any commissioners in whose power it shall be to repeat this kind of unmanly outrage upon ladies who are the pride and ornament of the largest and most influential christian church in the world. Nor is it without cause that a repetition may be apprehended, for this board or commission, if appointed, will, of course, be composed mainly of persons who differ with Catholics in their religious views. It is not improbable that some of the members would be prejudiced against the Catholic Church, its orders and its institutions. To these it will be natural to suspect their character and objects, to discredit their charitable intentions, and to believe that they are organized rather to proselyte and spread Catholicity than to aid the needy or minister to the neglected and suffering. Moved and driven forward by these suspicions, these commissioners will feel but little restraint upon the time of their visits or the mode of inspection. It is with these unpleasant circumstances in view that I ask that these gentle ladies should be, beyond possibility, protected from insults and indignities and that I express the hope that this Convention will never authorize this commission. A few words in reference to the printed circular of appropriations to Catholic institutions in 1866 and 1867, just read, and as it were offered in evidence in support of the proposed commission. It professes to show the appropriations to "sectarian" — thereby solecistically meaning Catholic—associations. Its special object is to prove that the Catholics are the favored and almost monopolizing recipients of the bounty of the State. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has essentially disposed of it, and clearly shown its bad faith as to the appropriations for 1866. I will, therefore, confine myself to those of 1867, and will expose its evident and intentional suppression of the truth and the studied attempt of its author to deceive and impose upon the members of this Convention. On the last page are quoted the appropriations made by the Legislature in 1867, viz.: $10,000 for St. Bridget's school, for St. Stephen's school, for St. Gabriel's school, for the Holy Innocent's school, for the school attached to St. Peter's church, for St. Mary's school, for St. Theresa's school, for the school attached to Transfiguration church, each $5,000. These appropriations appear at the close of a long paragraph on the city tax levy of 1867; but not a word, except in one instance, which will be hereafter noticed, is mentioned in this anonymous document of appropriations to Protestant establishments. Yet the compiler of it was obliged to wade through a pool of such appropriations in the opening portion of the paragraph before he reached the appropriations which I have quoted. I will cite these omitted appropriations—donations to the following institutions, viz.:

St. Francis Hospital (not Catholic),	$5,000
Ladies' Union Aid Soc. (not Catholic),	5,000
N. Y. Women's Medical College, and Hospital for Women and Children (not Catholic),	5,000
Society for the Relief of Destitute Children of Seamen (not Catholic),	5,000
Ladies' Union Relief Association for care of Indigent Soldiers and their Families (not Catholic),	5,000
House of Mercy (not Catholic),	25,000
Ladies' Home Mission (not Catholic),	25,000
Five Points House of Industry (not Catholic),	20,000
N. Y. Female Assistant Soc. (not Catholic),	1,500

In all more than $75,000, which this accurate collector of charitable statistics conceals from view.

Mr. BELL—I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] if the institutions the names of which he is now reading, are sectarian?

Mr. DEVELIN—They are sectarian in this sense: that the persons who control them are all of one religion; I do not mean all of one denomination, but they are all essentially and admittedly Protestants.

Mr. GOULD—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DEVELIN—Certainly, sir.

Mr. GOULD—I wish to ask whether Catholics, if they choose to give the amount that is necessary, under the constitution of those societies to constitute membership, may not become members of those institutions?

Mr. DEVELIN—They may become members of the institution, but they cannot of the board of directors until a majority of the members become Catholic, and enabled to control the election of the board. Of course, then they would, in the gentleman's view, be sectarian; but in a changed, though, perhaps, his sense.

Mr. GOULD—Those institutions are not sectarian.

Mr. DEVELIN—I suppose not; because there seems to be in the minds of some gentlemen in this Convention nothing sectarian which is not Catholic.

Mr. GOULD—I want to know if Protestants can enter into the society of the Sisters of Charity, or the Sisters of Mercy?

Mr. DEVELIN—Certainly they can by becoming Catholics. [Laughter.] Permit me to say to this Convention that every Catholic parent deems it a duty which in conscience he owes to his offspring to enable them to receive not only an intellectual education but also a moral and religious training in the faith he professes. The right or wrong of this is not open for discussion here; it is a matter of belief and of conscience with every Catholic, and according to the spirit of the institutions of our country to be unimpeached, recognized and admitted in every political body. Now, in the city of New York there is a numerous Catholic population; some wealthy, others in moderate circumstances; but almost all, in one way or another, tax payers. Like other citizens they are taxed for the support of the public schools of the city; but although they thus contribute largely toward their support, very few of their children are educated in them for the reason that the pupils there do not and cannot legally be instructed in their faith. This compels them to organize schools of their own in which the necessary education may be had. Thus, in addition to the amounts they pay for the public they contribute toward the support of their own schools and maintain them.

Mr. GOULD—If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I desire to say that I visited one of the public schools in New York only the other day, and there was not a child in that school that was not a Catholic.

Mr. DEVELIN—That may be; but that school must have been in the lower part of the city where the Catholics, through their political majority in that section, have elected the school officers and thus obtained control of the schools. [Laughter.] As a general fact, however, the Catholic children do not attend the public but are to be found in the Catholic schools. For instance, in the case of every school to which the appropriations I have cited were made in 1867, there was an average attendance of from seven hundred and fifty to fourteen hundred children, and, with the exception of the mentioned appropriations, the expenses of these schools were met and discharged by private contributions from the Catholics of the city. As far as my knowledge extends, and I am reasonably familiar with the matter, there is not a Catholic church in the city of New York in some part of or attached to which there is not a school filled to its utmost capacity with children of either sex. Now, when the members of this Convention reflect for a moment upon the matter and see how much Catholics contribute toward the support of the public schools, and how little they use them, and how much they themselves voluntarily expend for the education of their children, they must admit that these paltry appropriations to our schools of five thousand dollars sink into insignificance. There is still another appropriation made in 1867, to which I have promised to refer; it is for an institution known as the Young Men's Christian Association, which I have always understood was an institution intended to advance the interests of the Protestant religion and the views of the republican party. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOLGER—Does the gentleman think the two are identical?

Mr. DEVELIN—Well, yes, I do. I think them identical in error. [Laughter.] This donation is mentioned, but it is the only one of these numerous and large appropriations at all referred to in this anonymous communication which has been submitted, I may say, with fraudulent intent to mislead the members of this Convention. I repeat that I am in favor of the motion to strike out the first section of this report of the Committee on Charities.

Mr. SILVESTER—In any remarks which I may make upon this subject, or in any vote which I shall cast, I desire to act and speak entirely irrespective of any peculiar views which may be entertained upon this subject, either with respect to Protestantism or Roman Catholicism; and I believe that in the discussions and deliberations of the committee the different rights or views of either Protestants or Roman Catholics had nothing to do with the article which the committee have reported or the report which they have presented. They considered this subject, as I think it should be considered by this Convention, simply with respect to citizens of the State, viewed as citizens of the State, irrespective of religious views, opinions and prejudices, and with respect to what will be best for the interests of the State in connection with charities and charitable institutions, regardless of what may be the peculiar religious views of those having the control of those institutions. I, for one, sir, certainly have no objections to appropriations having been made to Roman Catholic institutions, or to their being made to them in the future. I have no objection to appropriations being made to any institutions which are charitable, and which I therefore conceive are for the interests of the State and for the benefit of the whole community, and I do not believe any member of the Committee on Charities acted, in framing this report or in asking for its adoption, with respect either to institutions being Protestant or Roman Catholic, or with respect to the direction in which charities have been bestowed. Now, the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] says that it will be impossible to avoid controversy in the formation of this board, that denominational rivalry will enter into competion, and that there will be on that account a contest, and that important difficulties will arise. I do not view it, sir, in that light. I believe that eight gentlemen could be found whose views would be so enlarged, so comprehensive on this subject that they could act with respect to the subject of charities irrespective of any peculiar bias that their minds might have in a religious point of view. I believe, sir, that there are in the State of New York, individuals so philanthropic and so benevolent, of such enlarged minds, and of such comprehensive views in respect to the subject of charity, that eight persons could be found who could constitute a board who would act in respect to this subject simply with this view. What is the interest of the State, and what are the interests of individuals, to be promoted by this charity which is presented for our consideration? I believe they could act upon this subject irrespective of the peculiar religious views of individuals, and irrespective of the views of the persons who might compose or be influential in the charity which was presented for their consideration. I do not, therefore, think that the objection which has been urged by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] is of weight with respect to the constitution of that board. I believe that individuals could be found who would act with respect to the subject simply upon its own merits, irrespective of any surrounding circumstances. But another objection is urged by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin], and that is, that it invests the board with the power to examine into the affairs of a charity which has been founded by a private individual. Well, sir, is there any thing objectionable in that? Suppose an individual chooses to endow a charitable institution and throw it open, and to dispense its charities to the inhabitants of the State and of the world. That institution is still under the laws of the State of New York, and is it not proper that a board which has been created by the State should have a right to examine into the affairs of that institution and see how it is conducted? But, sir, suppose a private individual shall endow a charitable institution, and shall leave funds sufficient for carrying on its operations; that individual dies, and the funds pass into the hands of trustees to administer that charity; is it not right that there should reside in this board the power to investigate and determine whether the objects of the donor have been carried out, and whether the trustees are properly administering the trust of the institution?

Mr. DEVELIN—The courts have that power now.

Mr. SILVESTER—Certainly; I am aware of that. What objection then, is there to granting that power to this board if the courts of the State of New York have the right to investigate and see whether private charities are carried out in accordance with the will of the donor? Why is it improper to place this power also in the hands of a board whose duty it shall be to investigate the charities of the State, and one of whose duties it shall be to see that the objects of a donor are faithfully carried out? The gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] has intimated that the clause in the first section which excludes the right of investigation and visitation of religious organizations of a sectarian character would not exempt such institutions as the Sisters of Mercy and Sisters of Charity, and other societies and benevolent associations of the same character, from such investigations. I, sir, as a member of the committee, know that it was the intention of the majority of the committee in placing this exceptional clause in the section that it should have the operation of exempting from the visitation of this board on charities those very organizations to which he refers; and I should object as much as any gentleman—I, as an Episcopalian, would object to the visitation by this committee of the organization in my own church of the Sisters of Mercy and others of a kindred character, and I certainly considered, and I think the majority of the committee considered, that the exceptional clause had the effect—it certainly was intended to have the effect—to except from this visitation such organizations as the Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Mercy, and other organizations of a kindred character. I think, therefore, there is no force in the objection which was urged by the gentleman from New York in respect to that clause in the section. But if there is, it can be so amended in its scope and meaning, and language, as to attain these objects, and to exclude from the visitations of that board organizations of the character to which I have referred.

Mr. LEE—I do not rise to make a speech. I did not design to say a word upon this subject, and I shall confine myself now to a very few remarks. I hope that this section will not be stricken out. I shall confine myself to that. While I believe that the State owes it to itself to provide suitably for its unfortunate poor, embracing the idiotic, the insane, the blind, the deaf and dumb, and disabled seamen, soldiers, and their orphan children, I think, sir, that the State might well confine itself, as a State, in providing for the care and support of the classes I have named. And while, sir, there are a great variety of other worthy classes of unfortunate poor, I think that the counties or the Legislature in its wisdom should provide a mode by which means should be raised by those who are familiar with the needs of these several classes in the several localities throughout the State. To my mind the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] has furnished some of the best arguments in the remarks he has made why some action should be taken by this Convention in relation to this subject. He says that when a member of the Legislature last year, because the Legislature had very generously made numerous liberal grants to the Catholic schools of the city of New York, though the State has made ample provision for the education of all the children of that city (the Catholics having, in their wisdom, seen fit to refuse the boon, and come to the Legislature to ask provision for their sectarian schools), he, as a Catholic, was willing to vote for a donation to a Protestant institution. This sort of legislation is based on the principle of "You tickle me, and I'll tickle you." In the latter part of the session of the Legislature, in haste, and without due consideration, designing men combine together, each to promote his own local interest, and thus deplete the treasury of the State. Thus it is that a very large number of the people of the State are called upon, in the payment of taxes, to support religious institutions, who feel no particular interest or feeling on the question of Catholicity or Protestantism at all. Now, I take it that there is a very large class of people in the city of New York who are not looking primarily or mainly to sustain the building up and support of Catholics as such, or Protestants as such. There is a large class who feel that the particular work of building up sectarian or denominational institutions appertains to those who entertain denominational beliefs. I hold, sir, that the people of the State have a right to say, by constitutional provision that a bar should be interposed in some way by which the action of the Legislature, in the last hours of the session, may be moderated, or at least that they shall be curtailed, if you please, in the exercise of the right to voting away indiscriminately the money of the people. I hope, sir, the motion to strike out this section will not be sustained. And, sir, while this section reported by the committee does not fully meet my views, I think it an improvement upon the provisions existing in the present Constitution.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I presume that there is no difference of opinion among members of this Convention in regard to the simple question of charity; so that any vote that we may give upon this subject ought not to commit us for or against charity. I suppose it will be as readily conceded that a majority of this Convention are Protestants, strong Protestants; and I trust that any vote which the members of this Convention may give upon this subject will not be supposed to commit him to either the Catholic or the Protestant interest in mere religious matters. I think that another fact will not be disputed in this Convention, and this is that our Legislature has occasionally made unadvised appropriations, so that any vote that we may give on this subject should not commit us to the one side or the other of that question. So far as the question now immediately before us is concerned, it is whether in the present state of the Constitution and laws of this State, we actually need to create the board that is proposed to be created in the first section of the proposed article. Now, sir, I do not believe that we have any need of adopting a constitutional provision creating such a board. It may have been wise for the Legislature to have created the board which it has created. It may be found equally wise for the Legislature to repeal the law creating that board, and, as the Constitution now stands, and as it will stand if we do not adopt this provision, if the Legislature shall find that the creation of that board works badly, they will possess the power to strike the board out of existence by future legislation. But if we incorporate this provision in the Constitution, the board must stand until the Constitution is changed, however much of mischief may be found to result from the workings of it If it works badly, the system must stand until the Constitution itself shall be changed. Now, sir, for myself, I may perhaps be considered irreverent, when I say that I have a perfect distrust of all such boards, and especially boards created by constitutional provision. I think it would be better, if it were necessary, to endow eight philosophers and philanthropists at the expense of the State, that we should provide directly for the payment of their salaries, and not give them any power whatever. I think that incalculable mischief is likely to grow out of committing this duty to the hands of these men. It is suggested that it is very important that there should be the power of visitation. Sir, we do not need this section to enable the Legislature to provide for the visitation of institutions supposed to be working mischief, institutions supposed to be working immorality, institutions supposed to imprison within walls those who wish to be free. An abundance of power exists in your Legislature under other provisions of your Constitution, and will remain, unless our philosophers and philanthropists shall emasculate legislative power by provisions that ignorance may foist into the Constitution, in utter ignorance of the evils which they are likely to produce. If we do not tie the hands of the State of New York the Legislature will have the power, if an institution is supposed to be working immorality or working injustice, to make any proper visitation and inquire into the facts. There is no difficulty in visiting institutions under the Constitution as it now stands. But it is proposed that an inquisitorial body shall be established by the Constitution, authorized to go at all times spying into all the institutions such as are embraced in the scope of the first section of this article. If we needed a constitutional provision giving us power to look out wrong and to rescue the oppressed, there might be reason for this provision. But there is no reason for it in the world. I make this remark for the reason that there has been an evident attempt out of doors to swerve this Convention out of its propriety by appealing to the Protestant prejudices of the majority of this Convention. Now, sir, I have as many Protestant prejudices as most men, but I do not believe that, officially or privately, those Protestant prejudices should drive me to work a folly either in my official action here or elsewhere. If our Catholic friends have had too much help from the State, we certainly have inserted in the proposed Constitution a provision that will protect the State against such action in the future, because I trust, sir, that the time is not likely to come during the existence of any Constitution that we shall make when it will not be found that one-third of the members who shall be elected to either branch of your legislative body will be as staunch Protestants as the majority of this Convention is to-day. And so long as that state of facts exists there is no danger that those really representing a large majority of the people of the State at the present time will not be protected in their religion and in their property. And it was for this reason that I arose and it is for this reason that I say that Protestantism does not require that we should foist this monstrosity upon the Constitution of this State.

Mr. DUGANNE—The question, as I understand it, is between the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Prosser] and the first section of the article reported by the Committee on Charities.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The question is on the motion to strike out the first section.

Mr. DUGANNE—Then I will reserve my remarks for the present.

Mr. DALY—I regret that I have not been present pending this debate, because in the very few observations which I propose to offer, I may possibly repeat what some other gentleman has said. I can only justify my doing so by being exceedingly brief in my remarks. This provision as I understand it, embraced in the first and third sections, proposes to exclude from all State donations any institution that is religious or sectarian in its character.

Mr. LEE—I think there was a motion to strike that out, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It has not yet been made. It was proposed to be made.

Mr. DALY—I understand that it has not been stricken out. I have very little to say in respect to that provision. I admit that there is a principle in holding that the funds of the State raised for general purposes shall not be applied to charitable institutions managed by private individuals, and if the Convention is disposed to go to the length of that general principle, if they believe it wise or expedient to do so, then whatever opinion I may entertain of it as to its policy or utility, I certainly can have none to its general justice as it makes no distinction, but confines the funds raised by taxes of the State donated for purposes of charity solely to State institutions. But if the State is to continue as it has done from the organization of the government, to bestow donations upon other institutions, which relieve the State of a trust otherwise imposed upon it, either to educate its people or to relieve them when from want or destitution they become a charge upon the community, or in other words to fulfill the obligations of humanity toward them, I say, then, there is no justice in excluding from the operations of its bounty any institution which comes under the denomination of religious. No man in the present age is bold enough, I apprehend, to say that, any education which is bestowed upon our youth should be wanting in the religious element. If there is any thing in our civilization which tends to elevate us, and distinguish us from the ages that have preceded us, it is the fact of the large amount of religious education instilled in our youth, and the beneficial influence of it during the after stages of life. The difficulty, however, as to what that religious education shall be, involves the difficulty of this difference in the religious creeds, and the impossibility of prescribing any one form of religious instruction, or the difficulty of excluding it altogether. What, in the language of the section, is understood as a religious institution? If, in the government of a school, or in the management of any institution, it forms a part of its discipline that a prayer should be offered to the great Creator of the Universe for the benefits He has bestowed, or if any thing else is prescribed which indicates a religious sentiment in its management, that institution is more or less religious in its character. And unless a very nice distinction be drawn between what is purely moral instruction, and what is purely religious, a distinction which it is difficult practically to carry out, it would be impossible to determine what would or would not be religious. The difficulty, therefore, involved in this provision is, that the board will be called upon to determine what is a religious institution; and it is sought to get over that difficulty by adding to the word "religious" the words "or sectarian." What is a sectarian institution? Let us take the oldest form of religion amongst us — that of the primitive people who preceded Christianity in the establishment of the monotheistic worship of one God —the Jews. The Jew will say that he is no sectarian, because his was the first religion that established the worship of a single God, and that, as the etymology of the word sectarian denotes, which is, "cut off, "or" separated from," all the rest have separated from and are sectarians, while he is of the original faith, that the whole body of Christians are "breakers off" from the primitive form of worship which his ancestors established. If you take the Christian faith, then the oldest existing form of that faith is the one of which I am a member—the Roman Catholic; and I may say with regard to the subsequent faiths called Christian, that they are sectarian, because they are "breakers off" and "seceders," that the term "sect" applies to them and does not apply to the Roman Catholic faith, which represents the prior organization of the Christian church. In offering these remarks I do not desire to be invidious, but I simply offer them to show that difficulties will arise in the interpretation of a section of this kind, in determining what institutions are religious and what are sectarian. The result will be this, that it will put it in the power of the board of trustees to determine arbitrarily a question which it is impossible to define, and which can have no practical operation or effect, except as the enforcement of their will. It is a matter of no consequence to the State, in the bestowal of its bounty, whether children are educated to be Catholics, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists or otherwise, if these denominations choose to take the matter in charge, and give the children of their denomination a good education, though it may be in accordance with the denominational religious views. It should not be the desire of any one denomination to bring about a state of things by which children of another sect shall be required in their education to conform to the doctrines of a different faith from that in which their parents wish them to be brought up. The great principle of toleration is the one we have professed to act upon in this country. It is carried out in the national Constitution of the United States, and in all public matters great delicacy must be exercised upon the subject of religious belief. It is one of the features that distinguishes us from other nations, that our government publicly recognizes one of the infirmities of human nature; one that we are constantly called upon in society to encounter, the prejudices of those belonging to particular sects, and the very natural feeling which results from the conviction of the truth of the faith to which they belong, that is, that all mankind should think as they do. I have only one more remark to make, and that is in respect to the second section of the proposed act. I understand that my distinguished friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] who certainly is as competent to speak upon legal questions involved in that section, as any other gentleman in this body, has already expressed his view upon the subject. I did not have the pleasure of hearing his remarks, and therefore, I do not propose to discuss the subject, but to pass it by with one or two observations. It proposes to organize in the fundamental law of the State, the law of charitable uses, devises and bequests. I have read the section carefully through. It has been my vocation for many years to pass upon the interpretation of language embodied in provisions of this nature, in our laws, and I speak of the language here employed with something of the same confidence which a mechanic feels in respect to the use of his tools. I say, in the first place, that this provision is one which belongs legitimately to the Legislature, and that if I were sitting as a legislator, and were called to consider this section and to adopt it as the law, I should not, though it might be changed the following year, be willing to vote for it. I should have so much doubt and uncertainty, in regard to the practical operation of the provision, that I should not be willing to assent to its enactment for a single year. If that be the effect upon my mind in reading this provision, and I have read it carefully over several times, what view must I take when it is delibrately proposed in the Convention to enact it in the fundamental law of the State, and make it a permanent and unchangeable provision for a period of twenty years—that whatever be its operation or effect, to put it out of the power of the Legislature to make any change or alteration in it. I will not go over this provision. Gentlemen can read the section for themselves, and they will find that the power given to this board to control charitable uses is of a most extraordinary nature, leaving it to the discretion of the board to determine whether an individual should dispose of his property in the way in which he wishes to do or not. But apart from all other considerations of its practical effect, it involves in addition to that, what is also objectionable under our form of government, the extraordinary powers given to a board in the matter involving the property of individuals which may embrace millions of dollars. In respect to this provision, I consider it highly objectionable, and in respect to the other proposition, which creates a distinction in the bestowal of the bounty of the State, I cannot recognise any institution as well organized or carried on in which there is not something connected with the worship of Almighty God, for the benefit of those who are instructed in, or who are kept in it for any purpose. And I cannot therefore but regard a prohibitory provision of this kind as exceedingly unwise in its conception, and as one that is impracticable, or else unjust or arbitrary in its operation.

The question was then put on the motion to strike out the first section, and it was declared carried.

The CHAIRMAN—The Secretary will proceed to read the second section.

Mr. DEVELIN—After the expression of the opinion of the Convention which has just been had on the subject, I think I am justified in moving that the committee do now rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I make the motion with the intention of opposing the granting of leave when the matter shall come up in Convention.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Develin, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the President pro tem. Mr. ALVORD, assumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. OPDYKE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under considaration the report of the Committee on Charity and Charitable institutions; had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith had instructed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention, and asked leave to sit again.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. announced the pending question to be on granting leave.

Mr. COMSTOCK—For the reasons which I had the honor of stating yesterday, and which have been much better stated by other gentlemen, I hope the leave requested will be refused.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I certainly shall be content to abide by whatever may be the judgement of the Convention in the disposition of this important subject. My own views have been so fully expressed in Committee of the Whole that I do not propose to repeat them now that we are in Convention. I think that what has been said by those who opposed the report, demonstrates at least this fact, and especially upon the admission of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin], that a large amount of money is appropriated in consequence of what is called mutual understandings by gentlemen representing certain institutions and those favoring others. He has admitted here directly that he voted $5,000 for what he regards as a sectarian institution because gentlemen on the other side had voted many thousand dollars in support of institutions in which he felt a religious personal interest. Now sir, the effect of a board of charites is to prevent just such malign and injudicious legislation as this. The intent and purpose is to save the public money; and the effect will be, if this section is adopted, to save large amounts of the public money. Sir, it has been said (and upon that I wish to make a single remark), that the language of the first section of the article which the Committee of the Whole have voted down, allowed visitations to religious institutions, such as the Sisters of Charity and those of a kindred character. Sir, in my judgment, the language of this section is incapable of any such interpretation. The subject was before the committee where it was discussed at great length and considered directly with reference to this view: and it was the unanimous judgment of the committee that it was not in the power of the board of charities to visit religious institutions like those of the Sisters of Mercy or any of a kindred character. I will not detain the Convention further. All I ask in the discharge of my duty here, and I trust there is a quorum present that there may be no delay of business, is that the yeas and nays may be taken upon the report of the Committee of the Whole, made to the Convention by its chairman [Mr. Opdyke].

Mr. VAN COTT—May I ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] a question? I understood him to say in reference to the construction of this section, that it was intention of the committee that the Sisters of Charity should not be subject to visitation. I would ask him if it was also the intention of the committee that the Legislature should be prohibited from granting aid to the Sistors of Charity. I call his attention to the identity of the language of the two sections. The first section excepts from visitation religious organizations of a sectarian character. The third section excepts from the bounty of the State institutions which are religious or sectarian in their character. I suppose that these terms are to receive the same construction in each sentence. If you exclude one from visitation you exclude the other from legislative aid. If you include the Sisters of Charity in the provision for visitation you include them in the legislative grant. I wish to know what construction the committee give to the terms used in the two sections,

Mr. E. BROOKS—If I had been fortunate enough during my remarks yesterday to have had the attention of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] he would have heard me say more than once, that it was my intention to move to strike out from the third section, the ninth, tenth and eleventh lines, because they were entirely inconsistent with the views I had presented as chairman of the committee, and because, as I stated yesterday, these several lines were inserted under an impression made upon the committee and by the memorials to which such reference has been made to-day. Therefore, if the Committee of the Whole had thought proper to have gone on with this article to its conclusion, undoubtedly it would have been the sense of the majority to have these lines stricken out.

Mr. VAN COTT—Then I understand the gentleman [Mr. E. Brooks] that he is in favor of excluding these sectarian institutions from the power of visitation, and that he is in favor of granting them public moneys; in other words, those institutions which have no sectarian character and which do not specially need visitation shall be subject to visitation, and those institutions which are sectarian, to which public grants are made, and which specially require to be carefully looked after, shall not be visited. I understand that to be the scheme of the committee as the gentleman interprets it.

Mr. E. BROOKS—In regard to my own views on this subject, I have said again and again that, as a member of this Convention and as a citizen, I would never discriminate between those of one religious denomination or another; and upon this matter of visitation I will say that if I belonged to any sect, and was interested in any charity whatever in the State, I would not object to its visitation by a committee of the Legislature—nay, I would invite it and court it, and lay the institution as open as the day to public and private scrutiny, believing that I should be doing a private and public benefit by an act of that character. The committee were careful in their judgment that they would pay a proper respect to those who held different opinions, by declaring that institutions religious in their character and organization, like the Sisters of Charity, should not be subject to this visitation.

Mr. FOLGER—The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] used a phrase, in substance this:

that this article was proposed to prevent a reckless and wasteful expenditure of the public moneys by the Legislature. I take it, he has not used a phrase so defamatory of the members of the last Legislature without having the facts at hand to justify it. I desire the gentleman to point out in the charity bill of last year an instance of a reckless and wasteful appropriation of money.

Mr. E. BROOKS—In reply to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], I think I can refer to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] in illustration. He stated that he voted to give $5,000 to the Young Men's Christian association in the city of New York, because large appropriations of money had been made to institutions where the Catholic faith was professed. My friend from Ontario has been too long a member of the Legislature, and has had too much experience in it, not to know that these combinations exist at every session, in which the understanding is that if a member will vote to make an appropriation for one locality an appropriation shall be made for his locality. Sir, the laws of 1857, in the very diversity of the appropriations, and the laws of 1866 and 1867, and the journals containing the debates of the proceedings prove what I have said to be the fact. Sir, human nature will have to be something less than human nature unless this is true. I think this is the experience of every body, that appropriations are made in one locality, under a mutual understanding that the representative of that locality shall vote for a similar appropriation elsewhere.

Mr. FOLGER—The gentleman answers me entirely in generalities. I requested him to put his finger on any item in the charity bill of last year which was a reckless and wasteful appropriation of the public moneys. By a wasteful appropriation I understand money given for no good purpose—money ostensibly appropriated for a charitable purpose which has been donated in fact to a purpose not beneficent, or has been given in large excess of the needs of a beneficent purpose. If the gentleman knows of such an item in the charity bill of last year, he will do me a favor if he will point it out.

Mr. E. BROOKS—There is an entire difference between the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] and myself as to what is a proper appropriation. I grant that this money may be very properly expended as to charity. But I say that it is not a just appropriation in reference to the taxation of the State. This is the point I make. Sir, there is in my own county an interesting institution, and one deserving perhaps of public aid. It is intended to benefit a certain class of children, and it is precisely one of those claims which I think ought to be supported from private rather than public charity. The argument of the gentleman who represented the county of Richmond was that, having made appropriations for other parts of the State for children, it was but fair that the county of Richmond should receive its proportion of the public money for their institution. The argument was irresistible.

Mr. FOLGER—Then the gentleman concedes that he cannot point to any item in the charity bill of last year where the money was wastefully expended?

Mr. E. BROOKS—I do not concede any such thing.

Mr. FOLGER—Then he will gratify me by pointing it out.

Mr COMSTOCK—I rise to a point of order, that the discussion is not germane to the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. DUGANNE—In the Committee of the Whole I felt called upon to support the report of the Committee on Charities as presented. At that time I was not aware that there was any understanding that the report was not to be a genuine report but merely a Pickwickian one. I did not suppose that there was any tacit understanding by the committee that the report should be amended by the chairman or by any other member of the Convention after it was submitted. I looked upon it as having been submitted in good faith. I supposed that the clause prohibiting donations to organizations for sectarian purposes was inserted in good faith, and that it was to be supported by the chairman and the other members of the committee. Therefore, in good faith, I announced my determination to sustain the report. It seems, however, that I have been mistaken; that there was an ulterior motive in the minds of the members of the committee in the presentation of this report. I am at a loss to understand the attitude of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], who, while admitting and deprecating the combinations in the Legislature by which one sectarian denomination is supported in order that another—

Mr. HALE—I rise to a point of order. The question before the Convention is simply upon the granting leave to the Committee of the Whole to sit again in the consideration of the report. The gentleman [Mr. Duganne] has, so far, been discussing the merits of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The Chair decides that the point of order is well taken. The gentleman will confine himself to the proposition.

Mr. DUGANNE—I was endeavoring to explain the reasons which would govern me in my vote, and I found it necessary, in order to do this, to recur to what had already transpired. I said I was at a loss to understand why the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] should deprecate these circumstances, and at the same time announce his intention to move to strike out from the report—

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The attention of the gentleman has been called to the fact that he is not speaking to the pending question. He will please proceed in order.

Mr. DUGANNE—Very well, Mr. President. I am opposed to granting leave to sit again, and I rose to explain the vote I should give on that question. I do that, because in Committee of the Whole I defended the report of the Committee on Charities. I have changed my views on hearing a determination, announced by the chairman of the committee [Mr. E. Brooks], to change the report from what it was when presented.

A sufficient number seconding the call of Mr.

E. Brooks for the ayes and noes, they were ordered.

The SECRETARY then proceeded with the call of the roll on granting leave, pending which it became apparent that there was no quorum present.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to make a motion which will relieve the Convention of its dilemma. I ask consent to make a motion that the report be laid on the table.

There being no objection, the question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared carried.

A DELEGATE—There was no quorum voting.

Mr. E. BROOKS—It is not necessary to raise that question.

Mr. DEVELIN—Does the motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] carry the question on granting leave to sit again with it?

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—It carries the whole matter with it.

The PRESIDENT resumed the chair and announced the next business in order, the report of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature as amended in Committee of the Whole, being printed document No. 136.

Mr. WALES—I think we have gone nearly through with that article in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is not aware that that report has ever been considered in Convention.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the first section, as follows:

SEC. 1. The Governor may call special sessions of the Legislature by proclamation, in which shall be stated the particular object or objects for which they are so called, and no business shall be transacted at any such special session, except such as shall be stated in the proclamation calling the same.

There being no amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the second section as follows:

SEC. 2. For any speech or debate, in either houses of the Legislature, the members shall not be questioned in any other place.

Mr. LAPHAM—I move to strike out the word "houses" in the first line, and insert the word "house."

There being no objection the amendment was made.

There being no further amendment offered to the section the SECRETARY read the third section as follows:

SEC. 3. Any bill may originate in either house of the Legislature, and all bills passed by one house may be amended by the other.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "Legislature" in the second line, the words "except appropriation bills, which shall originate in the House of Assembly."

Mr. ALVORD—I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] that he had better change the language of his amendment a little by making it "all bills appropriating the public moneys," etc.

Mr. DEVELIN — I accept the amendment. The reason I offer the amendment is that it accords with the usage of all popular governments which requires that all appropriation bills shall originate in the house which immediately represents the people. The usage in Congress, in the Legislature, and in all popular governments, is that such bills shall originate with the body that comes directly from the people—the members of which were elected at the election immediately preceding the session of the Legislature.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Develin, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 26 ayes, the noes not being counted.

Mr. SEAVER—I move to amend by striking out the words "all bills," in the second line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any bill."

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Seaver, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the fourth section as follows:

SEC. 4. The enacting clause of all bills shall be, "The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows," and no law shall be enacted except by bill.

There being no amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the fifth section as follows:

SEC. 5. No bill shall be passed unless by the assent of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the Legislature; and the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon its last reading, and the yeas and nays entered on the journal.

There being no amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the sixth section as follows:

SEC. 6. No law shall embrace more than one subject, and the matters necessarily connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in the title.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I think there is a typographical error. I suppose the word "the" at the end of the first line should be omitted. The words "the matters" would imply that there were some specific matters well known, connected with every subject.

There being no objection, the amendment suggested by Mr. Robertson was ordered.

Mr. LAPHAM—I move to strike out the words "and matters necessarily connected therewith," so that it will read "no law shall embrace more than one subject, which subject shall be embraced in its title," etc.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Lapham, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendment offered to the sixth section, the SECRETARY read the seventh section as follows:

SEC 7. No law shall be revised, altered or amended by reference to its title only, but the act revised, or the section or sections thereof altered or amended, shall be re-enacted and published at length, and the act so revised, or the part or parts thereof so altered or amended, shall be repealed.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out the whole of line five, and so much of line four as begins at the word "length." I do not see the neccsity of repealing the former act. Whatever in the former act is inconsistent with the new act, amendatory or altering the old, of course falls. Whatever is not inconsistent, of course, ought to stand.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would suggest the insertion of the word "as" in the third line. As it reads now it would imply that the section or sections should be republished exactly as originally passed. I wish it to read, "the section or sections thereof, as altered or amended, etc."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Robertson, and it was declared carried.

No further amendment being offered, the SECRETARY then proceeded to read section 8, as follows:

"On the day of its final adjournment, the Legislature shall adjourn at twelve o'clock, at noon.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to strike out this section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord to strike out, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] was lost.

Objection was made to the immediate consideration of the motion.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion lies on the table, under the rule.

The SECRETARY then proceeded to read section 9, as follows:

"The Legislature shall not audit, or allow any private claim or account against the State, or pass any special law in relation thereto, but may appropriate money to pay such claims as shall have been audited and allowed according to law."

Mr. FOLGER—Without making a motion, I would like to ask some one who has this article in charge what the force and effect will be of the words "or pass any special law in relation thereto." Very frequently it is necessary to pass laws relative to claims for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon some board to hear them. It is known to every gentleman in the Convention that the State is not capable of being sued; and it has upon its own motion to create a tribunal before claims against it can be heard. Any citizen of the State may have a claim against the State, and I do not see where he is to find any tribunal, unless there is some law passed to give him a tribunal.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—In the next section.

Mr. FOLGER—This section denies the special law; but if it is the construction of the language that general laws are to be passed to cover every conceivable claim, I have nothing more to say

No amendment being offered, the SECRETARY then proceeded to read section 10 as follows:

SEC. 10. There shall be a court of claims, to consist of three judges, to be appointed on the nomination of the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in which court shall be adjudicated all such claims against the State as the Legislature shall from time to time, by general laws direct. Such claims shall be tried without a jury, but the facts found by the court on the proofs shall be stated in each adjudication. In all cases where such claims shall amount to five hundred dollars or more, and be for the value or damages to real estate, the judges of said court shall, and in all other cases may, view the property in question, and in deciding thereon shall consider their own estimate of such value or damages in connection with the evidence in the case. In all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State. The statute of limitations shall prevail in favor of the State the same as in favor of individuals. The jurisdiction of such court shall be exclusive, and its decisions may be reviewed on the law on appeal to the court of appeals. The judges of said court shall hold their offices for the term of five years, unless sooner removed according to law, and shall severally receive at stated times for their services a compensation to be established by law, which shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office.

Mr. ALVORD—There is an inconsistency in one of the provisions of this section, with the work which we have already done in this Convention. If gentlemen will turn to document No. 153, they will find that in that document, in section 4, the statute of limitation which was against parties, is for two years; but here, by a general and broad enactment they propose to have a statute of limitation extended to six years. I move sir, an amendment, to make this conform to what has already been passed upon by the Convention. We have passed in the canal report the following provision:

No claim for damages growing out of the maintenance of the canals and feeders connected therewith, shall be heard or allowed, except the same shall be made within two years after the claim shall arise, unless the party claimant shall be under legal disability, and in such case the claim shall be made within two years after the removal of such disability.

The PRESIDENT—Will the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], please reduce his amendment to writing and forward it to the Secretary.

Mr. ALVORD—The idea that struck me was, that this being general in its terms did not cover this special case. I may be mistaken. "Except as otherwise provided by this Constitution," is suggested. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT—At what point will the gentleman insert those words?

Mr. ALVORD—After the word "individuals" in the eighteenth line,

Mr. ROBERTSON—I propose an amendment which I think will cover the same ground and will be more explicit. It says "the statute of limitation." I would propose to change that language, so as to read "the same statutes of limitation shall prevail, in favor of the State as in favor of individuals." There is no one statute of limitation. Statutes of limitation are of various duration; and it should be "the same statutes of limitation shall prevail in favor of the State as in favor of individuals" I offer that as an amendment. I have another suggestion to make, which perhaps is better yet. "The law of limitation shall prevail in favor of the State in the same cases as in favor of individuals." Will that meet the view of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott]? I offer this as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

Mr. MURPHY—I do not think that meets the objection raised by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. This would have reference to statutes.

Mr. ROBERTSON—It is the law, and the Constitution is the highest law of the State. If there is any doubt about it I will put in, "the law of limitation either by force of the Constitution or of statutes." I am only anxious to make it explicit and cover all the cases.

Mr. MURPHY—I should prefer the words before stated.

Mr. ALVORD—I have very grave doubts whether the proposition of my friend from New York [Mr. Robertson] will meet the case which I have undertaken to meet by my amendment. We have put in an explicit direction here that so far as the Legislature is concerned they shall not recognize any claim growing out of damages upon the canals after two years shall elapse; and it strikes me that unless that provision which I have suggested is put in, there will be great doubts whether this sweeping general clause will not do away with that particular enactment of the Constitution. I trust, therefore, that the proposition which I have made will not be considered as put out of the way by the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson].

Mr. RUMSEY—I have the impression that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is entirely mistaken in his view of this section. The statute of limitation, which is prescribed in the section he referred to of two years, will necessarily have full force and effect, and this section will apply only to such other claims against the State as are not included in the section referred to by him. It seems to me there can be no doubt about that being a fair construction, and that this provision as it stands now is entirely right.

Mr. ALVORD—I hope that when we make this Constitution and it shall have received, as I trust it will, the approbation of the people, there will be no doubt in regard to its construction. It is just as well now to determine a question of that kind by plain, explicit, unequivocal language, as it is to leave it in any sort of doubt.

Mr. VAN COTT—There are two limitations; the one, the limitation in the Constitution; the other, the limitation by statute. This provision simply is, that the statute of limitation shall be available to the State as it is to the people. Of course the constitutional limitation will also be available. There is no conflict whatever—no incongruity about it.

Mr. POND—I am opposed to any amendment that shall provide a statute of limitation in favor of the State—a shorter limitation than what applies between individuals; and I am opposed to the limitation in the section referred to by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], that the State may take a man's land—if it applies to such a case, and I think it does—who does not reside in the State, and may not know it for four years, or five years, and cut off his right for damages for that taking of his property, unless he makes the claim in two years. I say it is a monstrous proposition, that the State shall avail itself of the two years' limitation against its citizens while the citizen, as against another, has six years to enforce his claim. There is no reason for limiting the claim made by a citizen against the State to two years—none whatever that does not apply as against every citizen of the State.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Does he not know that now the statute of limitations, so far as the State is concerned, is one year, and that this enlarges it.

Mr. POND—No, sir; I do not know any such thing.

Mr. ALVORD—If the gentleman will read the laws he will find it so.

Mr. POND—There is no limitation on the power of the Legislature to entertain a claim in favor of an individual against the State; but this Constitution takes all power away from the Legislature and confers it upon no other tribunal; and the amount of it is, there will be an iron constitutional rule adopted, cutting off all claims against the State that run two years. I say the proposition is monstrous upon the face of it.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. My point of order is this, sir—that this question, so far as it regards this two years' limitation, has already been passed by this Convention, and is not now up for discussion.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is not aware of that fact.

Mr. ALVORD—The two years' limitation is in the canal article, which has been passed by the Convention.

Mr. POND—If the gentleman is satisfied with that, why does he make the motion to amend this?

The PRESIDENT—Does the gentleman mean in another article—a distinct article?

Mr. ALVORD—Yes, sir; a distinct article.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not think the point of order well taken.

Mr. ALVORD—My point of order is that the gentleman is now undertaking to discuss the principle of that two years' limitation in an article which is not before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—That point of order is well taken.

Mr. POND—Then I propose to discuss the propriety of its insertion in this article, which the gentleman's amendment proposes.

The PRESIDENT—In which the gentleman will be in order.

Digitized by Google

Mr. POND—In order to do that, I suppose it is only necessary to show that it is an abomination in the other article, or in any article; and I do say—and I hope it will be proper to say so until this Convention finally adjourns—that to put an iron rule into the Constitution saying that no inhabitant of this State shall have a claim allowed, or shall be allowed to prefer a claim against this State for property taken, unless he does it in two years, whether he knows of it or not, is an abomination; and a Convention to revise the Constitution of the State, it seems to me, ought not to insert any such article in it. I therefore oppose any change in the language of this section, and insist upon it it is right as it is here; and it is within the power and competency of this Convention to regulate that other section that has it in, limiting all claims in any class of cases, I care not what they are, on the part of the citizen against the State, to two years.

Here the gavel fell, the speaker's time having expired.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the substitute offered by Mr. Robertson for the original proposition of Mr. Alvord.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

"To strike out the sentence contained in the seventeenth and eighteeth lines and insert as follows:

"The law of limitation, either under this Constitution or by statute, shall prevail in favor of the State in the same cases as in favor of individuals."

The question was put upon the substitute offered by Mr. Robertson, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord.

Mr. KRUM—I think that by making the word "statute" "statutes" in line seventeen, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson], will remedy this whole difficulty. In my opinion, as has well been suggested by Mr. Van Cott, the constitutional enactment of two years with reference to claims for canal damages against the State already adopted stands in perfect harmony with the section of the Constitution under consideration. The one relates to canal damages and the other to the statute law as passed by the Legislature. Now if we make the word "statute" "statutes" we remedy the whole difficulty, and I move that as an amendment.

Mr. RUMSEY—I think the word "statutes" is in the original report.

Mr. FOLGER—The word "statutes" would not include all the limitations known to the law. Every lawyer knows there is a recognized doctrine in the courts of equity, which is called the doctrine of "stale demands." That would not apply, if the word "statutes" was used, and I suppose the intention of the framers of this article was to apply all limitations.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would suggest that the words "laws of limitation" be used in place of the words "statutes of limitations." This would embrace both statute and common law.

Mr. KRUM accepted that modification of his amendment.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Krum, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord, as amended, to insert in the eighteenth line after the word "individuals," the words "except as otherwise provided in this Constitution.

Mr. POND—I move, as a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], to insert the words "and not otherwise," so that it will read, "the laws of limitation shall prevail in favor of the State the same as in favor of individuals, and not otherwise."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Pond, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Alvord, as amended, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I would ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], when he deems that the statute of limitations will begin to run, as provided by this Constitution?

Mr. RUMSEY—Precisely as in other cases. The courts have held that statutes of limitations do not have a retroactive effect.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question of the Chair? Does the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] carry with it the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

The PRESIDENT—That was adopted.

Mr. CHESEBRO—It was adopted as an amendment to an amendment which was lost. I inquire whether the vote on the amendment carried with it the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

Mr. COMSTOCK—It all went down together.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is right in his statement.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move that in place of the words "statutes of limitations," the words "laws of limitation" be used, that amendment having fallen with the amendment of my colleague from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

The PRESIDENT—The amendment formerly offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], was an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], his colleague, which was lost, carrying down his amendment, and it is now offered as an original proposition.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move to amend by inserting after the word "State," in the seventeenth line, these words, "and where the adjudication shall be against such claims or any part thereof, the same shall not be again considered by said court, unless the court of appeals shall order a new trial."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Develin, and it was declared lost.

Mr. LAPHAM—I will now renew my motion to strike out the words "increased or" in the twenty-fourth line. I do this, Mr. President, to make this section harmonize with the article on the judiciary in this respect. The provision in regard to judicial officers is that the salaries shall not be diminished during their term of office, but there is no prohibition against increasing them if there should be a necessity requiring it. The officers named in this section are to perform duties entirely judicial in their character, and the same reasons for leaving the Legislature at liberty to increase the salary, applies to them as to the judges.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SPENCER—I move to strike out the paragraph relating to the statute of limitation. It seems to me that it will be entirely ineffectual. It provides that the law in relation to limitation shall be the same in favor of the State as in favor of individuals. There are no laws in regard to limitation which can apply to the State. The laws of limitation, the statutes of limitation, are enacted in regard to certain classes of actions. There is, and there can be, no such thing as an action against the State, and, therefore, when the courts come to apply, or undertake to apply, this provision of the Constitution to claims which may be made against the State, which are not actions or any thing like actions, it will be found that its operation cannot be made available.

Mr. HALE—I wish to suggest whether the retention of this paragraph would not make the existing statute of limitations in all cases govern claims against the State; whether in case of any change in the general statute of limitations the change would apply to claims against the State. It seems to me, with deference to gentlemen who think otherwise, that it would fix, as applicable to the claims against the State, all the statutes of limitation which may exist at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The language is "the laws of limitation." Perhaps if the word "the" was not there, the construction would be different, but as the language now is, it seems to me that there is an objection to it.

Mr. MERRITT—If this statute of limitation is intended to cut off the application for claims for damages on any account whatever, I am opposed to striking it out. A mere statutory provision against the allowance of claims for certain debts amounts to nothing, as the past experience of our Legislature shows, because what one Legislature may prescribe with reference to claims to be presented may be repealed at any time; and the difficulty growing up under this system of allowance of claims arising at an anterior date is that they are presented in such a way as to avoid that careful scrutiny and examination which would occur if they were presented within a reasonable time; and it is fair to assume that claimants having a just and reasonable claim against the State will have sufficient interest in it to present it within a reasonable time; and I suppose that six years will be a reasonable time. I hope this will be retained, therefore, and not stricken out. If there is any question as to affecting other laws or other classes of limitation, that may perhaps be modified, but this feature should be retained, that no claim should be allowed after it has run a reasonable length of time.

Mr. GRAVES—Would not the same object be obtained if the seventeenth and eighteenth lines were stricken out, and if from the thirteenth line the section read: "In all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State?" Would not that allow the statute of limitations to operate between the State and individuals as it now does? Would it not be well to strike this out?

Mr. MERRITT—The State, standing in a different relation from ordinary parties to be sued, it seems to me if there is any doubt about it at all that it would be safe to have the clause in.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—In the present condition of the work of this Convention, I hope this provision will not be stricken out. It may be proper, as indicating the shape that our work ought to assume, and to say that we have properly provided that persons having claims growing out of canal injuries shall have no relief unless those claims are presented within two years. It seems to me we should be in a very awkward position to say that persons having claims of that character should not be heard, no matter what the circumstances were—whether a man was absent in Europe for a period of years, whether a man was confined to his bed by sickness, whether a man was in a lunatic asylum, whether a man was a minor when the claim arose—to say that he should have no opportunity to be heard after two years; but if he had a claim against the State of any other nature under heaven, he may present it forever. I will not speak ill of any work which this Convention has accomplished; but I do not believe that the members of this Convention, after this Constitution shall go into effect, will have any particular occasion to feel proud of that two years' provision, and I think we shall feel very much worse if it could be thrown into our faces by persons who had sustained injuries along the line of the canal, and who had been cut off by the accident that the claim had run two years, from obtaining redress, that we, after enacting that provision, deliberately sat down and provided that any other claim might be presented forever.

Mr. GRAVES—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must remind the gentleman that he has spoken once on this question.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Spencer to strike out, it was declared lost.

Mr. OPDYKE—I move to amend by striking out a portion of the fourth line, and the whole of the fifth, so that the close of the sentence shall read as follows: "in which court shall be adjudicated all claims against the State." The words I propose to strike out provide that the court shall adjudicate "all such claims against the State as the Legislature shall from time to time, by general laws, direct." I hold that this section is intended to transfer claimants from the Legislature to this court, which it proposes to create. In doing that I suppose it is intended that it shall adjudicate all the claims grounded in justice or equity against the State. I want to know what general law the Legislature could pass in reference to such claims, other than to say that all claims grounded in equity or justice should be adjudicated by this court. If they said any thing less than that, they would discriminate; it would be invidious; it would place some claimants on a better basis, and others on a worse. We certainly do not desire that any thing of that kind shall take place. What we desire is that all just or equitable claims shall come before this court, which is to decide whether they are grounded in justice and to determine their amount. If we leave the section as it stands it may compel claimants to go to the Legislature as well as to the court. I presume the court is intended to relieve the Legislature, and to relieve claimants from going there at all, and to send them to this court, where justice will be administered to them. It was moved in committee to strike out this clause, and debated; and I am satisfied that a large majority of the committee were prepared to adopt it; but as it was reached late in the evening its importance, I think, was overlooked. I hope, it will now, be stricken out.

Mr. BELL—I do not understand this provision as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] does. I understand it to provide that the Legislature may, by general laws, from time, to time prescribe the mode and manner by which these claims are to be brought before this court. I see no provision in the article itself by which the claims can be brought before the court. It is left to the Legislature to prescribe such forms, as in their judgment they may think best, and that from time to time. It seems to me it is important that this clause should be retained.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I do not understand the language as the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] does. I would propose an amendment, if it is in order, to meet his views, so as to read as follows: "all such claims against the State, in such manner as the Legislature shall from time to time, by general laws direct." I understand the language now to refer to the claims, and not to the manner in which they should come before the court. That will allow the Legislature to provide the manner in which the claims shall be brought before the court; but give the court jurisdiction over all claims.

Mr. RUMSEY—The section itself, I think, provides all that is necessary and all that is contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke]. It declares the manner in which the court shall proceed, that it should be according to the custom of the common law. The reason why this language was used in describing the several cases which should be sent to this court, was that it was exceedingly difficult to find language to include every imaginable case which ought to be there disposed of. Any enumeration of claims, individually or by classes prescribed in the Constitution and directed to be sent there, would seem to exclude all other claims not so enumerated, and this construction would practically defeat the object of the committee which was to provide a tribunal for the disposition of every disputed claim against the State. Gentlemen will remember this question was discussed in committee, and this language was approved of then, expressly for the reason, that if any case should arise that was by any chance not provided for by the Constitution the Legislature might include that particular claim in a general law, and let it go before this court. I think the language of the section is right, and will be found to cover every imaginable class of cases. We must conclude that the Legislature will do something that is right, and that it will, in passing a general law under this section, so do it that every claimant may have a chance to seek his remedy in this court.

Mr. DALY—With regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], the gentleman will perceive that in the subsequent provision of the section it was a matter of discretion that "in all other respects the court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State;" and this provision embraces all that is comprehended by inserting the words "in such manner." It embraces the mode of procedure according to the course and practice of the common law as it is modified under the statutes of this State."

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I only offered my amendment to meet the views of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] to obviate the difficulty. I have no intention of pressing it, and will withdraw it on the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly].

Mr. KRUM—I move to amend by striking out the word "such," in the fourth line.

The PRESIDENT—That is a part of the amendment now pending.

Mr. KRUM—I would inquire, does not the amendment include any thing more than that?

The PRESIDENT—It does.

The amendment was then read by the SECRETARY.

Mr. LAPHAM—I ask for a division, so that the question may be taken separately on striking out the word "such."

The PRESIDENT—The division will be made.

Mr. KRUM—I think by striking out the word "such" we remedy the whole evil without striking out the balance. It now reads, "in which court shall be adjudicated all such claims against the State as the Legislature shall from time to time, by general laws direct." The word "such" leaves it to the Legislature to determine what claims shall be adjudicated, while by striking it out the Legislature are compelled to provide for the adjudication of all claims against the State. If the balance is stricken out, as proposed, it will leave the Legislature to determine the manner of getting the claim before the court while if the word "such" is stricken out it will compel all claims to be adjudicated by the court.

Mr. OPDYKE—I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum].

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. Opdyke as thus modified, it was declared carried.

Mr. FULLERTON—Mr. President, I offer the following amendment:

Mr. KRUM—There seems to be some question as to the result of this vote. I would like to inquire fo the President how the section is now left.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—The Convention adopted the amendment originally proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], with the exception of the word "such," which was omitted.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—No! no! that was stricken out.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair states it erroneously. That was stricken out; and the rest of the clause originally proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] to be stricken out, was retained. It will be read by the Secretary as amended.

The SECRETARY—As it was adopted by the Convention the word "such" was stricken out of the fourth line.

Mr. CHESEBRO—There is a misunderstanding here now, as to what is the effect of this vote on Mr. Opdyke's amendment. As I understand it, his amendment is adopted by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The vote was upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], with the amendment accepted by him.

The SECRETARY read that portion of the section as amended, as follows:

SEC. 10. There shall be a court of claims, to consist of three judges, to be appointed on the nomination of the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in which court shall be adjudicated all claims against the State, as the Legislature shall from time to time, by general laws direct.

Mr. FULLERTON—I move to strike out all after the word "law," in the twenty-fourth line. I cannot understand the force of the reasoning which argues in favor of the idea that the Legislature shall have the the power to increase the pay of these officers during their continuance in office, and shall not have power to diminish it. If I understand the argument, it is simply this—the change in the times has been such as to require that this pay should be increased during the continuance of these officers in office. There may be much force in that argument. But the other argument is equally forcible—that the change in the times may make it very proper that this compensation should be reduced. Now, I would take from the power of the Legislature the right either to increase or diminish the pay, or I would confer the right on the Legislature to do either, as it may seem to them proper.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Fullerton to strike out the last clause of the section, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SPENCER—I move to strike out all from and including line six down to and including the word "State," in line seventeen, for the reason that the matter embraced is legislation. It is not the proper business of this Convention, but a proper subject of legislation. Besides this, it prescribes rules which may be found entirely impracticable. It may be that the gentlemen who drew this section can explain what is meant by the provisions of the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and part of the seventeenth lines. I confess that with all my acumen—though it is not great, to be sure—I am not able to understand it. "In all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State." Now, I would like to know if, in controversies between the State and its citizens upon claims against the State, the course and practice of the common law has ever been adopted.

Mr. DALY—I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the portion of the section he now proposes to strike out, was the subject of deliberate discussion by the committee for an entire evening, in which the views of gentlemen were fully expressed on this particular provision; and it was adopted after mature consideration and great deliberation. Very possibly the gentleman was not present, and may not therefore have heard the reasons assigned by the various gentlemen who spoke on the several propositions for amending this part of the section.

The amendment offered by Mr. Spencer was read by the SECRETARY as follows:

To strike out from line six to line seventeen, as follows:

"Such claims shall be tried without a jury, but the facts found by the court on the proofs shall be stated in each adjudication. In all cases where such claims shall amount to five hundred dollars or more, and be for the value of, or damages to real estate, the judges of said court shall, and in all other cases may, view the property in question, and in deciding thereon shall consider their own estimate of such value or damages in connection with the evidence in the case. In all other respects such courts shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law, as modified by the statutes of this State."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—As there seems to have been some misapprehension about the amendment originally offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], I will now move the further amendment to strike out in the fourth line, after the word "State," down to and including the word "direct," being the words "as the Legislature shall from time to time, by general laws direct."

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Livingston, and it was declared lost.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I propose a verbal amendment in the third line, which has been adopted by the Committee on Revision, in all such cases, and that is to strike out the word "advice," so that it will read, "on the nomination of the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate."

The amendment was made.

Mr. POND—I propose to amend by striking out after the word "judges" in the second line, down to the word "Senate."

The PRESIDENT—The amendment is not ger-

Digitized by Google

mane to that of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared carried.

Mr. POND—I now move to strike out after the word "judges" in the second line down to the word "Senate" in the third line, and inserting "to be elected by the people," and on that I ask the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Pond, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BAKER—I move to strike out the word "its" in the fourteenth line, and insert in place thereof "in the trial of causes and"; strike out "the" in fourteenth line, also strike out all after the word "rules" in fourteenth line down to and including the word "citizens" in fifteenth line, and insert in place thereof the following words: "of evidence."

As the section now stand it provides that "in all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens." The question has been asked by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] what that clause meant, and the gentleman who professed to answer it has not given an intelligent answer to it. I am not aware of any rules of evidence that have been established between the State and the citizen, or any rules of proceeding. I suppose the intention of the framers of the section was that these trials shall be governed by ordinary rules of evidence as in other courts between citizen and citizen. If amended as proposed, it will read:

"In all other respects such court shall be governed in the trial of causes and adjudications by legal rules of evidence according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State."

Mr. DALY—I will state to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Baker], with regard to his suggestion, that I rose to answer the question of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] and did not do so, that the very portion to which he now refers was the subject of particular discussion on the evening to which I have referred. The rules of common law which prevail between the citizens of a State were particularly referred to and pointed out; and as the whole subject was gone over and discussed in Committee of the Whole, I do not feel called upon to repeat the matter here. The gentleman may not have been present during that discussion.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] what he understands to be the meaning of the provision of this section or how it was understood by the committee? "In dealings between a State and its citizens," what does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], and what did the committee understand by that provision, if he will favor us?

Mr. DALY—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman has already spoken on the question, and is debarred under the rule.

Mr. MERRITT—I wish to ask whether, as between a State and its citizens, there is not some presumption in favor of the State; whether there are not some rules which do not strictly apply as between citizens. If that is so, then this becomes very clear.

Mr. RUMSEY—The object of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] seems to be to change this from the establishment and recognition of certain principles of right, properly applicable between a State and its citizens, to a mere provision for the practice of the court on the trial causes before this court. Such was not the intention of the provision. Its object was to recognize and adopt a well settled principle which has long prevailed and which ought not to be surrendered. I apprehend that every gentleman in this Convention knows that the State, in the management of its affairs, is exempt from certain causes of action that individuals would not be exempt from. If the State—

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the PRESIDENT announced that, under the standing rule, the Convention would take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock P. M., the PRESIDENT pro tem., Mr. FOLGER, in the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. announced the pending question to be on the amendment of Mr. Baker to strike out the word "its," in the fourteenth line, and insert in place thereof the words "in the trial of causes and;" and to strike out, also in the fourteenth line, all after the word "rules" down to and including the word "citizens," in the fifteenth line, and insert in place thereof "of evidence."

Mr. VERPLANCK—Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The Chair understands that an amendment is in order.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move, as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] to strike out all after the word "case," in the thirteenth line, down to and including the word "State," in the seventeenth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The Chair is of opinion that that amendment is not now in order, it being a proposition to strike out. The Convention is first entitled to perfect before an amendment to strike out can be entertained.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Then I will renew my motion at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker].

Mr. VERPLANCK—Then let me say a word upon that subject. The section provides that the court, in addition to hearing testimony, are to view the premises, when damages to real estate are claimed, and to take into consideration their own opinion of the value of the premises, in deciding the case. In that regard the court departs from the usage of the common law, but in no other; and, therefore, if the section should be altered as indicated by the amendment I have suggested, the court would have no power to depart generally from the common law rules, but only of departing from those rules as authorized by the section; and it seems to me that it would be better to strike out the entire clause, instead of amending it as proposed by the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker].

Mr. RUMSEY—The question whether this article should be adopted or not is one that has been very fully discussed in the Convention already, and it is absolutely necessary that a provision should be adopted, provided you undertake to restrict the Legislature from acting upon all the individual private claims that come before that body. That has been done by the provision already adopted, and now, if you do not adopt this, or some other provision of the kind, you leave all this large class of claims, many of them entirely right, I believe, without any sort of remedy. This section was adopted for the express purpose of providing the only remedy left for these claimants if the other provision to which I have referred, restricting the Legislature from legislating upon private claims, is to be continued in the Constitution. The proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] to strike out this portion, and, in lieu of it, to insert something else, amounts simply to this: He proposes to make a rule of practice, instead of doing as the committee intended when they adopted this proposition, to lay down a rule of law from which that court could not and should not depart. Now, it is perfectly well understood that in adjudicating upon claims, our courts at present are at liberty to sustain a claim as between individual and individual, which would not be, and which never has been recognized as a claim between an individual and the State. If an individual makes an improvement he is responsible for all the incidental damages which follow from that improvement. If an individual has an agent who is acting for him, the individual is responsible for whatever injury results from the negligence of that agent; but the State has never held itself responsible and ought not to hold itself responsible for any such causes of action. The State has uniformly been in the habit of creating highways, or rather the highways have been constructed under the authority of the State, and then handed over practically to the officers of the towns, who thereafter have had entire control in the management of them; and of course the State has never held itself responsible and ought not to hold itself responsible for any damages resulting from those roads being out of repair, or any thing of that kind; and the State has never been held responsible by any legislative body for damages resulting from the acts of persons who have had charge of such highways or other public improvements. The improvements are made for the benefit of the whole State, and any damages that may incidentally result from any defect in the making, or any negligence in the work of those improvements, have never been held as a charge against the State. The object of this section was to impose a rule of law that should be imperative upon the courts, that hereafter they should apply precisely the same rule with regard to liability of the State which has always heretofore been recognized exempting them from actions of this kind. That is the object of this provision, but if you strike it out you leave the courts at liberty to declare the law between the State and the citizen in these claims for damages, to be precisely as it is now between individual and individual; and surely that should not be so.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RUMSEY—Certainly, sir.

Mr. VERPLANCK—What the article proposes to retain, is the legal rule, which has heretofore existed between the State and the citizen. Now, if such legal rule exist, and you omit this provision entirely, I would like to know if the courts established by this article are not bound by those legal rules.

Mr. RUMSEY—Perhaps they may be; but the committee did not intend to leave any thing in doubt upon that subject. They did not intend to force the State in this court as a defendant, and then to allow the court to declare the law between an individual and the State to be what it is between individual and individual in such cases. It is perfectly well understood that heretofore the State has not been subject to suit; but if you bring the State in and make it defendant and subject to suit, unless you make some restriction in the operation of the law upon the State, it must surely come in subject to all the rules and obligations existing by the common law between citizen and citizen. There can be no other result from striking this out, except to make the State subject to the rules of law which prevail in determining the rights of citizens in such cases, unless those rules are restricted in their operation upon the State so as to make it chargeable only with such damages as the State has been held liable for under the common law, as heretofore administered.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. RUMSEY—Yes, sir.

Mr. VERPLANCK—As you propose to guard and protect this immunity of the State, would it not be better to do it by direct language, and not use the term "legal rule" upon the subject?

Mr. RUMSEY—I have no particular partiality for the words used here. Any other words that will as well or better accomplish the purpose, will suit me as well as these; but I desire that that rule of law should be retained, provided this court is to be established at all. I think that the words that are used here do retain that rule of law, and retain it in such a way as that there can be no mistake about it; but if other words will do it better, I have no objection to adopting them.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire to amend the sixth and seventh lines as follows: Strike out of the sixth line the word "without" and insert the word "by" before the words "a jury" and add after the word "jury" these words, "when demanded by the claimant," and insert after the word "proofs" in the seventh line the words "if tried without a jury," so that the sixth and seventh lines shall read thus: "Such claims shall be tried by a jury when demanded by the claimant, but the facts found by the court, on the proofs, if tried without a jury, shall be stated in each adjudication." Sir, this Convention must be aware that the claims presented against the State are claims arising upon property taken by the State without the consent, and in most cases against the will of the claimants. This court that it is proposed to organize is to be a court organized by the State itself without the consent of the claimants, and therefore when a claim is to be adjudicated the claimant is forced to come before a tribunal which he has had no hand in forming, a tribunal appointed by the State for the purpose of serving the specific ends of the State, protecting and securing the rights of the State against the claimants that are scattered all along throughout the State. Now, it is manifestly unjust to compel a man whose property has been taken from him without his consent and against his will to go before a tribunal directed or organized by the State without his assent or knowledge, thus depriving him entirely of any choice in the selection of the tribunal that is to determine his rights and the value of his property so taken. While I concede to the State the right to take private property for public purposes, I also claim that the State itself should be just in the compensation that it awards to the individual whose property is thus taken, and a claimant whose property has been taken in this way certainly should have some right, some choice, in the tribunal that is to determine the value of that property or the amount of damage he has sustained. The Constitution of 1846, when it gave to the State the power to take property for public purposes, also determined that the right of the claimant should be decided by a jury or by three commissioners appointed by the court authorized for that purpose. Now is it right or just that the State should select its tribunal, and, against the will of the claimant, and without consulting him, say that by this mode, and this mode alone, his rights are to be determined? This tribunal may be a good tribunal but—

Mr. LAPHAM—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAVES—Yes, sir.

Mr. LAPHAM—Are not these damages now appraised by the canal appraisers, who are appointed in the same manner.

Mr. GRAVES—I believe they are, sir, but that does not show that it is just by any means. There is a manifest injustice in that tribunal; and all along the line of the canals complaints have been made by men whose property has been taken for public purposes without their consent, against the judgment and decisions of the canal appraisers. Now, while I accredit to those canal appraisers good judgment and honest intentions, I still contend that the court before which these claims are to be tried, should at least afford to the claimant himself the opportunity of being satisfied that the tribunal before which his claim is to be tried is a fair and just one, and a tribunal in part of his own selection. Why deny in these cases to the claimant the right to have his claim settled by a jury, any more than you would deny that right to the claimant in a controversy between individuals. If an individual in my neighborhood should assume to control my property, and get possession of it, and I should desire to waive my action of trespass and to bring an action of assumpsit against him, the law would permit me to try that action before such a tribunal as I pleased, before a court and jury, or before a court without a jury, just as I should choose. Now is it any more than just that an individual whose property has been taken without his consent and against his will—choice property, perhaps—should have some opportunity to have his rights determined by a tribunal of his own choice, the same as he would have in a controversy between himself and an individual neighbor. In my judgment it is no more than just. In many instances perhaps, this right might be waived, and a man might be willing that his cause should be settled by this State tribunal; but if he choose to have it tried in the ordinary manner by a court and jury, I certainly think he ought to have that right.

Mr. LAPHAM—I have heard no serious complaints made of the mode of determining these claims for damages, so far as they are within the jurisdiction of the canal appraisers. The trouble from which this State has suffered so seriously, is this—that after the canal appraisers have passed upon claims, and have rejected them, as wanting in equity and justice, appeals have been made to the legislative power of the State, and claims which had been rejected as unjust, have been, by the Legislature, authorized to be audited and allowed; and, further, claims that have been rejected by one Legislature have been authorized and allowed by a subsequent Legislature. Now, Mr. President, the object of this provision is, to substitute in the place of the canal appraisers, and in the place of the Legislature, in dealing with these cases, a tribunal to determine entirely this whole class of claims, and it is the intention of this section to prescribe, in general terms, the rules upon which these claims are to be determined, and the limits within which they are to be presented; in other words, the intention of this section is to take entirely away from the legislative power all control over this subject, and to merge in this court of claims the exercise of the functions of this kind which are now performed by the canal appraisers and by the Legislature. In addition to that, this section provides, and wisely provides, what this State has not enjoyed heretofore—it provides that every claim which is thus prosecuted shall be attended to by a solicitor in behalf of the State. One great trouble which has existed heretofore in regard to this class of claims has been that, the State has not been represented before these tribunals. Claimants have come before the Legislature with their claims well digested, their counsel having prepared their cases carefully in advance, and have thus secured a legislative act, and then have gone before the canal board or the canal appraisers in pursuance of that act, and literally taken judgment by default for the amounts of their claims. Now, the object of this provision is to close up these avenues of injustice by which the treasury of the State is annually robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars. I deem this provision of this section, as it has been reported, a wise and well guarded provision, and therefore I have opposed the proposition to strike out of the body of this section those provisions which determine to a great extent by what rules this court shall be governed in passing upon this class of claims. Now, heretofore the rule has been that the State could not be prosecuted at all. Therefore the appraisers were constituted, and therefore the right to appeal to the legislative power has been so largely exercised. The object contemplated by this provision, while it does not subject the State to prosecution in the strict sense of the term, is to place the question of the obligation of the State in such cases in the hands of a court properly constituted and governed by rules which are prescribed in the body of the Constitution itself, so as to secure justice to every class and description of claimants, to prevent the possibility of appeals for l egislative action, and to prevent the bringing up of old and stale demands which have been rejected by tribunal after tribunal, and the making of reiterated applications for relief which have already been once or more than once denied.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move an amendment in lines eight, nine and ten of this section. As the section now stands, in all cases where the claim amounts to five hundred dollars and relates to real estate—is for the value of or damages to real estate—the court must go and examine the premises. I move to strike out in lines eight and nine the word "shall" and "in all cases," so that it will read thus: "and in all cases where such claims shall be for the value of or damages to real estate the judges of said court may view the property in action." I was not present when this article was considered in Committee of the Whole, and I do not know therefore whether the point to which my amendment relates was adopted or not. It does seem to me, however, a very unsuitable and inconvenient provision to be placed in the Constitution, a provision which would make it imperative in all cases for the judges of this court to travel to view the premises in relation to which the claim was brought. Our system of internal improvements penetrates to every part and corner of the State, and as these claims will arise in every portion of the State, the effect of this provision will be to make this a rambling, traveling court. I do not think it will be found that the provision will work well as a permanent and unchangeable one. I am better satisfied to have the Constitution allow the judges to go and view the premises in all cases where real estate is affected, but I would not make it imperative upon them to do so. The thing proposed may require some legislation. The Legislature will organize this court and make such provision on this particular subject as it pleases. It will be required that the sittings of this court shall be held in convenient parts of the State, and in different places, but I feel myself opposed to an imperative provision, saying that in all cases these judges must travel and examine the premises in regard to which claims shall arise.

Mr. ALVORD—I suppose this is only for the purpose of constitutionalizing the present law upon this subject, so far, at least, as it relates to the canals. The law now requires the canal appraisers to visit in person the locality where the damage is said to have occurred, or where property has been taken, and upon that view of the premises, in conjunction with the other testimony presented, to make up their judgment. I think that, taking into consideration the fact that this has been the past practice of the State, and has eventuated, so far as the State is concerned, in its getting property at its fair value, where it has been taken for the purposes of the State, it may be well enough to retain, limited as it is here, the provision that this court must visit the premises in cases involving this amount or more; and that in cases involving less value, they may, or may not, as they think proper. It is a perambulating court, and must of necessity be so, in connection with our system of internal improvements. The practice has always been, and the law is, that the canal appraisers must go to the locus in quo, must examine into the matter on the premises, and judge and award damages from the evidence that is adduced before them in addition to that derived from their own personal observation; and it is well enough if we are going to constitutionalize this court, that we should also put upon it the same duties that now rest upon the canal appraisers, the imposition of which upon those officers, has been found to benefit the interests of the State.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move to strike out the word "legal" in the fourteenth line, and to insert the word "and" before the word "according" in the fifteenth line, so that the sentence will read "in all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State." There are no such things as legal rules upon this subject existing between the State and the citizen; nor are there any legal rules which obtain "according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State;" but if this can be amended as I have suggested, it will then read that "in all other respects the court shall be governed in its adjudications by the rules which have heretofore existed between the State and the citizen, and according to the practice of the common law, as modified by the statutes of the State," and I think that will reach the object in view.

Mr. KRUM—I would like to inquire of the gentleman who has last poken (or of any other of the gentlemen who have this subject in charge) what rules he refers to, or what rules this section refers to as "heretofore existing between the citizen and the State."

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am in considerable doubt as to what ought to be done with that clause of this section to which the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] refers after what has been told us by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham]. I am still a little afraid of requiring, by constitutional enactment, this court that we create, to act in its decisions according to the rules that have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens; for, if I understand those gentlemen correctly, and their memory con-curs with mine, there has been no conceivable claim that could be set up against the State that soonest or later has not been successful. Now the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Keum] asks what is the meaning of these words "the rules which have heretofore existed between the State and the citizen," and he gets no answer. I can only conjecture that this expression refers to the action of the Legislature in regard to these claims. If so, it seems to me that we are constitutionalizing all the wrongs of this kind that have been done by the Legislature of this State, and making it necessary that these judges shall act upon the same principles as long as this Constitution shall stand. If that be so, I, for one, am opposed to this provision, and I believe that we will be a great deal better off if we apply the rule which is older than our Constitution, and better — that the State should do to others as it would have others do to it. For myself, I should not be afraid of having the State of New York do justice. For myself, I should be willing to pay my share of the taxes of the State which would enable it to do justice to all men—entirely willing: and I do not believe that an attempt on the part of this Convention in framing the Constitution to avoid the State's meeting any fair liability, at all events, by the use of such phrases as are found in this clause, will be likely to be successful in saving a dollar to the State. On the contrary, it struck me when I first read this provision, and I have been since still more convinced of it, that we are legalizing, and not merely legalizing, but constitutionalizing, all the wrongs that the Legislature have done in times past in cases of this kind—if they have done wrongs; and if that be not so, I confess myself utterly unable to conceive the meaning of this portion of this section. Now, the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], says that the State does not hold itself liable for the actions of its agents, and yet I am perfectly well aware that time and again the Legislature by contributions has indemnified individuals for injuries which they have sustained from the negligence of the agents of the State. I remember the case of a canal-boat which sank between here and Cohoes—a matter with which I had no connection. It sank in the canal, and it was claimed that it sank from a defect in the canal, owing to the negligence of the superintendent of this section of the canal. Damages were claimed for that loss, and the Legislature paid them. At a subsequent session of the Legislature the same question came up and the former action was confirmed; and I think it will be found that in a great variety of cases the Legislature have done this. Now, if I am right in regard to the significance of the phrase used here in this sentence, a reference to that act of the Legislature would compel this court, in all coming time during the existence of this Constitution, to allow claims for damages sustained on occasions of this kind. I believe the words used here are exceedingly dangerous in their character, and I am very much at a loss to determine whether it is wise to enact them as a part of this Constitution. I take occasion to say so here on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], an amendment which I think does not help the proposition. I would rather leave it as it is than strike out so little, but if a motion is made to strike out the whole I will support it.

Mr. ROBERTSON—With a view of reaching the difficulty which has been described by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], I would propose an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], viz.: to strike out the word "legal," and insert after the word "rules" the words "of law governing the relations," so that the section may read, "in all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the rules of law governing the relations between the State and its citizens;" so that we should not be compelled to have recourse to the past to decide hereafter what should be the rights of citizens in reference to claims on the government, and in order that we might escape all the difficulties that would arise in regard to the meaning of the word "legal." By these means the law would be established that whatever duties are to be maintained by the State toward its citizens (and the rules of law which may hereafter prevail in regard to that subject will, I apprehend, in their structure and origin, be in most respects the same as those that have heretofore existed), will control in regard to the determining of claims, without the necessity of having recourse to the past for the purpose of determining what have been the rules which have heretofore existed.

Mr. HALE—I would like to ask my friend from New York [Mr. Robertson], whether there are any rules of law governing the relations between the State and its citizens in the sense in which he has used that phrase here; that is, in reference to claims of this kind; and if so, can he state briefly what they are or where they are to be found?

Mr. ROBERTSON—I apprehend, sir, that there cannot be much difficulty, under the system of constitutional law which regulates so completely and minutely at every point the powers and duties of the State, in ascertaining what the rules of law are which govern the relations of the State to the citizen, and I presume that this is more near to a definite determination of what should be the rules governing in such cases than that which would refer us to the past, and which the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has so energetically commented upon as compelling us to refer to the rules which have been heretofore adopted; because in the future, the rules which govern the relations between the State and its citizens are those which can certainly be derived from the general structure of the government and the specific relations between the State and the citizen in any given case.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] whether if his amendment prevail, we do not deprive every individual of any right of claim against the State? I think the State would be the gainer by that, and I do not know that the parties claimant would be so much injured by it, but it strikes me that under the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] under the present Constitution no claimant would have the right to come before the court at all.

Mr. ROBERTSON—If I am not trespassing upon the time and patience or the Convention, I will say that I apprehend that there can be no difficulty in determining that. If the State is willing to be held responsible for the acts of its officers in trespassing upon the rights of private individuals, then there can be no difficulty in determining what should be the rules of law between the citizens of the State and the State. The only reason why the State cannot be sued, why citizens are not entitled to recover damages against it, is that the State in its sovereign capacity cannot be trammeled in its action by suits in courts of justice. I apprehend that the difficulty is much less in the proposition that I have offered, and that it will be much less difficult to determine hereafter from the whole structure of the government, to which I have heretofore alluded, and from the form in which that government, representing the State, has consented to be impleaded in the courts, for the purpose of determining how far the State has trespassed upon the rights of individuals, than it would be to refer to those uncertain rules by which the canal boards and other such irregular tribunals have been guided in determining what damages should be given by reason of injury resulting to private citizens from the negligence of State officers.

Mr. HALE—I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] will prevail, and then, if a motion shall be made to strike out the whole paragraph in relation to the rules which are to govern the court of claims, that that motion also will prevail. I have recently been unfortunate enough to be placed in a position where it has become my duty to examine, as a practical question, what the rules are which govern the relations as to claims against the State on the part of its citizens. I have not yet completed the examination, or made it very thorough, but with the little attention that I have bestowed upon the subject, I confess that I have found it exceedingly difficult to determine whether there are any legal rules between the State and its citizens in these matters. I am aware that there are opinions which have been written by gentlemen in official positions, and which lay down certain principles, which if acted upon by the Legislature would perhaps constitute rules. I am also aware, however, that the principles enunciated by different gentlemen who have held responsible positions in the Legislature and in the canal board, have not been entirely uniform and consistent, and that the action of the Legislature upon these claims (which I suppose determines the rules, if there are any) has been very far from uniform or consistent. I recollect that I happened to be in the Senate once last winter, when the report of the committee on claims adverse to a certain claim came before that body. I remember that several lawyers in that body opposed the claim, and that they cited certain opinions—among them, I think, an opinion by a gentleman who was formerly Lieutenant-Governor of this State, according to which opinion it was clear that the claim in question ought not to be allowed; and I know that when the vote was taken, the Senate, by a very decided majority, overruled the report of the committee on claims, and allowed the claim. The difficulty, as it strikes me, is, that there are no settled rules existing, governing the relations between the State and its citizens in such cases; and for the very obvious reason that the law gives no remedy to the citizens against the State. It is in one sense a matter of favor for the State, either through the Legislature or through other tribunals, to allow any damages to be recovered against itself, and the State has adopted no fixed or uniform rules in bestowing such favor. If this proposed court shall be created, it is very possible that rules may be established and that there may arise something like a common law upon the subject; but under the action of the Legislature, such action as has been had in this State in times past, I submit that there are no rules, and that this provision, either in the form in which it is now offered by my friend from New York [Mr. Robertson] or in its present form, will be entirely delusive, because it will refer to rules to govern this tribunal, which in fact have no existence; and for this reason I am in favor of striking it out.

Mr. VAN COTT—What is the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck]?

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The amendment pending is the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson].

Mr. VAN COTT—Will the President please state the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck].

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—It is to strike out the word "legal" before the word "rules" in the fourteenth line, and to insert the word "and" after the word "citizens" in line fifteen.

Mr. VAN COTT—It seems to me, sir, that we can escape the difficulty by striking out the whole paragraph which has been criticised.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I made that motion and it was ruled out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—A motion to strike out is not now in order. Propositions to amend must first be disposed of.

Mr. VAN COTT—If the President will allow me to read what I shall ask to have stricken out hereafter, it is this:

"In all other respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State."

I think these words are entirely superfluous and are so vague that they must cause much embarrassment in the attempt to construe and execute them. The whole existing difficulty in respect to a controversy between the State and one of its citizens lies in the fact that the State cannot be sued. It is said that the State, administering justice, cannot be forced to administer justice against itself. That reason would apply just as well to a suit brought by the State as plaintiff against a citizen. The State as plaintiff, administers justice in its own case, and the State as defendant administers justice in its own case; nevertheless that has been given as a reason why the State cannot be sued. Now, sir, what are the rights of the citizen against the State? If the State makes a contract it is the right of the citizen to have that contract performed. If the State executes a bond or a note, the holder of that bond or that note exacts of the State the performance of the contract according to the tenor of its obligations. So, if the State inflicts an injury, the remedy of the citizen against the State for the injury, is the recovery of a sum of money that will compensate for it. If the remedy had been open to the citizen in a court in a claim against the State as in a claim against a fellow-citizen, the same rule which governs the case of a citizen against a citizen would govern the case of a citizen against the State. Now, sir, when, by the Constitution, we provide a court of justice, and say that the citizen may come into that court and demand justice against the State, do we not thereby necessarily give to the citizen the law applicable to the case? When we say that the State having made a contract, the citizen may come into court and enforce that contract against the State, is it necessary in the constitutional provision which creates the court to declare also the law by which the case shall be determined? The case is to be determined by the law which enforces the obligation of the contract; and the case for an injury is to be determined by the law which exacts indemnity for the injury. It seems to me, sir, that when we have created the court and authorized the citizen to sue the State, we have done all that is necessary. Every thing beyond that is superfluous, and whatever is superfluous in the Constitution is objectionable, because it tends to create doubts instead of removing them. If the pending amendments (which do not cure but only slightly mitigate the evil) be not adopted, as I hope they will not be, I shall move to strike out this clause altogether.

Mr. WAKEMAN—The remarks of the honorable gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott], have left me in doubt what policy we should pursue here. It may be well to look and see what tribunals now exist by which the rights of the citizen may be determined in a claim against the State. I understand the canal appraisers to be one tribunal, the canal board another and the Legislature another; and I understand too, that a public officer under certain circumstances may be liable to the citizen, and that the State itself is not liable. Now, if this court of claims be established and we establish no rule by which it shall be governed in these cases, the question will then arise whether that court shall not be, as the courts of common law are, governed by the rules as between citizen and citizen. If that is to be the rule to be established, and we desire to establish that rule, very well. It has been said here, that the State cannot be sued by an individual. That is so. Now, do we desire to change that rule. I recollect a few years ago making an application to the Legislature in the case of a poor man who had been injured and maimed for life, by falling through a State bridge at Lockport. The answer of the State, given through the committee of the Senate, was, that the State was not liable in that class of cases, although it was a strong case of equity, in which the report of the Senate committee showed clearly that they would have granted the relief applied for if it had not been contrary to the policy of the State to allow itself to be made liable in that class of cases. Now, do we desire to change that rule? If we do then I have no doubt that the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott], would be a very proper one, but if we desire to retain the same rules between the individual and the State as now exist in the tribunals which have the disposition of these cases, should we not adopt some rule here by which that policy shall be clearly avowed and defined by the Constitution itself? It seems to me that the policy which has led to the creation of this court of claims by the Convention is to do away with all the other tribunals, so that their claims shall come before this one tribunal, and so that claimants if they fail there cannot afterward go to the Legislature and get a law passed allowing their claim the next year, or in ten years after; the object being to relieve the treasury of the State from the burden of these claims and demands against the State which ought never to have been made at all; and should we not therefore preserve the rules that have heretofore existed between the citizens and the State in such cases, that this end may be attained. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck]—and there is something in that—is to strike out the word "legal," on the ground that there are no legal rules between the citizen and the State. There has been one rule in the Legislature, and another in the canal board, and another before the canal appraisers, and even before each of these tribunals the rule has not been uniform. Still this court could be left to find out what the rule and policy of the State has been, and to apply it, but if we strike out the whole provision the question will then be whether every claim of this sort may not go before the tribunal exactly in the same way that one private citizen would go before a court in a claim against another.

Mr. VAN COTT—Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark, because what I said may not have been sufficiently guarded, and I do not wish to be misunderstood. I wish to say a word or two by way of explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The gentleman has spoken once and cannot do so again except by unanimous consent. No objection being made the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. VAN COTT—I merely desired to explain. What I meant to say was this, that the court being established, if it found a constitutional provision applicable to the case it would apply it; or if it found a statute applicable to the case it would apply that; but if it found neither, it would apply such common law or usage as had existed in the State, applicable to the transaction. I did not mean to be understood, as I seem to have been, that the cases would necessarily be governed by the rules that would govern in controversies between citizen and citizen. Where a distinction had been made, which had become a part of the established usage of the State, that becomes a part of the common law governing such transactions as between a citizen and the State, and would be applied in determining the controversy.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I cannot agree as to the propriety of the amendment proposed. I think we should adhere to the text before us. Now, for the purpose of properly understanding the meaning of the clause that has led to this discussion, I think we should compare it with that which immediately precedes it. This section authorizes a new kind of evidence to be brought before this tribunal, namely: that which the judges of the court of claims may derive from a personal inspection of the premises in question, where there are lands in question; and it provides not only that they shall view the property, but that they shall consider their own estimate of such value of the damages in connection with the evidence in the case. Thus a new rule of evidence is adopted with reference to this court of claims. Now, I think that what follows shows that it relates mainly to the evidence. It says that "in all other respects such courts shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens, according to the course and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State." In other respects they shall pursue the ordinary rules of evidence in the adjudications before them—not the rules of evidence between citizen and citizen, for that would not be just to the State—but the "rules that have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens." They are to remain as they have been heretofore. It is true that, heretofore, the State could not be sued, because the sovereignty of the State did not admit of its being called into court to defend itself. But heretofore the State has sued, and whenever the State has brought suit against a citizen there have been certain rules of evidence which have governed, different from those which govern between citizen and citizen. For instance, take an action of ejectment brought by the State to recover a lot of wild land to which some citizen makes claim. On the trial of that cause at the circuit, instead of the ordinary rule of evidence, you start with the presumption that the State is the owner of the land, and it is for the defendant to repel that presumption by evidence, if he can do so. A different rule of evidence governs from that which prevails in a suit between citizen and citizen. So in regard to the statute of limitations, which is one of the statutes referred to as having modified the rules of the common law. A different rule is laid down to govern between the State and the citizen from that which governs between citizen and citizen. I take it that the objects of this clause is simply to say that in other respects except this important one in which change has been made, in these adjudications the court shall be governed by the same rules that have governed where a trial has taken place between the people and the citizen in a civil cause. I think it should be so. These rules are well settled—well established. They are not, as my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] would seem to suppose, rules derived from the capricious action of the Legislature in refusing one claim and allowing another. Such legislation makes no rules of evidence or of law for any other case except the one in question and—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would ask the gentleman whether there is any reference to the rules of evidence in the clause about which he is now speaking. If it be so, nothing that I said has reference to that. I think it refers to decisions—adjudications.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I think my friend is in error in supposing that any kind of evidence could be admitted because in some particular case the Legislature considered it. You establish nothing by that. There would be just as much authority under that for the rejection of a claim as there would be for the allowance of it. They are referred to as "legal rules" that exist between citizen and citizen as modified by statute—the general rules, such as the statute of limitations, and such as that other principle of the presumption that applies in such cases. I have only spoken of one or two of these peculiar rules but there are many others, as gentlemen of the Convention must understand.

Mr. KRUM—I would like to ask the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] if the same rule he now contends for would not exist with the clause under consideration stricken out?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Perhaps it might; but I think the question would be left open to controversy. I think it is much better that we should lay down the rules, as far as we can, which are to govern the court we are to create.

Mr. MERRITT—In theory we say that the agents of the State are not liable to the citizen but so far as it pertains to claims against the State the practice is that the State is liable, and the State has assumed that liability. I presume to say that there has not a claim passed the Legislature since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846 that that question has not been involved and the allowance made expressly upon the condition that some agent of the State has in some way contributed to the damage, and because the parties cannot go into court and get what they claim as their due, they ask the Legislature to pass bills for their relief. Now, take the question of contracts upon the canals. The State is a party and the contractor is a party. The contract goes on under a contract, and, under some pretext or other during the life of the contract, some additional work is done, or, on some incident growing out of the supervision by the State officer of that work, the contractor claims that the State by its agent has done that damage or contributed to it, and he goes to the Legislature and asks it to legalise a claim which he admits does not exist in law. The Legislature then refers the matter to some board of State officers for adjudication, and these statutes, if you will refer to them, you will see are very adroitly worded for the purpose of giving the greatest latitude to the claimant; and the canal board and canal appraisers regard these acts as mandatory upon them and they make the allowances to the fullest extent authorized. I have one case in my mind where several thousand dollars was allowed upon this express condition for the reason that it was claimed that some work for the State had been done—not immediately connected with the contracted section—and in consequence of which the damage occurred. And if the action in the boards or of the Legislature should be taken as precedent, or, as the general rule, you will find that even in the resolution of the canal board there are no principles laid down in allowing a claim at all, but simply a resolution to allow the claimant ten thousand dollars, or whatever the sum may be, either upon written or oral testimony, or upon affidavit, as they in their judgment may think best. I am prepared to admit the liability of the State for the acts of its agent, and adjudicate claims as you would between individuals. I have no doubt the State would save money by it. The theory is one thing, the practice is another. If we admit the justice of claims against the State, we must admit them upon the same principle that we admit the justice of a claim against an individual. And these acts referred to provide that if the boards to which the matter is referred shall find such a state of facts as will allow a claim against a citizen, then the board is authorized or is instructed to allow the claim as against the State. That being the practice, let us adopt it as a principle, and then let the State hold its agent responsible. It is admitted that the claimant has no control over the State officer, and in theory we say the State is not responsible for the acts of its agent; but if its agents do wrong, or if such agent interferes with any of the private rights of citizens, let the State hold the agent responsible, and require the agent, if he has stepped outside of the law, to respond in damages or be punished as may be provided by law. But if, under the direction of the State, or the Legislature, injury should be done to individuals—under the common principle that we shall not take private property or trespass upon private rights for public uses without compensation, let damages be awarded. Let the responsibility come home to the officers who do not do their duty faithfully. Let them bear the whole responsibility. If we constitute the court upon that basis, every body will understand upon what principles their rights are to be adjudicated, and we shall be relieved of bad precedents growing out of wrong action of the Legislature or other authorities, who have passed upon them. I do not claim to have much legal knowledge, yet my opinion is that this paragraph should be stricken out, and I hope it will be, so that the court can establish its own rules and proceedings, like any other court.

Mr. VERPLANCK—When this discussion commenced I moved to amend by striking out the words which the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] has indicated he would move to strike out after the pending amendment is disposed of. Those words could do no good and might do harm. The gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] has said that there are certain rules which have obtained in the courts in reference to suits between the State and the citizen. That is true in cases where the State has been the plaintiff in the action. But we are now providing for an entire different class of cases. We are providing for a class of cases where the State is to be sued by the citizen. There is no rule established according to the course of the common law as modified by the statute in any such case, and I therefore moved to strike out the word "legal," so that it might refer to only such rules as had obtained before the Legislature or boards established by the Legislature, where claims were made by citizens against the State, so that the section would refer to those rules instead of "legal" rules. I undertake to say that there are no "legal" rules established by the courts of common law modified by the statutes of the State, and therefore the object which the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], for whose discrimination and legal acumen I have the highest respect, desires to effect will fail. I think that we will attain the end he has in view if the amendment I proposed is adopted. If it is not adopted, when the proper time comes I shall move to strike out the whole section.

Mr. SPENCER—Several years ago the Legislature enacted that certain legal proceedings should be adapted to the comprehension of men of ordinary understanding. [Laughter.] It seems to me that we should adopt the same rule in regard to any provision in the Constitution; or else the gentleman upon my right who says he cannot understand the provision under consideration at all, and the gentleman on my left who says he understands it in a particular way, and the gentleman upon my rear who says he understands it another way; will never be able to agree upon the matter. Now, if we, learned and wise men, endowed with a great deal of legal acumen [laughter], cannot understand this clause, how can it be expected that it will be comprehended by people of common and ordinary understanding.

Mr. SMITH—As we are establishing a new tribunal, it would seem desirable to prescribe some code of rules and practice for it. If none such be prescribed, there may be great difficulty in ascertaining by what rules the tribunal is to be governed in its adjudications. I should, therefore, prefer that some provision be made, but, I confess that I have great difficulty in understanding clearly the scope and meaning of the language employed in this section. It reads thus:

"In all respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the legal rules which have heretofore existed between the State and its citizens."

Now, the first difficulty is, what are those rules? As has just been stated by the gentlemen from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], no two persons agree as to what they are; and the judges would be likely to find themselves in the same difficulty. In the second place, it confines the court to the rules and practice heretofore existing, thus stereotyping whatever rules of practice may have been heretofore adopted. If they are good and proper, then it is very well; but if they are not, then they ought to be changed and modified, but they could not be under the provision in question, because it is inflexible. There would be no power to modify them. The last clause in this paragraph, "according to the practice of the common law," may, and probably does, refer to those rules, "as heretofore existing." I would suggest for consideration that the clause be modified so as to read thus: "in all respects such court shall be governed in its adjudications by the rules and practice of the common law as modified by the statutes of this State," leaving out all the rest, and simply adopting the rules of the common law for the government of these cases. But it is said that this will not answer, because a different relation exists between the State and the citizen from that existing between citizens. If that be so, the Legislature might make rules applicable to the relation. By the modification which I have suggested, we should provide a general code, namely—the common law rules, leaving it in the power of the Legislature to change and modify them as time and circumstances might render necessary. It seems to me this would relieve the section from all difficulties.

Mr. LAPHAM—The difficulty which arises is principally in not considering the object to be provided in the Constitution. What is the evil which we are seeking to guard against? The practice for many years has been that, when a claim has been decided by the tribunal to which it is referred by law and decided to be unwarranted and unjust, and consequently disallowed, to go to the Legislature and ask its allowance; and we all regret to be compelled to say that the application to the Legislature has generally been successful. To illustrate—the statute provides with great particularity the cases in which the claims for damages shall be entitled to compensation for property taken for public uses. And they provide to some extent the class of cases in which no claim for damages shall be allowed. We have already, in the article relating to the canals, swept away entirely a class of claims which have heretofore been the subject of allowance to individuals, and have provided that no such claims shall hereafter be allowed. Now, in regard to the remaining classes of claims. We constitute a tribunal to determine claims. What is the object of the tribunal? It is to take away from it all exercise of discretionary power—all power to donate public moneys for the State which has been the great evil in the exercise of legislative power. It is to have this tribunal governed in its adjudication by legal rules. We have provided in this section that the determination of this tribunal may be reviewed upon the law by the court of appeals; but it precludes the exercise of any other than legal rules in the determination of the question between the citizen and the State. And there is no difficulty in this provision whatever. The laws are ample to protect the citizen in every enjoyment and in every just claim. To illustrate; a person who has entered into a contract with the State to do a certain piece of public work comes before the tribunal and asks for extra compensation. He is answered, "The court is not authorized, and the State is not liable to pay extra compensation." The object of this is to prevent the party then going to the Legislature and asking it as a matter of bounty in the exercise of a discretionary power by that body. It is to cut off all that; it is to have these claims determined upon the legal rules, and to provide for a review of the determination of the tribunal upon these decisions in case errors are committed. Therefore, the retention of this form of expression, that "the court shall be governed by the legal rules heretofore existing," is absolutely essential to the success of the system. Without it the tribunal might become just as objectionable as a power to determine these matters as the board of canal appraisers, the canal board, or the Legislature in the past.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It seems to me, in listening to the discussion, that we all mean very nearly the same thing. The only question is, what shall be the expression of the common idea? The general intent of this clause, I apprehend, is that the court of claims shall be governed by rules and not by discretion; shall be governed by law, and not by its own sense as to what may be abstract equity, or by caprice. The gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] has very nearly expressed my own idea, in stating that the clause should be in substance that the court shall be governed in its adjudications by the rules and practice of the common law, as modified by the statutes of this State. I should make it a very little shorter perhaps, so that it shall read "shall be governed in its adjudications by the rules of law as modified by the statutes of the State." This court is to have a jurisdiction and exercise a function very much like that of all other courts. If it can find a rule of law applicable to the case, then it would be governed by it. If it cannot find an existing rule applicable to a case before it, like any other court it will make a rule and that will become the precedent for other cases, and will become the rule of law for that court. I object to the particular expression "the legal rules which have heretofore existed in this State," etc., because no man has yet been able to state what those legal rules are between the State and its citizens. They cannot be found and cannot be stated.

Mr. RUMSEY—May I ask the gentleman [Mr. Comstock] whether it has not been one of the rules established, that the State in its sovereign capacity is not liable for any incidental damages resulting from its works of internal improvement?

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not know how that may be. If so, that may be one of the legal rules. What I mean to say is that there is no system of rules governing between the State and the citizen. You have no code on that subject, and you will find this clause will work inconveniently if you go any further than to say that the court shall be governed by law as modified by the statutes of the State. I think we should not go beyond the most general form of expression. In due time a system of sound and wholesome jurisprudence will grow up in the administration of justice by the proposed court.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The gentleman having spoken once and asked questions twice is not in order except by unanimous consent. [Laughter.] No objection being made he can proceed.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I have felt the same difficulty as the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] in regard to laying down any rule as respects the presentation of claims where there was no statute, or law, or practice determining upon what principle claims against the State should be established. When we have consented by this article of the Constitution that the State should descend into the arena of an ordinary litigation in the matter of determining the rights of a party against the State, I apprehend that some rule should be adopted in regard to the principle upon which the State should be made liable. As I understand this sentence which is proposed to be amended, it was introduced for the purpose of recognizing the existence and the application of the ordinary rules of law in a contest between the State and a citizen in regard to claims which would exist in regard to a contest between citizens; so that there should be no doubt, when the State comes down into this arena, that it should submit itself to the same rules which govern the rights of private citizens in reference to claims against each other. I acknowledge the force of the suggestion (I suppose it was perceived by members) although perhaps not explained by my friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] that this was introducing a new rule rather than new principles, and that as the State had consented to become impleaded as a defendant in an action, there should be some new rule established. It is with that view I suggest that instead of striking out the words "heretofore existing" to put in the words "the rules which have heretofore governed the relations between the State and its citizens," so that it shall be governed by the ordinary rules of law. By this amendment, the State, putting itself within the jurisdiction of the court it had created, would consent to be governed by the rules of law which had been established by the Constitution and by statute.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Robertson, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VAN COTT—I think there is force in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] distinguishing between the application of rules of law and rules of equity to claims, and that it may be well to guard against the dangers he indicates by express provision. I therefore move to amend by striking out all after the word "govern" down to and including the word "State" in the seventeenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "by the rules of law applicable to such controversies as between the State and its citizens:" so that it will read, "In all other respects such court shall be governed by the rules of law applicable to such controversies as between the State and its citizens."

Mr. VERPLANCK—I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. announced the question on the amendment of Mr. Verplanck as amended on the suggestion of Mr. Van Cott.

Mr. SMITH—I rise to inquire of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] whether his amendment looks to any change that the Legislature may make, or whether he confines it to the rules that now exist?

Mr. VAN COTT—I do not confine it at all. It was made general on purpose. I worded it very carefully so that the courts should be governed by the rules of law applicable to such controversies between the State and its citizens, and in force at the time of the adjudication.

Mr. SMITH—That seems to me to be open to the same objection, in a modified degree, that has been made to the other proposition. It applies to all the rules as they now exist. The difficulty is in ascertaining what the rules are which have been referred to. I like the amendment suggested by the member from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] which prescribes the rules of law as they exist, subject to modification by the Legislature. In that way a system, uniform, symmetrical, and clear, would grow up in the practice of this new court. It leaves the matter in the hands of the Legislature. It is flexible. But under this amendment the Code would be unchangeable, and, besides, the meaning is not entirely clear. If this amendment do not prevail, I shall offer an amendment such as I have suggested, with the modification proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], simply leaving it to the rules of law as they may be modified from time to time by the Legislature.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. again announced the pending question to be on the amendment offered by Mr. Verplanck as amended by Mr. Van Cott.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move to amend the amendment by inserting in place of the word "State" the word "government," so that it shall read "between the government and its citizens." Mr. President, the reason for the amendment is, that there are no rules governing between the State and its citizens, in regard to these controversies. No court has ever made any rules on that subject. The Legislature has decided this way and that way, at times, in regard to claims against the State, but no rules have ever been established by any court to apply to controversies between the State and its citizens. But the courts of England and the United States have made rules which are applicable in controversies between the government and its citizens. For instance, if a man should put a letter in the post-office with money in it, and it should be lost, and the postmaster should be sued for the loss, it has been decided by the courts of this country as well as in England, that the postmaster is not liable, because he is a governmental officer. That is a rule which would be acted upon as a legal rule, but it is not a rule made in a controversy between the State and its citizens, because the State cannot be sued. It is so in a great many other controversies which I might cite, but which I will not take up the time of the Convention in stating. If the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] should be adopted, viz.: that the rules should apply that exist in controversies between the State and its citizens, that declaration in the Constitution, in my judgment, would amount to nothing.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to ask whether the government can be sued in a case of the kind mentioned?

Mr. DEVELIN—The officer can be sued.

Mr. CHESEBRO—But you say he could not be made liable.

Mr. DEVELIN—It has been said that the government cannot be made liable.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Then there is no rule.

Mr. DEVELIN—But what we want is a rule.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—My friend from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], construed the clause which has been some time under discussion and to which I addressed myself, as referring to the rules of evidence. Now, as the gentleman's argument strikes at my construction of this clause, as a lawyer, I certainly ought to be able at least, to conceive of the direction to which the clause tends. I would ask my friend to look for a moment at its language, and I think he will see that it has no reference to the rules of evidence at all, but on the contrary, it is to the rules of decision and adjudication; the principles of adjudication to which this clause alone refers. "In all respects such courts shall be governed," not in respect to the receipt or rejection of evidence, but in its "adjudications," that is, the decisions upon the evidence. This clause was drawn with reference to the decisions of the court, and to them it was directed. But enough upon that subject. I am satisfied with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott], and accepted by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], that it would answer much better than the clause in its original shape. The difference is this: under the amendment that is now pending before the Convention, the court will have no rule as I understand the effect of this amendment, because I understand there are no rules that control any such cases; but as the sentence stands there is only the pernicious rule which has been adopted by the Legislature, if that has any meaning at all. I think I am not mistaking the rule which has governed the Legislature. It is that when an influential applicant came with a claim, the State was liable for the act of its agent, and when a non-influential person came with a claim, the rule was that the State was not liable; although if the claim grew in the course of time and became of sufficient magnitude where an influential person would take hold of the claim, eventually the State paid it. So that if the clause in the section was to remain as it originally prevailed, the rule that governed the court would be to allow in all cases almost any claim that was set up against the State. A word in answer to my friend from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey]. I protest that it has not been the rule even in the case of just claims where just claims have been presented, for the Legislature of this State to reject claims set up against the State for injuries resulting from the neglect and misconduct of the agents of the State.

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? He has certainly entirely misapprehended the meaning of the words and the intention of the committee, if he supposes that the committee intended to adopt the action of the Legislature as the rule of law to govern this court. If he reflects he will recognize a rule that has existed in all governments, of the non-liability of the government, or State, by whatever name it may be called, for any incidental damage that results from any of the acts authorized by the State, for the purpose of internal improvements. And that is precisely the rule that the committee had in their minds when they adopted the language used in the section.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Far be it from me to attribute to the committee any intention such as would naturally follow from the language of the clause in the section referred to. I was addressing myself not to what was the intention of the committee, but to what the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] has asserted, in his place on this floor, that the State has not held itself responsible for the default, misconduct or neglect of its agents. Now, sir, within ten miles of this city the canal has been raised over a large portion of its extent; and the State has paid hundreds of thousands of dollars damages, because the canal bed was not properly puddled, by reason of which the water leaked through the banks and destroyed the cellars of residents along the line of the canal. I know that heretofore in this State, the State has, nominally, not held itself liable to individuals for injuries resulting al along the thoroughfares for such objects. But sir, the principle lying close by it has prevailed that, where any of the organized localities of th State has built up public highways for the accom modation of the citizens of those localities in their official capacity, the localities hav been sued for the neglect of their official and agents, and the localities have been mad liable, and it is just, if a locality put an officer i charge of its highways, that officer should s prepare the highway, so it shall not be a man trap or a dead-fall, instead of a proper mode o communication. If he does not, the localit should be made to answer.

Here the gavel fell, the speaker's time havin expired.

Mr. KINNEY—I think there has been suf cient light thrown upon the subject in the r marks that have been made. I therefore mo the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of M Kinney, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the adoption of t amendment of Mr. Develin to substitute the wo "government" in place of the word "State and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the amendme offered by Mr. Verplanck, as amended on t suggestion of Mr. Van Cott, and it was declar carried.

Mr. GRAVES—I move a reconsideration the vote by which the amendment offered by m self providing for a trial by jury in the propos court, was lost and ask that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The motion w lie on the table, under the rule.

The PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. SMITH—I offer the following amen ment:

Strike out all after the word "governed" line 14, down to and including the word "la in line 16, and insert in lieu thereof the wo "by the rules of law," so that it will read, "In other respects such court shall be governed the rules of law, as modified by the statutes the State." This is the amendment I before s gested, modified as suggested by the gentlem from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

Mr. VERPLANCK—I rise to a point of or The motion of the gentleman [Mr. Smith] is strike out what the Convention has just deci to insert. The gentleman, therefore, can c reach his object by moving a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is taken.

Digitized by Google

Mr. CHESEBRO—I move to strike out the whole of the paragraph commencing with the word "in" in line thirteen, down to, and including the word "State," in line seventeen.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Chesebro to strike out, and it was declared lost.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move to amend by inserting after the word "citizen" the word "and."

There being no objection, the amendment suggested was ordered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment proposed by me this morning, to strike out after the word "State" in the fourth line down to and including the word "direct" in the fifth line, was lost; and I ask that the motion lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT—The motion will lie on the table under the rule.

Mr. RUMSEY—There has been erased from the fourth line, the word "such." I apprehend that was done under a misapprehension of the necessities of the case. By striking out the word "such," you send every imaginable claim that may exist against the State to the court of claims, which was not the intention at all. There is a very large number of claims for salaries, for the payment of men hired from day to day to labor upon the public works. All these things are provided for annually in the appropriation bills, and there is no earthly use in sending such claims to the court of claims. The object of the clause is to send such contested claims as have heretofore gone to the Legislature for allowance, and to leave these other claims, which are legal, just, and equitable, to be paid on demand. For this reason the word "such" should be reinstated.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. RUMSEY—I ask unanimous consent that the word "such" be reinstated in the fourth line.

Mr. MILLER—I would suggest to the gentleman [Mr. Rumsey] that it would be better to insert the word "contested" before the word "claims," so that it will read, "all contested claims." I think that would be better than the word "such," leaving the Legislature to discriminate between claimants.

The PRESIDENT—No objection being made, the amendment suggested will be ordered.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey].

Mr. OPDYKE—I rise to a point of order, that the amendment cannot be considered without a motion to reconsider the vote by which the word was stricken out.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move to reconsider the vote by which the word "such" was stricken out.

Mr. OPDYKE—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion will lie on the table, under the rule.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to amend by inserting immediately before the word "claims" in the fourth line, the word "contested."

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

Mr. PROSSER—I move to strike out the word "as," in the fourth line, and insert the word "which."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Prosser, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 20 ayes, the noes not being counted.

Mr. KRUM—I move a reconsideration of the vote last taken.

Objection being made, the motion was laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], inserting the word "contested," before the word "claims," was adopted.

Objection being made, the motion was laid on the table, under the rule.

Mr. SMITH—I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] was adopted.

Objection being made, the motion was laid on the table under the rule.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 11. There shall be a solicitor of claims, to be appointed in the same manner as the judges of the court of claims, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the interests of the State in all matters depending before the court of claims. Such solicitor may be removed by the Governor for incompetency or neglect of duty, upon the recommendation of said court, and whenever, in the judgment of the Legislature, the office of solicitor of claims shall be or become unnecessary, they may abolish the same by law.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I move as a substitute for that section the following:

SEC. 11. It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to take charge of the interests of the State in all matters depending before the court of claims.

It will be remembered that when we were in Committee of the Whole on this article, the question as to the appointment of the Attorney-General, or directing him to take charge of the claims before this court, was the subject-matter of discussion; and I do not propose to recapitulate it, or to open the argument again, so far as I am concerned. But, sir, since that discussion, the Attorney-General of the State then in office has yielded that office to another officer who is not incumbered with any of the positions which rendered the discharge of that duty before this court at that time a burden; and it seems to me that it is eminently proper, that, the Attorney-General of the State now, who has no other office but that of Attorney-General, should perform for the State this duty. I trust, therefore, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. VERPLANCK—When this section was before the Committee of the Whole, I was in favor of the amendment now moved by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro], and proposed a resolution providing for a deputy, whose business it should be, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to attend to the interests of the State before this court. The matter was so fully discussed at that time, and the vote was so decided upon the subject, that I think further discussion is unnecessary, and I therefore move the previous question on this amendment.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Verplanck, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Chesebro.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I ask the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Chesebro, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VEEDER—I observe in reading over this section that there is no term of office fixed at all for the solicitor. He is appointed in the same manner as the judges but he shall hold office under this section, indefinitely and can only be removed for incompetency or neglect of duty. I, therefore, move to amend by inserting after the word "manner," in line two, the words "and whose term term of office shall be for the same period." So that it shall read as follows:

"There shall be a solicitor of claims, to be appointed in the same manner and whose term of office shall be for the same period as the judges of the court of claims."

I do not think there is any term of office provided for, and I think there ought to be.

Mr. RUMSEY—The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] has evidently overlooked the latter clause of this section, that the Legislature may, at its pleasure, abolish this office, and also that he may be removed at any time for incompetency on the recommendation of the court. There are abundant facilities for getting rid of this officer at any time when it is necessary to do so, and there is a very strong reason why that officer, when he is once appointed, if he is a faithful man, should be kept there as long as the duties of the office are to be performed by any body.

Mr. VEEDER—Is there any reason why the solicitor should hold his office for any longer period than the judges of that court?

Mr. RUMSEY—Yes, sir; for the simple reason that it requires a great deal of experience and familiarity with all sorts of rules and regulations and claims that have heretofore been made against the State, arising out of an innumerable number of causes. The officer cannot, without a great deal of time spent, furnish himself with a knowledge of all these various claims; and when he has obtained that knowledge, it is a fund of information that will be invaluable to the State; and for that reason he should be retained in office.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Will the gentleman allow me a question? I want to know whether the judges will not require the experience that is so necessary to the solicitor?

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir. Their action is controlled by settled rules, and there is no difficulty in learning what those are; while the other depends upon the knowledge of a large number of facts relating to all these various matters.

Mr. VEEDER—I wish to reply to the gentleman who supposes that I have overlooked the balance of the section. That only provides that the Legislature when they deem the office unnecessary may abolish it; but it may run on for twenty years or twenty-five years or even longer. They may perhaps never deem it necessary to abolish that office. Thus there is no term of office established at all. I repeat that I think there ought to be a term of office established for the solicitor just as much as for the judges.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I trust this amendment will be adopted. I have not learned from the distinguished chairman of this committee, who reported this article, any reason assigned which, in my judgment, should prevail in this Convention for continuing this officer beyond the time that the Legislature may abolish this court entirely. What is this officer to be, and what possible use is he to be to the State after the court before which he is appointed as special solicitor has expired?

Mr. DEVELIN—Following the suggestion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] I would move as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], that he shall hold office until the claims with which he has familiarized himself have been adjudicated. [Laughter.]

The question was put on the amendment offerred by Mr. Develin, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred and was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Veeder, and it was declared carried.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I move to amend by inserting after the word "claims" in the fourth line the following: "And he shall receive for his services a compensation to be established by law." There is no provision made in this section for the compensation of the solicitor; and, regarding this as an oversight, I offer this amendment.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Van Campen, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ALVORD—In the eighth line I do not see the necessity of the words "or become." I move that they be stricken out. "Be," or "become" necessary, must of necessity mean the same thing.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord to strike out, and it was declared carried.

Mr. LAPHAM—I ask permission to offer an amendment to the tenth section, to increase the term of office from five to eight years. We have provided that the county courts—

The PRESIDENT—The tenth section having been passed, the amendment will be in order under the head of amendments generally.

Mr. DEVELIN — I move to strike out the words in the fifth and sixth lines "for incompetency or neglect of duty." I think the solicitor ought to be removed at any time the court thinks he ought to be removed, without referring to any particular cause of removal. I would have it read, "such solicitor may be removed by the Governor, upon the recommendation of said court," without inserting any specific reasons in the Constitution. The court may have causes for his removal not being of incompetency or neglect of duty—for removal because under incompetency or neglect of duty it is doubtful whether bribery of the solicitor would be included or other circumstances of which the court might be aware, for which they might think the solicitor ought to be removed—reasons personally arising perhaps from the habits of the solicitor himself, or affecting his family, or connections, and yet they might be unable to report to the Governor that he was incompetent, or had been guilty of neglect of duty, and out of respect to feelings of others unwilling to report the real cause, at the same time thinking he was not a proper officer to defend the claims against the State. It should be left to the court to recommend to the Governor to remove the solicitor for such cause as they might think sufficient. Therefore, I move to amend, and would make it the duty of the Governor, on the recommendation of the court, to remove the solicitor.

Mr. HALE—I move to amend by inserting before the word "incompetency," in the fifth line, the words "malfeasance in office," so that it shall read, "may be removed by the Governor for malfeasance in office, incompetency or neglect of duty." The section as it now stands authorizes his removal only for neglect or for incompetency, and not for malfeasance.

Mr. DEVELIN—Every gentleman of this Convention must feel—

Mr. HALE—At the suggestion of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham], I would use the word "misconduct" in place of "malfeasance."

Mr. DEVELIN—I am satisfied with that amendment.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Develin, as modified by the acceptance of the amendment of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CHESEBRO—If there are no further amendments proposed to the section, I now move to strike it out. It seems to me that this Convention is going a little out of its way in creating an officer here who is to supersede the law officer of the State in the discharge of this duty. The State now employs, by an election by the people, an Attorney-General, whose general duty it is to take care of the interests of the State in all matters of claims against the State of every description. If this section, therefore, be stricken out entirely, the Attorney-General would, by virtue of his office, be required to take care of the interests of the State before this court. Now, what possible object is there in creating this officer, except to confer upon some favored individual an office whose duties really ought to be discharged by the regular law officer of the State?

Mr. KETCHAM—I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Did he ever know a case in which the Attorney-General attended in behalf of the State before the canal appraisers either himself or by any other person whom he provided? I venture to say there never was a case of the kind in the world.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I cannot say whether there ever was a case of that kind or not. I have no experience in that matter. If it is true, as the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Ketcham] states, that the law officer of the State never did take care of the interests of the State, it is time we had a change in that office, and I am glad we have a man there who I believe will do it.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman allow me a question? Is he aware of any Attorney-General, whether of his own particular political stripe or not, that ever did attend a court of claims?

Mr. CHESEBRO—I never knew of any court of claims in this State before this. It is now proposed to constitutionalize one. I propose to have the Attorney-General of the State take care of the interests of the State before that court. There never has been any court of claims before in this State, and if the Attorney-General has not taken care of these claims before the canal board or the canal appraisers, it is because he has not had the authority under some particular law, to appoint somebody to take care of those interests before that court. But here is a regularly organized tribunal, to consist of three judges, who are to have all the power of any common law court in this State. It is to be a regular court, and I suppose it will have its regular sessions. The State now has a law officer, whose duty it is to take care of the interests of the State in all matters of claims against it. It will be remembered that, when we discussed this matter in Committee of the Whole, a gentleman who is a member of the canal board, or of the canal appraisers [Mr. E. P. Brooks], who is not now here, was appealed to by the committee to state how long a time it would take, in his opinion, as a member of that body, to dispose of all existing claims against the State, arising from canal damages; and he stated that it would take about two years in his opinion to dispose of the present volume of cases before that tribunal. Now, here we are to create an office with a term unlimited in the Constitution, although there will not be before that court, in two years from that time, according to the estimate made by him, claims against the State which will occupy the attention of that court for any considerable length of time. I submit that there will arise necessarily between the Attorney-General of the State who is the law officer of the State, to protect it, and this solicitor, a conflict of jurisdiction which is incompatible with the office. I submit, therefore, inasmuch as, if we strike out this section entirely, it will be the duty of the Attorney-General to take care of the interests of the State before this court, as well as before any other court, that it should be stricken out.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] has made three or four mistakes in the course of his remarks here, in regard to which I propose to set him right. In the first place, we have altered this section so as to make the solicitor a five years' officer instead of a perpetual officer, by vote of this Convention. Again, under the laws of the State, the canal board are made, to a very considerable extent, to have the original jurisdiction over claims, and are the appellate court, from the canal appraisers, and the Attorney-General, by a law of the State, is one of that court, sitting as a judge and not as an advocate. It never has happened, in the history of this State, that any Attorney-General, no matter who he was, has been bound, under the law, to act as advocate of the State before the court of claims, the canal appraisers at the same time that he is to act upon any claim coming before that court as one of the judges of appeals in the case.

Digitized by Google

And it is an impossibility, so far as regards this court of claims, in respect to the business it now has on hand, for an Attorney-General to attend to the duties devolving upon the solicitor here in this section, and do any thing else. The Attorney-General is an officer of the State not in the capacity that it is necessary for him to act as solicitor in regard to claims against the State, before the court of claims or the canal appraisers. This is the law—this practice, rather—that in some instances upon a division of the canal where land has been appropriated by the State for the purposes of the canal, and they have sought for damages at the hands of the canal appraisers, that the canal commissioners have employed some local attorney for the purpose of standing by and supporting the interests of the State. In regard to these claims he is authorized to do so by law; but in no case in the history of this State has the Attorney-General undertaken to go before the court of claims or the canal appraisers for the purpose of defending the rights of the State in the matter; and he cannot, in my opinion it would be an impossibility for him to do such a thing except he did it at the expense of the entire of the rest of the duties which are devolved upon him by the statute and the Constitution.

Mr. CHESEBRO—May I be allowed to ask the gentleman a question?

The PRESIDENT—If there be no objection, the gentleman may propound his inquiry.

Mr. CHESEBRO—The gentleman knows, I suppose, that the Attorney-General has the power to employ, and does employ, an assistant attorney-general, at a salary, who can discharge this duty as well as the Attorney-General himself.

Mr. ALVORD—I will answer the gentleman in this particular. The assistant of the Attorney-General is almost entirely confined to the office—necessarily confined by the immense amount of duty that devolves upon him in that position, and very seldom, if ever, in this State, does he undertake to appear in court.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Chesebro to strike out, and it was declared lost.

Mr. GRAVES—I would like to have this section read as amended, before we pass.

The section was read as amended, and no further amendment being offered, the SECRETARY commenced to read the next section.

Mr. KRUM—I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] if this language would not meet the idea—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum] that this section has been passed.

Mr. VEEDER—If there is any change required, the Committee on Revision can do that.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

The SECRETARY then proceeded to read section 12, as follows:

SEC. 12. The Legislature shall not grant any extra compensation to any public officer, servant, agent or contractor after the service shall have been rendered, or the contract entered into, nor increase or diminish the compensation of any public officer, agent, contractor or servant, except judicial officers, during his time of service.

Mr. MORRIS—I move to strike out the words in the fourth line "increase or."

Mr. ALVORD—I would like to have the gentleman give some reasons why he would strike out "increase or." That is the entire gist of the whole section. It is that they shall not increase the compensation of any public officer, agent, contractor, or servant, except judicial officers. The amendment goes directly against the entire meaning of the section, which provides that the Legislature shall not undertake to interfere with a contract after it is once entered into and agreed to. I trust that the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, or that the Convention will vote it down.

Mr. MORRIS—I am opposed, under any circumstances, to the diminution of salaries of officers, after they have once taken their position. I do not object to having compensations diminished, to take place after incumbents vacate their office.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Morris, and it was declared lost.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move to strike out the words in the fifth line, "except judicial officers." In the Constitution of 1846 it was expressly declared that no change should be made in the compensation of judicial officers. There is no more dangerous proposition than to give to the Legislature the power to increase the compensation of those who shall define the meaning of the laws that are passed by it. All men are weak, and all men are subject to influences of money. All men are subject to the influences of an increased compensation; and when it comes up in high political times that judicial officers are to decide what is the meaning of a law that may affect the politics of the State or the interests of the gentlemen who are high in office in the State, and a bait is held out to them that if a decision is made this way or that way, their compensation may be increased, it will have a strong influence upon their views of the law and its construction, and I think it is a dangerous provision to put in the organic law, that the Legislature may increase, as it pleases, the compensation of the judicial officers of the State.

Mr. ALVORD—I am very sorry, indeed, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] has not given us the benefit of his wisdom and experience in this matter during the term in which we have held this Convention until now. We have with almost entire unanimity in the judicial article, fixed it so that it will leave it to the discretion of the Legislature to increase the salaries of judicial officers, and I will state to the gentleman that the simple reason which presented itself to the Convention was this, that our judicial officers are elected at stated terms, and that a court may commence to-day with one set of officers and a very small portion of them may be in existence as a part of the court in some years when other officers come in; and we have found the condition of things in the past to be this: that officers were sitting upon the bench of the supreme court of this State with a salary of some one thousand or fifteen hundred dollars a year less than their colleagues sitting right along side of them. It was for the purpose of meeting such exigencies that the Convention, with almost entire unanimity, have refused to insert this provision, so far as regards this matter, in the judicial article.

Mr. DEVELIN—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman has once spoken, but can speak again if there be no objection.

Objection was made.

Mr. LAPHAM—I would suggest also that in the tenth section this Convention has just passed upon this very question, by retaining the power to increase by striking out those words in that section in regard to the officers provided for there.

Mr. DEVELIN—I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—I move to strike out the words "public officers." I do not object to the previous part of that section; but I cannot see any good reason why other public officers, aside from agents, should not be placed upon the same basis with judicial officers. It smells a little too strong of the lawyer to allow no one to be benefited except judicial officers.

Mr. ALVORD—I hope that the amendment will not prevail. Very many of the public officers in this State are brought in direct contact with the Legislature, and they control, to a very considerable extent, in their opinions and views upon various subjects of legislation, local and individual as well as general and public legislation, and they should not be placed in a position by means of which they can use their power and influence in certain directions with the hope of getting a reward by the increase of their salaries. Their terms are very much shorter than those of judges. And I would also state another thing. We have placed in this Constitution a provision which is inflexible in reference to the amount which shall be paid to the members of the Legislature, and they are public officers. I trust that there is no sort of comparison, so far as judicial officers are concerned, with other public officers.

The question was then put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Hitchcock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. OPDYKE—I move to amend by inserting after the word "not," in the first line, "nor shall the common council of any city." I see no objection to inserting this here; but if it be deemed incongruous—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not think it germane to the subject-matter.

There being no further amendment offered to this section, the SECRETARY read the next section as follows:

SEC. 13. The Legislature may declare the cases in which any office shall be deemed vacant when no provision is made for that purpose in this Constitution, and shall provide for filling vacancies in office; and in cases of elective offices, any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall hold the office till a successor shall be chosen at the ensuing election and duly qualified according to law.

Mr. LAPHAM—I propose to strike out in the sixth line the words "at the ensuing election." As judicial, officers are chosen only once in two years, it may be regarded as changing the tenure of office and making a different period from that provided by the law. Those words are entirely unnecessary to effect the object of the section. The provision that the incumbent shall hold until his successor shall be chosen, and duly qualified according to law, is all that is necessary.

The question being put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, it was declared carried.

There being no further amendment offered to this section, the SECRETARY read the next section as follows:

SEC. 14. Provision shall be made by law for the removal, for misconduct or malversation in office, of all officers (except judicial), whose powers and duties are not local or legislative, and who shall be elected at general elections, and also for supplying vacancies created by such removal.

There being no amendments offered to this section, the SECRETARY read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 15. When the duration of the term of any office is not provided for by this Constitution, it may be declared by law, and if not so declared such office shall be held during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment.

There being no amendment offered to this section, the SECRETARY read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 16. The political year and Legislative term shall commence on the first day of January.

Mr. HALE—I think, under the present Constitution, the legislative term commences on the first Tuesday of January. I would suggest as an amendment—

Mr. E. BROOKS—It is the first Tuesday in January after the first Monday.

Mr. VERPLANCK—That is the time the Legislature meets. Their office commences on the first of January.

Mr. ALVORD—This conforms to the language of our present Constitution.

Mr. HALE — I withdraw my amendment then.

There being no further amendment offered to this section, the SECRETARY read the next section as follows:

SEC. 17. No street railroad shall hereafter be constructed or operated within any of the cities or incorporated villages of this State, until the consent of the local authorities of such village or city shall be first obtained for that purpose, and also the consent of the owners of at least one-half in value of the property, as fixed by the assessment roll of the previous year, on that portion of each street through or over which the same shall be constructed, be previously had and obtained for that purpose; or in case the consent of such property owners be not obtained, then with the consent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which such road shall be located to be first obtained; such consent to be first obtained and authenticated in such manner as the Legislature shall by general law for that purpose provide. The franchise allowing such railroad to be operated, when the same shall be wholly or principally operated within the limits of any city or incorporated village, shall be sold at public auction to the bidder who will build and operate said road at the lowest fare, which fare shall never be increased, after three months' public notice, describing the route of such railroad, in the State paper, and in such newspapers in the city or village where said railroad shall be located as the Legislature shall direct.

Mr. MORRIS—I move to strike out commencing in the ninth line at the words, "or in case the consent," down to the word "obtained" in the twelfth line. My object in offering this amendment is to remove serious obstructions which might be placed in the way of public improvements. It is well known that people along the line of railroads generally object to their construction; some because they think it will diminish the value of their property; some for the purpose of being bought out at exorbitant prices. There is no reason why rails for horse-cars may not be laid through streets with the same facility as railroads where steam-cars are used. Railroad companies running steam-cars have the right to select any route they may choose: they may go through any part of any town or any farm or country seat—the public are to be obliged and not the individuals residing along the line of such railroad. In the case of horse-cars, a much larger number of persons travel daily over the same line than in cars which are propelled by steam; and, therefore, a much larger number of the public are to be consulted and obliged. It is probable that forty millions of passengers are carried daily by the horse cars of New York and its vicinity. The section, as it now stands, makes unnecessary difficulties and delays, and impedes public improvement. If the motion proposed is adopted, the owners of property in cities and villages will be sufficiently protected, and the objects which we desire to accomplish will be best attained.

Mr. ALVORD—I move that this Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 17, 1868.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. SMILES.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. HADLEY—I ask leave of absence for Mr. Lapham, for the reason that he is sole counsel in an important case which is noticed for trial next week. He, therefore, desires leave of absence indefinitely until that case can be tried.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I rise to object, and I take the liberty of saying why I object. I am willing to assent to such a request for a sufficient reason given—

The PRESIDENT—The question is, "Shall leave of absence be granted?" It is not a matter for discussion.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I am not going to discuss it; I was simply going to say that I would be very happy to grant leave of absence to any member of this Convention, when necessary, in a case of sickness, for instance, or any of the other cases of necessity that might arise; but where the reason given is a mere matter of business, I am not willing to grant leave of absence, because I suppose half the members of this Convention have equally good reasons of that character for being absent, with the gentleman for whom leave of absence has just been asked. I have already said here, and I repeat now, that gentlemen should have considered the matter well before they accepted the responsibilities and honors, to say nothing of the emoluments [laughter] of this position. In all the localities from which gentlemen have been sent here, there were other individuals ready to take the place and perform its duties, and members having accepted the responsibilities and duties of the position, should give them the precedence of all private business.

Mr. HADLEY—Few members of the Convention have been more regular in their attendance here than the gentleman for whom I have asked leave of absence now. He has already stayed away from circuit after circuit to attend on the deliberations of this Convention; but here is a case where my friend is sole counsel, and involving fifty or sixty thousand dollars; a case which has already been three times tried, and which is noticed again by the opposite party for a fourth trial. Now, the question is, will the Convention deny him leave of absence under such circumstances?

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—The question is, "Shall the Convention give way; or shall the gentleman's case give way?" [Laughter.]

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hadley, to grant leave of absence to Mr. Lapham, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CHESEBRO—As Mr. Lapham has been granted leave of absence to attend the trial of a cause, and as he has served on me a subpœna to attend as a witness in the supreme court, I now ask leave of absence for that purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALVORD—I must object, for the reason that the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] is not bound, under the law, to attend in response to the subpœna.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to know why?

Mr. ALVORD—As a matter of privilege.

The question was put upon granting Mr. Chesebro leave of absence, and it was declared lost.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I hope the Convention will call upon the supreme court to excuse me for non-attendance upon this subpœna.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If we keep the gentleman here, I think the case will probably go over on account of his absence, and then Mr Lapham will return. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER—I ask leave of absence for myself for to-morrow and Monday, in consequence of being subpœnaed to attend as a witness in court.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I object, of course.

The question was put on granting leave of absence to Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost

Mr. FERRY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That from this time, henceforth, fifty members shall constitute a working quorum, for the transaction of the ordinary business of the Convention, provided, however, that its work as finally prepared for submission to the people shall be adopted by a majority of all the members elected.

Resolved, That hereafter upon the assembling of the Convention each day, after the reading of the Journal, the roll of members shall be called, and no member who shall be absent therefrom, shall receive pay for that day, and in case an adjournment shall afterward take place, at any time during that day, by reason of the want of a working quorum, the members absent at the time of such adjournment shall likewise be denied pay.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman rising to debate this resolution, it lies on the table under the rule.

The PRESIDENT announced the special order of the day to be the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, upon the report of the Standing Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature; the seventeenth section being under consideration, and the question being upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Morris, to strike out from the seventeenth section all after the word "purpose," in the fourth line, down to, and including the word "obtained" in the twelfth line.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Morris, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move, sir, to strike out from this section all after the word "provide," in the fourteenth line. The design on the part of the committee who reported this article was to prevent favoritism in the city of New York in reference to franchises for street railroads, and it is provided by this part of the article that when the necessary consent for the construction of the road is obtained, the sale of the franchise should be offered at a public auction on three months' notice, and sold to the bidder who would build and operate the road for the lowest rate of fare. I would like to ask the chairman of that committee what would be the result if there should be two bidders bidding the same amount? In that case there would be no lowest bidder. Suppose a person living upon the line of this road and opposed to it, after practical men, who had estimated for what rate of fare the road could be built and operated had put in their bids, say at five cents fare, should bid three cents. The contract would be struck off to him as the lowest bidder, and after two or three months had elapsed, and it was ascertained that he had no intention whatever to build the road, it must be advertised and again sold; and this process might be repeated, and so the construction of the road defeated. While I would be entirely willing to have the work go to the person who would build and run the road at the lowest rate of fare, I certainly would not leave it in a position where the whole project could be defeated in this way by any one who was opposed to the road.

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] give way for a moment?

Mr. VERPLANCK—With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. RUMSEY—If he will look at the original report in this case, he will find that this section, as it now stands, is not the section reported by the committee at all. They reported simply a provision that the franchises should be sold at public auction, and that the whole avails of such sale should belong to the city or town in which the road was located.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I am happy to hear the explanation of the gentleman, because with the great ability which characterizes the report of this committee, I was surprised in reading this report to notice this feature of it. I now remember that I was present at the debate on this subject in Committee of the Whole, and I recollect that the article as it now stands was the work of that committee. The design on the part of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, was to benefit the public by selling the franchises at public auction for the benefit of the city or village in which the road was located, but if sold in the manner now proposed it was claimed in Committee of the Whole that the persons residing on the line of the road would get the benefit. It will be seen that no road can possibly be constructed under this section if there is any wish to prevent it. The Legislature, under this section, have not the power to secure the building of a road.

Mr. ALVORD—I have been inclined to believe, sir, that in all cases these franchises should be disposed of in a way to benefit the community, and that, in most of these instances, particularly in our large cities, a railroad franchise is worth a great deal more than the mere cost of laying down the track and fitting it for public use, and I would rather amend this provision so that the franchises may be sold to the highest bidder, and the money arising therefrom go to the benefit of the community, than to strike it all out.

Mr. RUMSEY—I would say to the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that he will attain his object if he will make a motion that we strike out the report of the committee disagreeing with the original section.

Mr. ALVORD—Then I move to so amend the section as to restore this portion of it in the form reported originally by the committee reporting the article. In connection with this matter I desire to say that it has been contended, and I do not know that it has ever been controverted so far as regards the city of New York, that there are none of those franchises but what are worth a very large amount of money. I know that in some instances responsible parties have been in attendance upon the Legislature, and have pledged themselves upon paper over their own signatures to pay into the city treasury for the privilege of constructing a road upon Broadway, two millions of dollars. Now, sir, if these franchises are worth so much money, and if exclusive privileges are granted to parties who enjoy these franchises, it would be well that they should be paid for. I am aware of the fact that the article in regard to this matter, leaving it in the shape in which it is now, goes upon the assumption that the larger portion of those who use these roads are among the poor of the community, and that the benefit immediately accruing to them by permitting these franchises to be sold to persons who would build the roads and run them for the lowest rates of fare would be greater than in any other way; but I am rather doubtful myself whether alms should be given in this way. I am inclined to believe that a fair price should be put upon the transportation of passengers, and that any benefit or advantage arising from the sale of these franchises should accrue to the locality for the general benefit of the tax payers: and with that view of the case, when this matter was up in Committee of the Whole, I voted in that direction against the present proposition, and I trust that upon reflection the Convention will come to the conclusion that the course I have indicated is the wisest that can be taken.

Mr. LAPHAM—I am in favor or this substitution proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and I will state one reason which is controlling in my mind on the subject. To allow the franchises to be disposed of in the manner provided in the section as it has been reported from the Committee of the Whole would lead necessarily to this result: combinations of persons interested might make an arrangement by which they would bid off the franchises for the road at a price double the actual cost of operating it, precisely in the same manner in which combinations to let contracts to the lowest bidder have resulted in that way. The matter would be entirely beyond the control of the Legislature. Now, I desire to have these roads subject at all times, with reference to their rates of fare, to legislation, so that they can have remunerative prices only, and that they will not be put in a condition where, by abusing their trust, they can get prices grossly above the line of maximum of a reasonable remuneration. There is another reason why I favor this substitution, and it is that all advantage to these particular parties growing out of the exercise of these franchises is a disadvantage to some extent individually, to the citizens of the localities; and therefore whatever can be realized from the sale of these franchises should be given for the local benefit of the city in which they are located.

Mr. REYNOLDS—I was about to move an amendment, that these franchises shall be sold to the highest bidder, and for the shortest number of years. In our new cities these franchises may, and probably will, increase greatly in value as time rolls on, and the franchises sold now will be worth, twenty or fifty years from now, at least three or four times as much as they are at present. I therefore propose the amendment I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT—The amendment must be an amendment to that offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] in order to be received at this stage.

Mr. REYNOLDS—I have in my hand the original section, as it was reported by the committee, and I propose to insert after the word "figure," the words "and for the shortest period of time."

Mr. E. BROOKS—There is unquestionably justice in the amendment which the gentleman has suggested, but I think some definite time ought to be named in the amendment, say ten or twenty years, at the end of which these franchises should be sold. Otherwise the proposition would prevent the accomplishment of what is desired by inducing people rather not to bid than to bid.

Mr. REYNOLDS—I want to leave the whole question open to the bidders to let them bid for the highest price and the shortest period of time.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I do not think that really means any thing. It is so indefinite in its statement as to accomplish no practical result. I should say that the franchises should be sold for at least twenty years. Then when a party makes a bid for a railroad franchise he knows what he is about, and how long the benefit is to accrue to him. While I am on the floor I wish to express the hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] will be adopted instead of the proposition now before the Convention. I will give a single reason drawn from my own experience, why a proposition like this ought to be adopted. As I have said before in this Convention, I was made the organ in the State Senate of offering two millions of dollars, the money to be placed in the city treasury of the city of New York, for the right to make a railroad on Broadway, or parallel with Broadway. Yet such was the influence in the Legislature of interested parties that the proposition failed to be accepted, and the Legislature was afterward content to make such a grant without getting a single cent from the city in return for that great franchise. Now, every gentleman knows that the laying of roads on streets in large cities, is, to a certain extent, a great obstruction in the way of the common intercourse and traffic on the streets, and I think it is plainly the right, either that those who have the benefits of such a franchise should keep the streets in repair—I mean the whole street—or that they should pay some considerable amount into the city treasury in return for the benefits they receive. If these franchises can be disposed of at public auction, I have no doubt that the result will be a very large diminution of taxes, and that in this way great benefits will be conferred upon the public.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I participated in the discussion which led to the change which was made in this section in Committee of the Whole and it seems to me undesirable to occupy the time of the Convention now with any further discussion upon the subject. But I do not agree with the suggestions that have been made here tending to justify the change proposed in this section. I look upon such railroads, street railroads, in a light entirely different from that in which they are viewed by the gentlemen who have spoken here upon that subject. I look upon these roads as a great boon to every class in the community instead of being a boon merely to the stock-holders. I know it is not the design, but to read the article as it was originally reported, and as it will stand if this amendment shall be adopted, one would think that it was the design of the Convention to obstruct in every possible way the construction of any more street railroads in the cities of this State, and that street railroads were, in the language of the books in regard to a certain class of animals, ferœ naturæ, and that it was the duty of every good man to wage war to the death with each and all of them.

Digitized by Google

Now, sir, I undertake to say that street railroads, instead of being subjects that it is the business of the Convention to fight and destroy, are institutions that it is the duty of every good citizen of the State to foster and endeavor to multiply in number.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Certainly.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I would ask the gentleman, as I have asked the Convention, whether the provision now in this article will not prevent the construction of any street railroads?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I answer that it will not do so as fully as this proposed amendment would. Will the gentleman tell me what the difficulty is in the present form of the provision?

Mr. VERPLANCK—I have already stated it. You advertise the sale of your franchise for three months, and parties who really desire and intend to build the road, bid, at what they consider a remunerative price, and a person opposed to the construction of the road, but who has no intention to build it, bids a lower sum, and it must be struck off to such person. The road is not built, and after some time has elapsed, the franchise has to be advertised again, and the same process is reneated—

The PRESIDENT—The time of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. REYNOLDS—I will modify the words that I proposed to insert after the word "figures," in this way: "for a period not to exceed twenty years."

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Upon that amendment, Mr. President, I desire to say a word. It is said by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham], to my surprise, that this is going to put the matter under the control of the Legislature, and enable the Legislature to change the rates of fare upon these roads if they are found to be more than remunerative. I should like to know under what part of our State Constitution, or our National Constitution, if a party has bought a franchise and paid his money for it, the conditions of that franchise can be changed. If the railroad be built, it is a monopoly bought and paid for, for a stipulated period of time, and the conditions cannot be changed. But I have heretofore said all I desired to say on this subject, and I will close by protesting that the cities and towns, generally, of this State, ought not to be made to suffer because of the state of things in that locality from which the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] comes, and in regard to which he speaks. If the city of New York is so rich that a railway is worth so much to the stockholders there, that furnishes no reason why we, in the other parts of the State, who are scarcely able to get a railroad by contribution and by every other means that we can devise, should be loaded with the same burdens which are found to be desirable, and to be wisely imposed in the city of New York.

Mr. E. BROOKS—One word in reply to the gentleman. What difference does it make whether the locality be rich or poor? For example: the constituents of the honorable gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] desire to have a railroad in the city of Troy, and the franchise is put up at public auction and sold. If it brings one thousand dollars the city gets the benefit of it. If it brings but one hundred they still get the benefit of it. If in the city of New York a franchise brings a larger sum, the city gets the benefit of it. The amount paid for the franchise, be it large or small, will be in proportion to the value of the franchise, and it does not affect the principle in the least.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If it be in order before the vote is taken, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. Reynolds], what will become of his railroad after the twenty years have elapsed?

Mr. REYNOLDS—I suppose the franchises will return again to the State, to be sold again to the highest bidder, and that in the mean time the city may have doubled its population, and the franchise, therefore, may have become worth double as much as it was before.

Mr. COMSTOCK—To whom will the rails and ties belong?

Mr. REYNOLDS—Those who bid for the franchise in the first place, will bid, I suppose, with the understanding that the road is to revert to the State at the end of the specified term, just as persons do before building upon other people's property.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Reynolds, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BERGEN—I move to add in the second line, after the word "cities," the word "towns," so that it will read. "No street railroad shall hereafter be constructed or operated within any of the cities, towns, or incorporated villages of this State." There will also be required some slight change in the latter part of the section to correspond with this. My object in making this motion is this: This Convention appears to deem it necessary that the construction of these railroads should be subject to the consent of the cities and villages through which they may pass, and also to the consent, of at least the owners of one-half the property (in value) on the line of the road. But the towns are left without any restriction whatever, in this respect. Now, in the county of Kings, there are some three or four railroads outside the city of Brooklyn running all the way across towns, and there are others in contemplation. If it is to be left as it now stands, without this amendment, parties may incorporate and build their roads through the towns, not only without the consent of the inhabitants on the lines of road, but also without the consent of the town authorities. In my judgment, it is unjust to leave the matter in that situation—to guard the cities and villages, and leave the towns unguarded. If it is just that the consent of the owners of property along those roads should be obtained in cities and villages, it is certainly just that the same consent should be obtained from citizens along the lines of road built outside the cities and villages. For this reason I move this amendment. In my judgment, the whole section should be stricken out. I doubt the propriety of clogging the Constitution with any thing of this kind. The effect of this section if adopted, will be this: it will be a great favor to present railways, a great boon to their owners, who will in consequence of its retarding the building of opposition roads, rejoice at it; and you could not do them a greater favor than to put this article or section in the Constitution.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to amend in line nine, by inserting after the word "owners" the word "cannot." The Convention will observe that this section provides for obtaining the consent of the owners of property along the line of the road, and then it says that if that consent be not obtained, they may apply to the supreme court for its consent to construct the road. Now, as the section stands, they can go to the supreme court in the first instance, because it does not say that they may apply to the supreme court, provided the consent of the owners cannot be obtained, but provided it be not obtained.

Mr. OPDYKE—I hope that this amendment will be adopted. I think the objection urged by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] has great force. The committee certainly intended, and I hope the Convention intend, that it is only after having tried to get the consent of the property owners, and having failed to do so, that application can be made to the supreme court for authority to construct street railroads.

Mr. VEEDER—My amendment is to strike out the word "not," and insert before the word "be," the word "cannot."

Mr. OPDYKE—I should prefer the phraseology to be something like this: "that in case the consent of the property owners be refused," but the pending amendment is to the same effect. It will be perceived that the objection of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], to the present form of expression is well founded, because as it now stands, applicants need not go to the property owners at all.

Mr. VEEDER—As the word "obtain" occurs in the section immediately preceding, I think it is better to retain it here also.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Veeder, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HALE—If there are no further amendments to be offered I move to strike out the seventeenth section.

Mr. STRATTON—That is a motion I was about to make myself. I think this section will work mischief, and be productive of no good, and will not attain the object for which it was intended. In the first place therefore, persons cannot go through the ordeal which this section provides in order to become the owners of the franchise of a street railroad. Suppose that they comply with the first condition, and they obtain the consent of the majority of the proper owners? Having done that at great expense and trouble, they have then before them the expense of an application to the supreme court, and having made that application, and obtained the consent of the court, then the whole thing is set afloat subject to the combinations of parties against those who have spent their money in complying with these first and second conditions, and so they will run the risk of losing all their time, trouble and expense by being overbid by other parties who come in after all these preliminaries, and purchase the charter at a higher price than those who have complied with the first conditions can afford to pay after having already expended so much money and time. My second objection to this section is, that we have already provided for every thing that is necessary in relation to these street railroads. In the article upon corporations, we have provided that corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created or amended by special acts, except municipal corporations. The Legislature, therefore, under that provision of the Constitution must provide by general law for the building of these street railroads. In the article now under consideration we provide in the twentieth section, that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in either of the following cases, and among these cases is the granting to any individual, association or corporation the right to lay down railroad tracks in any locality within this State. I think, therefore, that when we have adopted this twentieth section of this article in connection with the article upon corporations, we have provided such safeguards, as that the Legislature cannot, by any special legislation, create these street railroad corporations.

Mr. RUMSEY—I apprehend that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stratton] does not realize the condition of things that will exist unless there be some restriction put upon the power of creating these railroad corporations beyond the general law which the Legislature is required to pass. What is the provision in the Constitution upon this subject? It is that by general law, and only by general law, shall provision be made for laying down rails in any locality in this State. Adopt that and put no restriction upon the companies that will be organized under that law, and the result will be that the company may organize themselves under the general law, and there is nothing to prohibit them from going into any and every street in the city of New York and laying down railroads without the consent of the local authorities, without the consent of the landholders and without any consent whatever.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RUMSEY—Yes, sir.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I desire to ask if the law as it stands now, and as it has stood since 1850, does not require that consent of the local authorities in such cases?

Mr. RUMSEY—I do not understand that it does.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I understand that it does.

Mr. RUMSEY—There is a provision that the local authorities shall not give that power without the consent of the Legislature.

Mr. VEEDER—The law of 1860 takes away from the local authorities of the city of New York the right of granting franchises to construct street railroads, and vests that right absolutely in the Legislature.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—That is the law in regard to the city of New York, but the general law is otherwise.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RUMSEY—What we propose is to allow localities in which these roads are to be constructed to judge of the propriety of their construction; and unless you adopt that provision there is nothing to prevent parties from laying down a railroad anywhere they please.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope the motion to strike out this section will prevail. I have no language strong enough to express my own sense of the inexpediency of undertaking to frame a code of constitutional law upon this subject. Now, in reference to this section, there is nothing in its details that ought to commend it to the favor of the Convention. All that there is meritorious in the first part of the section is already in the existing law. My recollection is entirely in accordance with that of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], that the law of the State now provides that no street railway can be built in a town without the consent of the local or municipal authorities. And moreover, if I am not wholly mistaken in my recollection, the law also provides that the consent of a majority of the landholders along the line of the road must also be obtained. Unless my recollection is at fault, we have now in the existing law of the State all that is proposed to be put in the first of this section of the Constitution.

Mr. RUMSEY—With the permission of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] I will make a suggestion. It is this, that the local authorities had that power until the law of 1862 took it away from them, but under that law they have no power whatever over the matter.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would like to see that law of 1862 made so by the Legislature. The observation of the gentleman suggests that public opinion, let alone what is expedient and just, is liable to change from time to time as circumstances may change. It is founded upon an erroneous principle, to undertake to insert such a code in the organic law; for, when we find that it will not work well, or that it is inconvenient in its practical operations, we have no power to change it. Now, it is required by another section of this same article that street railroads shall be built under general laws, and that no special laws to that end shall be passed. I take it for granted that whatever general law shall be enacted upon this subject will be a just, fair, and wise law; I take it for granted that it will be a law requiring the consent of the municipal authorities of the city, and the consent of the owners of property also, or a majority of such owners. Why should it not? Why should we anticipate that the Legislature will pass a law which ought not to be passed—a law that would be unwise and unstatesmanlike? Why should we refuse to have any confidence whatever in the wisdom and intelligence of the Legislature?

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I would like to answer the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] by saying that all the laws that have been heretofore passed by the Legislature have never required the obtaining of such consent.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I think the gentleman is mistaken. That consent has been obtained; but, if not so, I agree that the law should require that such consent should be obtained. But I agree, also, and insist, that the subject belongs to the legislative power, and does not belong in the Constitution of the State. Circumstances may change, and I am opposed to fixing this unalterably in the organic law. Allow me one word in regard to the idea of putting up these franchises at public auction. This suggestion has something plausible in it, no doubt; there is something attractive in the idea of selling these franchises for a large sum of money; but, after all, the real question is, do the public gain any thing by that? I tell you, Mr. President, the purchaser of such franchises will get his compensation back in the fare that he will charge for the carrying of passengers. The passengers will gain nothing by it, but will lose. Suppose a franchise cost the purchasers ten millions in the city of New York. They must get that back again, and they will get it back again; and whenever you go to the Legislature to regulate the fares upon such a railroad, you will find the subject essentially beyond legislative control, for you will be met with the plea that the purchaser has paid ten million dollars for the franchise of operating a city railroad, and he must have that paid back in fares that he receives for the carrying of passengers. This subject, in my judgment, should be left to the discretion and regulation of legislative power. I think it wholly inexpedient and unwise to say any thing in the Constitution in regard to it.

Mr. VEEDER—When this subject was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the Convention will remember that I made a motion to strike out the entire section. I have not changed my views on the subject since. So far as this section is concerned, in requiring the consent of the local authorities to the construction and operation of street railroads, I am entirely in favor of it; but, sir, I think that the subject can be properly considered and properly provided for in the article reported by the Committee on Cities in reference to these franchises. By the statutes of 1860 the Legislature took from the local authorities of the city of New York the absolute control which they had previously possessed, to allow the construction and operation of street railroads, and vested the power exclusively in the Legislature. By a provision in the charter of the city of Brooklyn, an amendment was inserted, by which the local authorities were prohibited from authorizing the construction and operation of city railroads, the same as in the city of New York, and we now have to come to the Legislature to obtain the right to construct a street railroad. Then we go back, having that consent, and do not require the consent of the property-holders along the line of the proposed road. I believe it is so in other cities; I believe that horse railroads or street railroads in Syracuse, Utica, and elsewhere, have been built under various acts of the Legislature, and not with the assent or license of the city authorities. But, sir, this subject, I think, has its proper place in the article reported by the Committee on Cities; and I think that a provision should be made delegating absolutely to the local authorities of the various cities this power for the construction and operation of railroads, as well as many other powers that have been usurped by the Legislature from time to time.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Being one of the committee which has brought this matter before the Convention, in reference to the powers and duties of the Legislature, I have been anxious that all the parts of this report should be retained as we originally adopted it, after considerable consultation and discussion. I was desirous that every restriction on the legislative powers which was likely to prevent the collection of what is commonly called the "lobby," for the purpose of advancing individual interests (although the advance of these interests might be productive of public good, yet not to as great an extent in proportion, as individual interests are promoted by it) should be incorporated in the Constitution to prevent the recurrence of evils of that kind. This article contains such restrictions on the powers of the Legislature—the Legislature being the supreme power in the absence of restrictions in the Constitution. So far as the objection which has been made by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] that this article is not the proper place for the clause, it seems to me that it is a place as proper as it is for any other restriction which is contained in the article. It appears to me that the Legislature should be restrained from exercising its powers, from time to time, capriciously or otherwise, in regard to its invasion of private rights in the authorizing of these roads in cities, which, although they perform a public service, yet do trespass upon private rights. In regard to the clause which the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has referred to, providing for the sale of these franchises at public auction, to the lowest bidder, I agree with him entirely, and have always held that opinion, in matters of that kind, in the city of New York. I have always urged in the granting of these franchises, so far as it depends upon the consent or license of the city authorities, that they should be given to those who will run their cars at the lowest rates of fare; that in that way the greatest public good could be obtained. It takes from the officers of the city the management of large sums of money and the necessity of their investment, which is always a danger to be avoided wherever we can. It has been by means of these city railroads that the city of New York has grown, and is still increasing in numbers, population and wealth. Without them, the business of the city could not be carried on as it is. It appears to me, if gentlemen will consider it, that this is the proper place (if they are not opposed to the principle of restricting the Legislature in regard to these grants) to make the restriction. I hope, therefore, that the seventeenth section will be retained.

Mr. OPDYKE—I am unable to appreciate the force of the objections that have been urged to this section. On the contrary, I regard it as the most valuable and necessary section of the article. What are the facts and circumstances which justify and demand it? It has been said already that the legislation upon this subject has not been uniform, that it has established one rule for the city of New York, and another rule for other portions of the State. Now, sir, these railroad franchises in the city of New York, it is well known, are of more value than those of all the other cities and villages in the State combined. In regard to those, the Legislature has taken from the local authorities—from the people of the city of New York—all control over this matter; and the sum of ten million dollars, which has been named by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], as a sum that would be likely to be given for these franchises, and which is to be drawn again from those who travel upon the roads as passengers, is probably what the franchises heretofore granted would be worth. And that sum has been given away to legislative jobbers, who have put it into their pockets, and who are now charging passengers as much as they could have obtained if they had paid a fair compensation for their franchises. This is the existing status. We desire to correct this and to have these grants made in accordance with the principles of justice. To do this we propose to take from the Legislature the power of continuing this policy of injustice and inequality. And what do we require? It is simply that no street railroad, in any city or village, shall be constructed without the consent of the local authorities; in other words, without the authority of the people of the city or village. Is not that right? Should legislative jobbers be permitted through legislative action to foist an injurious incumbrance upon a city or village without the consent of the people of the locality? If it be an accommodation to the public, the people will at once, and the local authorities will at once grant the needed authority, and especially if it is necessary for the convenience and prosperity of the locality. The section requires that besides the consent of the local authorities, there shall be obtained the consent of a majority in interest of the owners of the property on the street. But knowing that human nature is selfish, and that private interest sometimes stands in the way of the public good, it is provided that if the majority in interest of the property holders refuse their sanction to the grant, then the applicants may go to the supreme court; and if, in the judgment of that tribunal the public good will be promoted by the grant, they have the power of overruling the action of the property holders. I can conceive of no possible rule that can be established, more equitable, more just, and more free from valid objection. With this view, I cannot conceive how it is possible that this Convention can refuse to put into the organic law a provision so conducive to good, and so fatal to practices not only wrong in themselves, but which have disgraced our State for years. I do not see how members can possibly refuse to do so, and I trust the section will be retained.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I have but a few words to say in reference to this subject. When we speak about the value of these franchises in the city of New York, I put it to this Convention whether those who own these franchises will desire these obstructions upon the building of the roads or not. I ask this Convention which action would be in the interest of those who hold railroad franchises now in the city of New York? Let us not make any mistake about it. If we mean to aid the city railroad monopolies, if we mean to aid railroads which carry in a car designed for thirty passengers over seventy, leaving forty to stand up and hang on to the straps inside or the rails outside, if we mean to act in their aid, let us understand it. But if we mean to act in the aid of the other class let us understand that. Do not let us lay the flattering unction to our souls that we are acting in opposition to the present railroad interest of New York by incorporating this provision. I submit it for the consideration of the intelligence of this Convention as to what is for the interest of this monopoly; what is likely to put obstructions in the way of building of future roads in the city of New York? Is not this section drawn and put into shape in the interest of the obstruction—in the interest of the existing roads? If it is not drawn and put into shape in the interest of obstruction and the existing roads, I should like to know in what interest it was drawn and for what purpose, except to prevent the building of more roads. If it be an evil, let us stop it entirely; but if we do not mean to prevent the chartering of any more railroads by persons who compel seventy persons to ride in a car that is designed for the accommodation of thirty, it seems to me this provision should not be adopted. I wish to say another thing to the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder]. I have had occasion to examine the laws upon this subject, and I can assure the Convention that a street railway cannot be laid under the general law, as it exists at the present time, through any city other than New York and Brooklyn. I do not know but there may be special laws in regard to these cities; but they cannot be laid in any city in the State other than those without first obtaining consent of the local authorities. I know there was an attempt made in my own town, but the existing roads had the power to distribute stock and by that means they prevented the common council from giving any more accommodations.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale to strike out the section, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 29 to 24.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—As I consider this subject one of vast importance, I feel called upon to raise the point of order that there was no quorum voting.

Mr. HADLEY—The gentleman can accomplish all he desires by moving the reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Then I will take that course.

The PRESIDENT—The motion to reconsider will lie on the table, under the rule.

The being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 18. No office shall be created for weighing gauging, culling or inspecting merchandise, manufactures, produce, or commodity whatever; but nothing in this section contained shall affect any office created for the purpose of protecting the public health or the interests of the State in its property, revenue, tolls or purchases, or of supplying the people with correct standards of weights and measures, or shall prevent the creation of any offices for such purposes hereafter.

Mr. ALVORD—In order to make sense of this section, we should either strike out the word "whatever," in the third line. or insert the word "any" in the second line between the word "inspecting" and the word "merchandise." I am inclined to think that the latter is the best amendment, and I therefore offer it.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. WALES—I offer the following amendment:

The SECRETARY read the amendment, as follows:

Insert after the word "but," in the third line, the following: "the Legislature shall provide, that such business as weighing, measuring, gauging, culling and inspecting merchandise, manufactures and produce, shall be done under license, and not otherwise."

Mr. WALES—I do not now propose to go over the argument I imperfectly made when I proposed this amendment in Committee of the Whole; but I do desire, in the most earnest manner, to call the attention of this Convention to the magnitude of this question. Every person who purchases for his own consumption flour, sugar, salt, leather—almost any of the necessaries of life—is to feel, for good or for evil, the acceptance or rejection of this amendment. Pass it, and you throw responsibility upon those who act as umpires between the producer and consumer; reject it, and you leave the consumer without protection. The entire internal trade of the State is to be affected by your action on this question. The only argument attempted against this amendment is that it would create a body of officers to execute it. This is substantially the ground taken by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. In his fervid, earnest, impassioned mannner he warned us against this evil. If there had been any thing else to have been said against it, his sagacity would have discovered it. Now, I take it, that if his premises are wrong, his conclusions fail. Are licensees officers, either in fact, or by any fair inference? A licensee is permitted to do certain acts—these acts being voluntary. An officer is authorized to perform certain duties—these duties being mandatory. Are your peddlers, your hackmen, your carmen, your pawn-brokers, your hotel-keepers, officers? The mere enumeration of them shows that they are not. There are in this great State about ten thousand bar-rooms and saloons for the sale of intoxicating drinks. You throw the protection of the law about this business and require a certificate of good character, to be given of the licensee, before he enters upon this business of questionable morality. Yet, the man who inspects the flour that every poor man eats, does it without accountability or responsibility. I protest against this discrimination in favor of intoxicating drinks; and ask protection for bread. In this connection I wish to read from the proceedings of the Farmers' Club of the American Institute, an association under the protection of the State and making annual reports to the Legislature:

"At the meeting of the Farmers' Club held yesterday the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted. The committee appointed by the Chair were F. C. Treadwell, Sen., Solon Robinson, Dr. Z. E. Snodgrass, Wm. S. Carpenter, S. Edwards Todd—to which, on motion, Alderman Ely, Chairman of the Club, was added.

"WHEREAS, About forty years ago, the city and county of New York had under the protection of a law of the State, a standard grade of superfine flour, fully equal, if not superior, to the standard of any other State in this Union: and whereas, under the faithful enforcement of that law, the reputation of New York superfine flour was from previous depression raised above that of most of the other States, both at home and abroad; and whereas, under the practical abolition and disuse of the inspection laws, the reputation of New York superfine flour has sunk to such a depth of degradation that sales of it in our market are daily reported at less than half the price of good superfine flour in other States, and the declaration is publicly made by gentlemen from other States that 'it is a remaakable fact that a New York brand of superfine is enough to condemn a barrel of flour as bad,' and to the end that the wheat of the farmers of the State of New York, as well as the flour made from it may be raised to its former high rank and character; therefore be it

"Resolved, By the Farmers' Club of the American Institute, that a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to consider and report to the club such measures as may be deemed needful to restore the character of New York flour to its former high standing, and to protect the public health from the evil effects of deleterious or poisonous food; also, to prepare memorials to the Governor and Legislature, for their consideration, and for such action and relief in the premises as they may be able to afford."

This resolution was passed on about the 10th of December, 1866.

On the 8th of January, 1867, the committee made a report, from which I read:

"At a meeting of the American Institute Farmers' Club, on Tuesday, the following report was presented by the committee upon the subject of unsound flour:

"In their report of last week the committee confined themselves to a brief statement of the Constitution and laws of the State of New York relating to the inspection of flour, and the appointment of inspectors of flour, meats, etc. They now report a statement of facts in relation to the manufacture and sale of unsound, sour and musty bad flour. * * *

"The transactions of the Corn Exchange in putting off unsound flour, through brokers and dealers, are fraudulent beyond description. Bad, very bad flour is passed off as superfine. No lower grade is generally known. In a single case where a sample of middlings or ship stuff was sent in for sale, it was remarked by millers and dealers that the miller who ground it did not know his business—that superfine flour could be made of it. * * *

"Much of the flour branded superfine is made of refuse stuff, sometimes mingled with damaged, even caked wheat, beaten apart by shovels, and turned in with other and less damaged wheat, and sent to the mills to be ground altogether. Millers at the South reserve the best flour of their grinding, mark it 'family' and sell it at home. The next run or quality they mark or brand 'extra,' and send it to New York. Shippers who buy flour for export, put on what mark or brand they please. * * *

"No reliance is or can be placed in the integrity of any brand. One lot may be of fair quality, and the next vile stuff. You must buy by sample and hold the seller strictly to it, or examine every barrel of flour yourself, and test it by mixing and baking, or you are very likely—almost sure—to be cheated. * * *

"One gentleman wanted to buy a large parcel of good flour, and applied to a dealer in wheat to tell of a miller who could supply him. The wheat dealer named a miller who, he said, had lately bought a parcel of 'prime wheat.' On application to that miller, the latter stated that the 'prime wheat' proved unsound; that the flour made from it was still on hand, and must be kept until he could find a customer for it. The parties were too well acquainted not to know that unsound flour, if sold as sound, would be returned.

"A practical miller stated that in grinding a lot of wheat he supposed was turned in as sound, he found it bad, and that the flour was kept on hand a while and then sold to a baker. Of such flour was much of the bread made which was furnished for the soldiers and sailors during the late rebellion." * * *

What is said here of flour is, I think, equally true of fish and pork. It is very difficult to find an "original" package of mackerel in the New York market. The Boston and other eastern inspections of that article, are bought up by speculators in New York and re-packed there, making five or six packages from each barrel, which are sold for quarter barrels. The gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] and the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] say, "see them weighed." Very well. You see them weighed. They seem to be correct. Who is to tell how much of the package is fish, or how much is salt? What is true of fish, is, to a certain extent, true of pork. These articles are necessaries of life, and so great are the frauds practiced in them, that it is a subject of debate, to what extent the public health is affected by these frauds. The Institute Farmers' Club say, in a portion of their report, that the Legislature now have the power of appointing inspectors of provisions, meats, grains, flour, meal and bread, for the purpose of preserving the public health. Among the governments of civilized people, I believe that New York is the only one that leaves the health and the interests of its citizens, to the unfeeling cupidity of speculation. Mr. President, it may be set down as a political axiom, that the necessities of trade and commerce are greater than even constitutional law. Where they come in conflict, business rends the barriers placed in the way; and, with unerring elasticity, resumes its normal condition. You placed in your Constitution a section abrogating all your inspection laws. It did not stop inspection for a day. Absolutely necessary in some cases, and a great convenience in others; it has been kept up to this day—it will be kept up while commerce lasts The question is, shall this inspection be done legally or illegally? With responsibility, or without it? protecting the interests of the ignorant, the unwary, the weak, against the cupidity of speculators, or affording them no protection? Mr. President, your Constitution says that no office shall be created for inspecting any commodity whatever. But overriding its own provisions in the fundamental law, this great State, in 1859, found it necessary for its own protection, and for the protection of its customers, to create the office of inspector of salt; that its manufacture of that article might go forth to its customers with such marks of quantity and quality as might be implicitly relied upon. I thank the Convention for the courtesy of extending my time, and for their kindness in listening to me.

Mr. ALVORD—Mr. President, the crying evils of the system of inspection, gauging, weighing, culling and measuring, were so great previous to 1846 that this board of officers had the management, control, and absolute disposition of the sale of the property of the men in the interior who were compelled to send their property to market. So great was this evil that the people of this State, almost unanimously, petitioned, the Convention of 1846 that this system should be abolished, and it was accordingly abolished; and I have yet to learn, sir, that there is a voice of any strength which has come to this Convention from the practical business men of the State, in favor of restoring the system by a constitutional provision. The amendment proposed by my friend from Sullivan [Mr. Wales] is an absolute contradiction of that portion of the section which immediately precedes his amendment. In the first place it says deliberately that no office shall be created for weighing, gauging, culling, inspecting or measuring merchandise, and then comes in his amendment, which says that this shall not be done except by licensed individuals. We should strike out the first part of the section and put in a direct provision by means of which these officers should be created, and not say in the first place that such offices shall not be created, and then almost in the same breath say that they shall be. I am opposed to the whole thing. I believe that here, if no where else, the doctrine of caveat emptor should apply. And, sir, I would ask the gentleman whether or no he can make any limit when this license shall end. I send my boy to a grocery for a pound or two pounds or three pounds of sugar or any other commodity. It is as much for my interest as a poor man's, if this system of inspection is right, that there should be a licensed inspector there to determine the question of quality between my boy, who is unable to determine for himself, and the party selling the commodity to me, as there is for a licensed inspector in the case when larger amounts are sold. And, sir, I undertake to say another thing, that the whole tendency of this system of inspection wherever it may obtain, and particularly in regard to the quality of the goods is, that the poorest article shall be certain to sell and that the best article shall take care of itself. When you get the brand of the inspector upon the article, then, as a matter of course, people, in their credulity, seeing the brand of a sworn officer upon the article, are apt to take it as a good thing. So that the tendency of the parties who desire the inspector is to see how poor they can make the article so that it may pass the inspector, and not how good they can make it. I believe the desire of the people of this State, as a whole, and all past experience under the Constitution of 1846 is, that they have found great benefit by having got rid of the inspection laws that existed previously, and that they do not desire to get back again to that system under a constitutional enactment.

Mr. PROSSER—Is a motion to strike out the section now in order?

The PRESIDENT—It is not in order so long as there is a proposition pending to amend the section.

Mr. SPENCER—I think the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is mistaken as to the ground on which the Convention of 1846 acted in adopting the present section in the Constitution, doing away with the system of official gaugers, measurers, and others. It had been the practice, in relation to the city of New York, and perhaps other localities, to create the office of inspector for almost every article of merchandise, and each one of these offices was made lucrative to an extraordinary degree, and the object of the Convention of 1846 was to get rid of the political influence which was obtained by means of the multiplication of these offices, rather than because of the complaints of those who dealt in the articles which were the subjects of inspection. I have hitherto been opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales], but I confess that since reflecting more upon the subject, and hearing the reasons which he has now urged in favor of it, I am converted to the position which he occupies. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has misunderstood the object of this amendment in another particular. The amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales], as I understand it, does not propose to make the inspection of any article compulsory, either upon seller or buyer; but the object of it is, to furnish the means, if the vender of any article in the market desires to have placed upon it a brand or certificate, which shall be the guaranty of its quality, he may have the option to do so.

Mr. ALVORD—I ask whether the proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales] does not entirely prohibit the people, if they desire, in the inspection, from any power to choose an inspector, except he is a licensed official—in other words, is it not entirely arbitrary?

Mr. SPENCER—Perhaps it is, in that respect. But it does not seem to me that this is any objection to it, because any person who chooses to apply for the position of gauger or inspector, who is otherwise a competent man, could obtain a license.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I move to add the words "but such inspection shall not be compulsory," so as to make the section entirely clear upon that point.

Mr. WALES—I accept the amendment

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the gentleman to reflect for a single moment and see whether, with the amendment proposed adopted, it is not compulsory upon the parties who desire to have an inspection of their commodities to go to a licensed inspector, or whether they are able to go outside of them in choosing a person for the inspection. There is no necessity for licensing a man to do the work of inspction, culling, weighing, or gauging. There is no necessity that men should be licensed, for parties stand ready and willing to do this service to the satisfaction of those who apply to have it done. To provide that individuals shall be licensed to do this, will take away from individuals the right to select their own arbitrators, if they should see fit to settle their differences in that way.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Wales, as amended, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote 26 ayes, the noes not being counted.

Mr. PROSSER—I move to strike out the section.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—We sometimes flatter ourselves, Mr. President, that we are living in a progressive age, but the success of this motion to strike out the section would be the taking of a very large stride backward. After the question had been under consideration for some ten years, as different applications and modifications were made in the Legislature, the Convention of 1846, as stated by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], with great unanimity, on the ground, first, of the injurious effect, politically, of the existing laws in reference to the inspections, in putting the nomination of the whole batch of important offices in the city of New York under the control and influence of inspectors, and, in the second place, the facts, as the gentleman has stated, that the poorest class of producers were enabled to raise the nominal character of their products relatively to the standard of the expert producer. I say that these admitted facts were what induced the Convention of 1846, by a decided vote, to abolish the system. Now, sir, whatever degredation may have taken place in some of our institutions, practical or otherwise, within the last twenty years, I am happy to say that there are yet some honest traders in the city of New York, the city of Brooklyn, in the cities of Albany, Buffalo, Rochester, etc. Some few years ago men were startled to learn that eleven million dollars in taxes had to be raised in the city of New York for a single year. A committee of citizens was appointed to see what plan could be devised to reduce this amount of taxation, and there was but one single common councilman who could be found to make a suggestion of its reduction, and he said that it was too late to effect any cure further than a reduction of from three to four hundred thousand dollars in the taxation of that year. The gentlemen were highly respected individuals, influential in the commercial circles, some who have recently gone to their long rest. They appeared startled at this announcement that so far had corruption gone in our city legislation that a reduction of only three hundred thousand dollars could be made in a tax of $11,000,000. After a very decided pause in the conversation I addressed a gentleman now living and representing a large banking interest, saying, "Sir, though there is this degradation in public matters, let me ask you whether we cannot congratulate ourselves on the fact that the tone of commercial honesty has not depreciated. I contend, on the contrary, that it has arisen so much that things which were tolerated twenty years ago would not be tolerated now." I trust that, as our commercial men and commercial circles in our cities have adopted a change more acceptable to themselves by which they employ honest and capable individuals to do the business of weighing, gauging and inspecting, the Convention will not attempt to work a change which will be a retrograde step in this matter. But again. Since the Convention has in every instance, with great reluctance, adopted any thing that looked like an increase in the number of public offices, and that even the proposition of my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], looking to the creation of a board of charities, was voted down, and that we cautiously approached the matter of providing for a court of claims, we shall be still more reluctant to adopt a system which will create more than one thousand offices. I stated when the subject was up in Committee of the Whole, in extenso, my views upon this subject, and, fortunately or unfortunately, the remarks have been printed and I will not repeat them now.

Mr. PROSSER—I wish to understand why it is urged that the striking out of this section creates a thousand offices. It seems to me, sir, that after twenty years' experience without any inspection laws, the people of this State are pretty well prepared to judge whether they want them or not, and prepared to select a Legislature that can make proper rules and regulations in reference to inspection if any are wanted. That is not a very large power to leave to the Legislature, and I think that the restriction is unnecessary, and therefore we ought to strike out the section.

Mr. ALVORD—There are some gentlemen who are in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales] upon the ground that this inspection was not to be compulsory. Now, sir, I trust that those gentleman will vote against this proposition to strike out the section, because if the Convention leave the subject to the Legislature they will have the power to appoint these persons and make inspection compulsory, and we we shall get just exactly in the same position we occupied previous to the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, when the cream, or a large portion of the profits, of the people in this State in sending their produce to market was cut off, either from the deterioration of quality by inspection, or the charges made for the inspection. Sir, instead of one thousand officers, as has been stated by gentlemen, existing under the laws previous to the Constitution of 1846, if gentlemen will look to the statistics of this State previous to that year, they will find that in the various channels of trade in the different localities there were no less than five thousand, and they were constantly increasing, and they became not only onerous and expensive to the people who were compelled to use them, under the operation of the laws, but they also became a very great and important political engine in the working of the politics of the dominant party of the State. Sir, I say here that when the exigency comes, and it may come if this section shall be stricken out, that the dominant party desire such a means for use, they can come before the Legislature and create such munitions of war for the purpose of carrying on the political warfare; they could go over the whole of this ground and create a horde of officers to fatten upon the productive industry of the people of this State merely for the purpose of carrying out their political views. I trust, therefore that this safeguard, initiated in the Constitution of 1846, will be permitted to remain in the instrument which we are now framing.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I think it is better to leave this question to the Legislature. I assume that if the abuses growing out of the system of inspection were so great as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] states, the Legislature would have corrected the abuse. The principle of embodying a constitutional provision of this character is to tie the hands of the Legislature utterly, and I hold it to be entirely wrong. I am opposed to the principle. I understand that the reason why the article was incorporated in the Constitution of 1846 was, mainly, because of the inspection of flour in the city of New York, which was to be shipped to foreign ports. Gentlemen claimed, as a matter of course, and properly claimed, that when flour was not to be used in the city of New York, but was going to foreign ports it ought not to be compelled to submit to inspection, and the expenses dependent upon it; that it was entirely unnecessary, and that no good resulted to the people of the State of New York from it. It was principally upon that ground that that article was incorporated into the present Constitution. Why do you seek to incorporate a principle here which utterly prevents the creation of a system of inspection, so long as this Constitution shall exist leaving to the Legislature no power to act in the matter, should it become necessary to have inspectors? If you do nothing upon the subject here but incorporate the principle that all inspection shall be done by licensed inspectors, and that no individual shall be compelled to have his property inspected by them; that is the only reasonable thing you can do; but certainly you should not tie up the power of the Legislature acting in a matter of this kind as the exigency may require.

Mr. WALES—I would like to ask my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] why it is necessary that salt should be inspected, and other articles of manufacture should not be?

Mr. ALVORD—I will answer the question of the gentleman. The reason why salt is inspected is because it is a matter of interest to the State. They inspect the salt for the purpose of receiving by weight the State duties. It is of no consequence to the manufacturer.

Mr. COMSTOCK—And I will state also, that the manufacturers of Onondaga salt do not require the inspection for their protection, but that they would gladly dispense with it if the State could do so.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Another reason than has been stated operated to induce the insertion of the provision now under consideration in the Constitution of 1846; and that was this: There were more than five thousand inspectors, perhaps more than ten thousand inspectors of lumber, inspectors of flour, inspectors of ashes, inspectors of hops, and for aught I know, inspectors of skips and jumps. [Laughter.] There were inspectors for every thing, and with that number under the control of a political party they became a power, and it only became necessary when an object was desired to be accomplished, to send down the flat—an order to the province was sent out, and every one of these men answer to the key note that had been struck at the capital. And it was for the purpose of aiding in the destruction of that centralization, which some gentlemen seem to have singularly forgotten since the Convention of 1846, that the provision was put in the Constitution, which swept the system out of existence. There is nothing in the world that you can put in the hands of the central power of a State that is so mischievous in its influence, and for that reason, more than any other, I rejoiced to see the whole thing go out of existence in 1846, and I hope it will never be restored in the Constitution of this State. I have confidence in this, that the men of this State can manage their political affairs without the aid of satraps in localities under the direction of the central power.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Prosser to strike out the section, and it was declared lost.

Mr. WALES—I move the reconsideration of the vote by which my amendment was lost, and ask that the motion lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT—It will be so ordered.

There being no further amendments offered to the eighteenth section, the SECRETARY proceeded to read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 19. The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws and of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient. And all laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person.

Mr. VEEDER—I think the words "as the Legislature may deem expedient" to be superfluous, and I move to strike them out.

Mr. VERPLANCK—The section requires there shall be published such laws and such judicial decisions as the Legislature may deem expedient. I think the discretion of the Legislature refers to the matter of publishing judicial decisions.

Mr. VEEDER—I do not so understand it.

Mr. VERPLANCK—That is my understanding of the section. I think it is proper to allow the section to stand just as it is. It means that there shall be published the statutes of the State, and such judicial proceedings as the Legislature shall deem expedient.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Veeder to strike out the words "as the Legislature may deem expedient," and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I think this section has been substantially adopted by the Convention in the article on the judiciary. I therefore move that the section be stricken out.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] whether, in the article on the judiciary, the statutes are also referred to.

Mr. HALE—I think they are, but I have not the document here to determine certainly.

Digitized by Google

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Does not the gentleman from Essex consider this suggestion the best place for it?

Mr. ALVORD—I would suggest to the gentleman from Essex that if we should re-enact the matter here the Committee on Revision, before whom the article is to be placed, could strike it out if it was found to have been already provided for?

Mr. HALE—On the suggestion of the gentleman [Mr. Alvord] I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPENCER — I move to strike out the words "and of such judicial proceedings as it may deem expedient." I am not aware that the Legislature has ever done any thing in the way of providing for the publication of judicial proceedings.

Mr. HALE—The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The decisions of the court of appeals are published by law, and the law has provided for the appointment of a reporter.

Mr. SPENCER — The statute laws are published at the expense of the State as I understand it, but the judicial decisions of the State are not published at the State's expense. This provision, as it now stands, would seem to require that both should be published in the same manner, at the expense of the State.

Mr. COMSTOCK—This is just like the provision, and I think it is nearly the same language as the provision in the Constitution of 1846. Under that provision, the Legislature proceeded to provide for a reporter of the court, not at the expense of the State, but at the expense of the lawyers and others, who buy the reports, providing merely for the regulation of the price of these reports to the public. This is the existing law as originally framed and as now in operation, under the same provision in the Constitution of 1846; therefore I think it much better to leave it as it is.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would ask whether it is necessary to have any provision on this subject —whether the Legislature have not ample power to provide for it without providing for it in the Constitution—whether this phrase is not inconsistent in itself, saying that "the Legislature shall provide for the publication of such judicial proceedings as it may deem expedient." It seems to be an anomaly—a contradiction—that they shall do that which "they may deem expedient." If they have the power already, I think it is unnecessary to couple it with that qualification.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The use of the term "as they may deem expedient" had reference, undoubtedly to the class of decisions which shall be published. It was intended to give the Legislature power to discriminate between those of higher courts of the State and those of lower courts, and to make it imperative to provide for the publication of some kind of judicial reports, such as they thought ought to be published. The Legislature have thought it their duty heretofore to provide for the publication of the reports of the court of appeals, under the present Constitution, and I think there should be an imperative provision on the subject, under which the Legislature must act. There was no constitutional provision on the subject previous to the Constitution of 1846; and there was no duty incumbent on the Legislature to provide for publication of reports. What was the consequence of that? The judicial reports were published without any authority of law, as a mere matter of private enterprise, and the result was that enormous prices were asked for law books.

Mr. GRAVES—I wish to know if, under this section, the Legislature can order the statute laws to be published at the expense of the State can they not also order the judicial proceedings to be published at the expense of the State.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I have no doubt that the Legislature could do it, and as little doubt that they never would do it. The Legislature has not yet done it, nor has it been thought necessary to refuse to vest this power in the Legislature because that they might do so.

Mr. RUMSEY—I desire to ask the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] if it is not a fact that the provision put in the Constitution of 1846, giving the right to make these publications free has not had the effect to reduce the price of law books three-fourths what the price was previously?

Mr. COMSTOCK—That is just what I was saying. The profession did have to pay more than three times the price for their law books which we now pay when we consider the different values of the currency. Now, the decisions of the court of appeals, under the law passed pursuant to this provision of the Constitution of 1846, have been the cheapest reports in the world. I do not say they are the best or the worst, but in price they have been the cheapest reports in the civilized world; and it was because the Legislature provided for their publication by contract, to be entered into by certain State officers with the bookseller or the publisher who would make the fairest bid. The consequence of that provision of the law has been that the world has been furnished with these reports at an exceedingly cheap rate. That has been the course of things under the Constitution of 1846, and I really see no occasion to change it.

Mr. SPENCER—After hearing these suggestion I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] was eminently proper, and I think ought to be acted upon because in the twenty-seventh section of the judicial article are the precise words repeated in the article under consideration. The twenty-seventh section of the judicial article reads as follows:

"The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws."

I therefore move to strike out those words from the pending section, so that it shall read:

"The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared carried.

Mr. RUMSEY—I propose as a substitute for the section just stricken out a provision against lotteries. I understand that the question of lotteries was referred by the Convention from the Committee on the Bill of Rights to the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature; and they have reported no article upon that subject. Instead of the one that we have just stricken out I propose, by unanimous consent, to insert the following:

"Lotteries, and the sale of lottery tickets within this State, is hereby prohibited."

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will inform the gentleman that that is new matter, and should come under the head of amendments generally.

Mr. RUMSEY—I suppose so; but it will place a section here to take the place of this, and keep the numbering right.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to state that this section has not been stricken out—only a part of it.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Is the nineteenth section still under consideration?

The PRESIDENT—One part of it.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Then I hope that, by unanimous consent, the last clause may be stricken out, because that, also, is a repetition. I will read from the judicial article: "All laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person." Now, we propose to enact it here, and I move to strike it out.

Mr. RUMSEY—I propose to insert in lieu of those words these: "Lotteries, and the sale of lottery tickets within this State, is hereby prohibited."

The PRESIDENT—Which amendment is not germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

Mr. ALVORD—I understand that by the amendment of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], the words "the Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws," have been stricken out, because it is in the other article; and also, that the last clause, "and all laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person," has been stricken out, leaving simply that relating to judicial decisions. I move that those words be stricken out, and that the Committee on Revision be instructed to put them in their proper place in the judiciary article.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not understand the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. ALVORD—All there is left of this section is, "The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient." I move that that be stricken out, and that the Committee on Revision be instructed to put it in its proper place in the article on the judiciary.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that motion will prevail.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

Mr. RUMSEY—Now as the section is all stricken out I ask unanimous consent to insert this proposition as section nineteen.

"Lotteries, and the sale of lottery tickets within this State are hereby prohibited."

This was in the old Constitution, and it was left out of this by mistake.

The PRESIDENT—There being no objection to receive this motion it will be entertained.

The question was put on the adoption of the section as proposed by Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY then proceeded to read the twentieth section, as follows:

SEC. 20. No local or private bill shall be passed by the Legislature unless notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been given in the manner now or hereafter to be provided by law, and no action of the Legislature shall be deemed or taken as a waiver of such notice, nor shall the Legislature in any manner waive the same."

There being no amendments proposed to this section the SECRETARY proceeded to read the twenty-first section, as follows:

SEC. 21. The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in either of the following cases:

Granting divorces;

Authorizing the sale, mortgaging or leasing of the real property of minors or other persons under disability;

Changing the names of persons;

For laying out, working or discontinuing public or private roads or highways;

For granting to any individual, association or corporation the right to lay down railroad tracks in any locality within this State;

Releasing the right of the State to lands acquired by escheat or forfeiture by reason of alienage;

Giving effect to informal or invalid deeds or wills;

Regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating or other beverages, except it may pass laws on this subject which may contain special provisions as applicable to all cities, or all incorporated villages, or all towns in the State, in any case for which provision has been made by any existing general law.

And the Legislature shall pass general laws providing for the cases enumerated in this section, and for all other cases where a general law can be made applicable.

Mr. VEEDER—I move the following amendment: Strike out lines fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, eighteen and nineteen, and insert in lieu thereof the words "regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, wines, ales and beer." This proposition that I offer now is precisely what was offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the last sentence does not belong there. It is a separate paragraph, intended to prohibit the Legislature from passing any special law, in cases where general laws now exist. So, I apprehend, he does not want to strike it out. It should form a separate paragraph.

Mr. VEEDER—Then I would modify my amendment; to strike out down to and including the word "State," in line eighteen. This proposition is precisely what I offered before in Committee of the Whole. I desire, sir, not to occupy the time of the Convention now upon that subject, particularly, except to say that, I do not see any good reason why there should be any distinction made in this class of legislation between cities and incorporated villages, or towns, or the country. In my judgment, whatever provision shall be made in reference to the sale of liquors, should be uniform in its character throughout the State. In my judgment, there can be no good reason why a separate law, separate and distinct in its provisions and character, should be enacted to operate upon the cities and not upon the country. The question of license fee, it seems to me, is precisely the same, necessarily, in the country as in the city. The question of the manner in which business shall be carried on, it seems to me, should be precisely the same, and in my judgment all the questions of the regulation of the traffic and the sale of liquors are materially the same in the country as they would be in the city. Perhaps some police regulations which do not necessarily apply here may necessarily be more stringent in the city than in the country; but the general feature of the excise law, should be uniform in the city and in the country. Upon this question, which I deem of very great importance, I respectfully demand the ayes and noes.

Mr. SMITH—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—A call for the ayes and noes is pending.

Mr. VEEDER—I withdraw the call.

Mr. SMITH—I trust that the proposed amendment will not prevail. It will be remembered by the delegates present, that when this article was reported originally, that clause was not contained in it, and the friends of temperance were willing to leave the Constitution as it stands, so far as this subject is concerned. But this amendment, or one similar to it, was offered by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] in hostility to what is known as the metropolitan excise law; and the result of that movement was the provision which is contained in the article now before us. I trust, therefore, that the Convention will not now undo the result of that work. If it is intended by the gentleman to take from the Legislature the power to regulate this whole subject as the circumstances of the case and the wants of the people may demand, then it certainly ought not to be adopted; for it is eminently fit that the whole matter should be within the power and the discretion of the Legislature to regulate according to the wishes of the people, and the exigencies of the future. Will this Convention undertake to say that the Legislature, for the next twenty years, shall be tied up so that it cannot make a regulation for the city of New York, for the city of Albany, or any other city in the State, that shall differ in some particulars from the regulations required in the country? Is it desired that the Legislature shall be restricted from regulating or even prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors hereafter, if the people shall demand prohibition? Or, on the other hand, shall the Legislature be left free to respond to the wishes and demands of the people, as circumstances may develop, and as they shall make their demands hereafter? It seems to me that the latter is the wise and prudent course. All laws for regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks are designed for the protection of society; and society has, or ought to have, certainly, the right to protect itself. It is an old and wise maxim,—"Salus populi suprema lex," and we ought not to abrogate that maxim in this Convention. The evils of intemperance are wide spread and acknowledged by all. There has been a necessity in all time for some law regulating the sale of intoxicating drinks. It is a very difficult subject to manage, to know what laws should be provided, what are best adapted to meet the wants of the people and the exigencies of the case. In my judgment, moral means are the best to suppress the evils of intemperance, but still some kind of legislation on the subject has ever been deemed necessary, and there are many people in the State who demand prohibitory laws. There are others who insist that all laws on the subject shall be repealed, and the traffic left unrestricted. Another class favor our present excise law, and what the future may develop we do not know. All I desire and all I claim is that, the people, through the Legislature, their organ, possessing the sovereign power of the State, shall be at liberty to make such laws in the future as the circumstances may require. It seems to me that it would be very unwise for this Convention to undertake to restrict the power of the Legislature over the subject. Some gentlemen are willing that we should have a law similar to the one now upon our statute book, because they say it is not prohibitory, but merely regulates the traffic. I beg to differ with those gentlemen. Our present law is a prohibitory law. There is no doubt about it. It prohibits all but the licensed persons; and if the Legislature has power to prohibit nine-tenths of the people, why has it not power to prohibit the other tenth? It is merely a question of extent; it is not a question of power; and I should have had no doubt that power existed in the Legislature under the present Constitution to prohibit the traffic entirely, had it not been for a decision of the court of appeals which is supposed to throw doubt upon the question. Inasmuch as the power of the Legislature over the subject has been questioned, I would leave that body free to enact prohibition whenever the people shall demand it. There is no good reason for restricting the power of the Legislature in relation to the subject.

Here the gavel fell, the speaker's time having expired.

Mr. HALE—I hope that when a vote is taken there will be a division of the question; that we shall first vote upon striking out the part proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], and then vote separately upon the substitute which he offers. It will be remembered that, when this article was reported, there was no such provision in it. It was introduced here as an amendment—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will remind the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], that the question to strike out and insert cannot be divided.

Mr. HALE—Then I will move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], by striking out the sentence without inserting any thing in its place. It will be recollected that this was introduced upon the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], not precisely in its present form, but that the words "regulating or prohibiting" were contained in the amendment which he offered in Committee of the Whole; and that it was urged by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], that such a provision should be inserted here. The substitute which he now proposes leaves out the words "or prohibiting" and also omits the portion which allows different laws to be applied to villages, cities and towns. What strikes me as the material part of the alteration proposed by the gentleman is the omission of the words, "or prohibiting."

Mr. VEEDER—Do I understand the gentleman to say that my amendment provided for different laws to be applied to villages, cities and towns?

Mr. HALE—I said no such thing. I said that the amendment contained the words "regulating or prohibiting," and the substitute which he now offers omits these words. Without expressing any opinion as to the propriety of a prohibitory law, I am opposed to making any change in our present Constitution upon that subject. Leaving it without the words "or prohibiting," we should have here an express recognition of the right to sell intoxicating liquors—a recognition which would, perhaps, prevent the passage of even such a license law as we have now, which prohibits the mass of men from engaging in that business. If you leave it as it is, "regulating or prohibiting," it is an express recognition of the right of the Legislature to pass a prohibitory law, and a law of absolute prohibition, perhaps, would be sanctioned by this language. I am willing to leave this matter just as it is now under our present Constitution, and therefore I propose this amendment—to have nothing in this article upon the subject; to strike out these lines which were inserted by the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], as amended on motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and leave the article precisely as it came to us from the standing committee.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Mr. President—

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to raise a question of order. I think the Chair cannot entertain an amendment of the character of that submitted by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale].

The PRESIDENT—If the Chair understands the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], his object will be obtained by voting down the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder].

Mr. HALE—No, sir; that is not so. My amendment is to strike out the same that the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] proposes to strike out, from and including the fifteenth line, to and including the word "State," in the eighteenth line, and to insert nothing in its place. That is my proposition.

Mr. VEEDER—That cannot be an amendment, because it must be an amendment to my amendment. It cannot be an amendment to my amendment when it is already a part of my amendment.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] is correct.

Mr. VERPLANCK—The committee did not report this portion of the article. It was moved for the purpose of reaching a difficulty in the present laws of the State, creating different laws for different localities; and the design of the gentleman from Kings was undoubtedly to direct the Legislature to pass laws which should be general upon the subject throughout the State. That was the object of his amendment. Now, in doing this inadvertently the word "prohibiting" was put into the section. I recollect this matter very well in the Committee of the Whole. I was engaged in correcting manuscript, or some other matter, when I heard a good deal of laughter in my neighborhood, and I then directed my attention to it; and for the purpose of discovering what it was I was obliged to talk against time for eight or ten minutes, the first and only time I have done so in this Convention, in order to reach the hour of two o'clock, the hour for adjournment. I did this because I wished that this Convention should adopt a Constitution which the people will ratify, and I warn gentlemen of the Convention that if you use the word "prohibition" in this Constitution in reference to the manufacture and sale of distilled and fermented beverages, your Constitution will not be adopted by the people.

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does the gentleman think the Constitution would be adopted if we had a clause in it such as those who are hostile to the prohibitory clause desire to have in?

Mr. VERPLANCK—That is not the question under discussion. I want to see where we stand on the subject. It will be recollected that the Convention deemed the question of prohibition of the sale and manufacture of spirituous liquors and the adulteration of those liquors so important as to appoint a special committee upon this subject; and the two reports of that committee are now upon the table of this Convention. The proper time to discuss this question and settle it is when these reports come up for consideration, and it is unfair to the committee which has spent much time upon this subject, to take up this question now without any regard to these reports. The proper thing to do now is to strike the whole of this matter out and leave the question of prohibition and uniform laws for regulating the sale of distilled and fermented liquors to be settled when the reports I have referred to are considered. I am, therefore, in favor of striking out as proposed by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] without inserting in this place what he proposes.

Mr. ALVORD—As I had the honor of moving the amendment of the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], which was adopted in Committee of the Whole, I desire to say a very few words. I was entirely willing, as the committee were who reported this article, that nothing should be said on this subject; but coming from the able and eminent gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] who desired by a constitutional provision to give the power to the Legislature, either to regulate or prohibit entirely the sale of liquors [laughter]; and knowing the fact that a very large portion of the people of the State, who think differently on this subject of temperance would be very desirous for the same thing, and thinking and believing that the two extremes had got together on the subject and would both accept the proposition, I thought it would be right to place it in the Constitution. So far as that matter is concerned I am willing to leave it where it is, and I am just as willing, if the gentleman from Kings regrets what he did on that occasion, and now desires to go back on it, that we should begin where we left off, and strike this proposition out entirely.

Mr. VEEDER—I do not claim the credit of having originated this expression.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman has once spoken, but if there oe no objection will be allowed to proceed.

No objection was made.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to say that the proposition, so far as the words "regulating or prohibiting" are concerned. originated with the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Duganne], whose proposition was to have general laws regulating or prohibiting the sale of native wines and articles of food.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question? The gentleman from New York [Mr. Duganne] did offer that; but did not the gentleman adopt it?

Mr. VEEDER — I proposed an addition. I proposed to increase that and extend it to intoxicating liquors, wines, ale and beer. I am frank to say that I left in the word "prohibiting" in my proposition for a very different reason from what many gentlemen supposed. I have no great love for some portions of the Constitution which is to be submitted to the people, nor have I any great amount of confidence in the fact that it will be adopted. If gentlemen propose to lug in all kinds of obnoxious provisions into this Constitution it is no part of my duty, as I consider my position here, to take them out; and I propose to leave them in when introduced by the other side. If they want to introduce a proposition to prohibit the sale of liquors throughout the State, I am not going to take it out, because I do not think it will materially help their side of the case. But my proposition, itself, is the proposition that whatever law the Legislature may pass in reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors, shall be uniform throughout the State; that whatever law operates in New York and Kings shall operate in Syracuse and elsewhere throughout the State, as well in the country as in the city. If a liquor dealer at the seashore in the county of Kings, where we have five towns, is obliged to pay a license fee of two hundred and fifty dollars, I want you, gentlemen, to make the same law for the interior part of the State for your country stores. If a man has to pay two hundred and fifty dollars license fee who only does business in the summer months, I want you to try it and see how you like it in the inland towns. I do not intend to deny my proposition; but I claim that the gentleman should not take the entire credit for his proposition which was drawn by another gentleman and submitted by him.

Mr. BELL—I cannot agree with the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder]. that the same license fee should be required of every man who sells intoxicating liquors, whether in the cities or in the rural districts of the State.

Mr. VEEDER—I did not say so; I said on the seashore.

Mr. BELL—I am of opinion that men should pay in proportion to the benefits they receive. If a license to sell intoxicating liquors is more valuable in the city of New York than it is in a remote rural district, a larger fee should be paid. I can imagine that on this subject as well as many others, different rules may be applied to our cities from those that are required in the country. Discrimination should be made in regard to the different circumstances in the case and the condition of things. I was not a little surprised at the announcement of the honorable delegate from Erie [Mr. Verplanck]. He informs this Convention that if the word "prohibition" or "prohibit" is contained in this Constitution it will inevitably be defeated. That is an astonishing and gratuitous declaration for any man to make on this floor.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I said in my judgment.

Mr. BELL—I presume we will find in numerous places throughout the Constitution the word "prohibit." This does not provide for the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors—it does not say that the sale of intoxicating liquors is hereby prohibited—but it simply says that during the next twenty years, should public sentiment and the interests of the State demand it, the Legislature may prohibit as well as regulate such sale. Is there any thing unfair in that proposition? Circumstances that now surround this subject and public opinion may materially change during that period. It seems to me, sir, that it would exhibit a great lack of wisdom on the part of this Convention to fix and provide a rule in this Constitution in regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors, or any thing else that is subject to the change of public sentiment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question. He states that he is in favor of equitable laws. I would like to ask him if he would be in favor of prohibitory laws, if enacted by the Legislature, prohibiting the sale of liquors in any one particular city? Or for instance, in all the cities and leave the sale of liquor free and open in other parts of the State?

Mr. BELL—I would not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—That could be done under this provision.

Mr. BELL—I am of the opinion, however, that certain laws may be proper and necessary for cities that are unnecessary and improper for the country. I am also of the opinion that the laws regulating municipal affairs should be uniform as to cities, and the laws regulating the rural districts should be uniform in their applications to such districts. I can see no objection to the section as it now stands in the article. It simply leaves this matter to the Legislature to decide as the circumstances may warrant during the continuance of this Constitution. I do not see that it essentially differs from our present Constitution and laws, except in one particular. I think with the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] that the present license law is a prohibitory law, prohibiting every man in the State, except those who have first obtained a license to sell. The court of appeals has deliberately decided that the power to regulate does not contain the power to prohibit. It is not necessary, for my present purpose, to criticise the decision of this court, or dwell on the limited power which the judges found in the word "regulate;" the people have acquiesced in that decision, and governed themselves accordingly. If I rightly apprehend the object of this Convention, it is to remedy defects in the present Constitution, remove all doubtful provisions, so far as they have been discovered, and adapt the fundamental law of the State to the present and prospective requirements of the people. By virtue of the force of this decision, the Legislature is denied the power of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, should the entire people of the State desire it. Our article on this subject should be full and clear, at the same time it may be left a little flexible, subject to the control of the people as expressed through the action of the Legislature.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think the dilemma in which my friend from Kings [Mr. Veeder] finds himself is instructive to the rest of us—that is, it is exceedingly dangerous to write out constitutional prohibitions and provisions without fully understanding in advance the full effect of what we are doing. As is often well said if the Lord should grant all our prayers, he would destroy us by our requests. As this article was originally reported, we should have got along very well. We did not need this addition in. The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] finds that he does not want it, and I do not think any body wants it; and for that reason I hope that we shall so vote as to dispense with this provision that is so distasteful to all of us; although, personally, I should have been entirely willing to abide by the compromise which we entered into on that occasion, and which, as the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] has said, caused a little bit of a laugh at the time we proposed to adopt it. As it appears that he did have to talk against time on this question, I will do what I believe I have never done before—move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Veeder and it was declared lost, by a vote of 17 ayes, noes not counted.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to have a count on the other side.

Mr. VAN COTT—Please state the amendment.

The amendment was again read by the SECRETARY.

Mr. VEEDER—I renew my application for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

Mr. VEEDER—Is a motion in order to postpone this?

The PRESIDENT—It is not in order—the previous question having been ordered. The count will be taken anew, if desired.

Mr. VERPLANCK—If in order, I move to have the previous question reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT—A motion of that kind is in order.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move then that the vote by which the previous question was ordered be reconsidered.

The question was put on the motion to reconsider, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred and was put whether the main question should now be put, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move now that the consideration of this portion of the section under consideration be postponed until the report of the Committee on Prohibition and the Sale of Adulterated Liquors shall come up.

Mr. ALVORD—I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that motion. I have no sort of question from the complexion of the Convention upon this subject, as indicated, that the result of this will be simply to strike out this clause, the whole of it. That will be the result, and there is no necessity of delay upon that account.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform both the gentlemen that the motion is not in order except by unanimous consent. The only postponement can be by the transposition of the sections.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I would suggest, to reach the difficulty, that so much of the article as has been acted upon, be referred to the Committee on Revision, with the exception of the clause which we have been so recently considering. That will leave it to the future action of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—That will be in order after we have passed on amendments generally. If there be no objection the section will be passed for the present. Amendments generally are now in order.

Mr. SPENCER—I move the following amendment: In line nineteen of section 21, strike out the words "has been made," and "existing." It reads now, "In any case for which provision has been made by any existing general law." I propose to amend so that it will read as follows: "In any case for which provision now exists or shall hereafter be made by any general law." The object is—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. VEEDER—May I inquire whether the proposition to postpone the consideration of this section carries over the whole section, or this subject.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands that it carries that subject.

Mr. VEEDER—That is what I desire to know, because I had another amendment to offer to that section.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I desire to ask for information, whether, under the head of amendments generally, it will not be in order to move to strike out the last portion of the twenty-first section, that we have tacitly passed by?

The PRESIDENT—That motion will be a parliamentary motion.

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following amendments: to strike out in the nineteenth line of the twenty-first section, "has been made" and "existing," and insert "now exist, or shall hereafter be made," so that it will read "in any case for which provision now exists or shall hereafter be made by any general law." The object of this amendment is that the section shall not be considered to apply only to existing laws, but that it may be made applicable to laws which hereafter shall be made and to avoid the contradiction between this part of the section and the three lines that follow.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Spencer, it was declared carried.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to offer the following amendments: Insert between lines nineteen and twenty of page eight the following: "for ascertaining by proper proof the citizens who shall be entitled to the right of suffrage hereby established." My object in offering this proposition at this time is, that, the Legislature shall also, in all laws that they shall pass in the future in reference to the ascertaining by proper proof of the citizens who shall be entitled to exercise the right of suffrage, such laws shall be uniform in their character throughout the State. In other words, under the provision of section 4 of article 2 of the present Constitution, the Legislature has enacted a registry law, in which it requires the personal attendance of voters in the counties of New York and Kings preceding every election, to be registered; whereas, in other portions of the State, if a citizen is once registered, that is all that is necessary, and the inspectors of election may continue his name on the registry. I desire—

Mr. ALVORD—I feel compelled to rise to a point of order. My point of order is that the gentleman now indirectly undertakes to reconsider and change what has been passed in the article on suffrage; and that he cannot, except by a motion to reconsider that when it shall definitely come up, get any such provision in this article as the one which he now proposes.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair has not the article on suffrage before him.

Mr. VEEDER—I do not believe that, because the Convention in the article on suffrage may have considered the question of the registry law when we are considering an article as to the powers and duties of the Legislature — when we designate certain classes of cases upon which they shall pass uniform and general laws, it is not entirely proper that this proposition shall be considered at this time. I see no good reason why it should not be entertained. I do not know why the gentleman is so uneasy. I do not see the necessity of trying to dodge this question. If you do not desire to extend to us the same privileges in the counties of Kings and New York that you have, then let us know it; if you do desire to let us know that also. I have no speech to make upon this subject. I simply desire that this Convention shall express itself whether it is in favor of a uniform registry law, or whether it is in favor of the obnoxious law that at present exists.

Mr. FOLGER—Will the gentleman allow an interruption? He says, "If you do not desire to extend to us." By that I suppose he means if the republican members of this Convention will not extend to the democratic members. I want to tell him that the phrase which he objects to was inserted in the registry law on the motion of Mr. Allaben, a Senator from Delaware and a democrat.

Mr. ALVORD—I insist upon my point of order; and, in addition to that, I desire to state that the very amendment which the gentleman now proposes to the article has been proposed to the article on suffrage and voted down.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I appeal from the decision of the Chair. When the suffrage article was under consideration we settled certain questions in reference to that matter. Now we are upon an entirely different subject. We are regulating the powers and duties of the Legislature, and declaring that upon certain subjects they may pass special laws, and that upon other subjects they shall pass general laws. The question is whether it is competent for this Convention to decide how the Legislature shall act. The proposition is that the Legislature shall act upon this subject by general law, and not by special law. It seems to me that this is a very different thing from the proposition that was voted upon when the suffrage article was under consideration. Whether it is competent for the Legislature, under general laws to enact laws which are not uniform for every division of the State, is the question. I therefore, do not think it out of order in considering the article before us, to say whether the Legislature shall proceed by a special or a general law to legislate upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that this Convention having already declared its sense upon this proposition, can only change it under the rules which it has adopted for its own government, to wit., by reconsidering its former action. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Convention?

Mr. VERPLANCK—I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. HALE—If in order, I now renew the motion which I proposed to make before—to strike out, commencing from and including from the fifteenth line, to and including the word "State," in the eighteenth line.

The PRESIDENT—That is in order.

Mr. VEEDER—Did we not suspend the consideration of that question until our action upon the report of the Committee on Adulerated Liquors?

The PRESIDENT—We did not. It was passed over for the time; and the Chair ruled that under the head of amendments generally, it would be parliamentary to move to strike that out.

Mr. VEEDER—That clause was passed over and if taken up, the first question in order is my motion which is pending. If we renew the consideration of this subject, I claim that that is the first question in order.

The PRESIDENT—If it be the desire of the Convention, it will be passed over, although the motion is strictly a parliamentary motion.

Mr. ALVORD—I object.

The PRESIDENT—The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Essex. [Mr. Hale].

Mr. VEEDER—I raise the question of order that if we are to return to the consideration of this provision, my motion to amend takes precedence.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken. The gentleman's motion to amend must take precedence of that to strike out. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder], to amend.

Mr. VEEDER—And upon that I renew my demand for the ayes and noes.

A DELEGATE—I rise to a point of order.

Digitized by Google

Have we not passed by this clause by a vote upon this question?

The PRESIDENT——No, sir; it was by unanimous consent of the Convention.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Then I suggest that having been made by unanimous consent, it must, of necessity, go over.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understood the unanimous consent to apply to simply that stage of the business. We are now under the head of amendments generally under which the Chair ruled that the motion of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], was in order as well as any other amendment which may come in under that head.

Mr. E. BROOKS—That we may not be arrested in our progress, I again ask unanimous consent that this provision of this section be postponed for the present.

Mr. VEEDER—If we are to be met again by a motion to strike out, I must object. I do not want to be defeated in obtaining a vote upon my proposition. I do not want to break up the Convention if there is no quorum; or any thing of the kind; but I want my proposition met fairly and squarely. If in order I will move to postpone the subject until Wednesday next. I do not want to take any advantage, neither do I intend to permit any advantage to be taken.

The PRESIDENT—If there is no objection, the motion will be received, to postpone until Wednesday next.

Mr. NELSON—Why would it not be better, if t is in order to postpone the consideration of the question at all, to postpone it until after action is taken on the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors? If it is in order, I would propose that we postpone action upon this question for the present.

The PRESIDENT—That may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON—I suggest that we postpone action upon it until after the Convention shall have acted upon the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors. There are two reports from that committee. Of course members can turn to their files and find them. Those two reports present to the Convention the question we have had up here, and present it sharply, so that we must all take one side or the other. There is, first, the majority report, which is very short, and then the minority report, which is only two or three lines. Now, let us postpone action upon this until we have acted upon those reports, and then the Convention will have announced its opinion upon the abstract proposition. I therefore ask unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of this section until after the Convention shall have acted upon the report of the Committee upon Adulterated Liquors.

Mr. VEEDER—That would prohibit us from bringing up this subject in the consideration of the report. Now, I propose that we postpone it until Wednesday next, and at that time consider this subject in connection with that report.

Mr. FOLGER—Why is it not the best way to strike it out of this place, and then if any one wishes to insert it hereafter, the question will come up.

Mr. PROSSER—That is the best way.

Mr. NELSON—With the consent of the gentleman [Mr. Folger] and of the Chair, I will answer him, and state the objection I have to that. Under the present Constitution, the courts have held the excise laws of the State to be valid. Now, the objection made by my friend from Kings [Mr. Veeder], is this. The present Constitution of the State allows an excise law in the city of New York that reads thus and so. It allows a different excise law in other sections of the State. My friend from Kings says that the people of the large cities are opposed to these excise laws. Now, then, if you strike this out, what is the result? The result is, that you will have the present Constitution, or a provision exactly like the present Constitution.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. NELSON—Yes, sir.

Mr. ALVORD—My friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger] suggests that we strike out this provision here and leave this question to come up on the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors.

Mr. NELSON—Yes, I understand that; but then some members gain their ends. Now, let it stand exactly as it does until the Convention comes to face the precise question sharply. If you strike this out you have the provision of the present Constitution. That is my objection. Let it stand as it does now, with all its parts and complications, and immediately (that is, instantly) after we have passed upon the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors, let this question come up. This plan, it strikes me, meets what my friend from Kings [Mr. Veeder] is after, and the question comes up after we know what is the sense of the Convention on the abstract proposition.

Mr. GRAVES—I move you, sir, that this matter be referred to the Committee of the Whole having in charge the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors.

Mr. MERRITT—I move an amendment, that the remainder of the article be referred to the Committee on Revision.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that these motions are not in order. I have no objection to having this matter postponed and having it fairly considered, and met hereafter; but if we do not do that, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] will raise the point of order as he did on the registry law.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair believes the motion of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], which he understands to be a motion to recommit a portion of this section to a select Committee on Adulterated Liquors, to be in order.

Mr. GRAVES—My motion was to leave it to the Committee of the Whole having in charge the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not think that motion is in order. The Chair did not distinctly understand the motion of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt].

Mr. MERRITT—I withdraw it, sir.

Mr. ROBERTSON—If it is in order, I move that the consideration of the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors be made a special order for Wednesday next, together with the consideration of this section which is now passed by; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to make this proposition.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—That motion can only come in regularly, under the head of resolutions, but by unanimous consent it may be admitted now.

Mr. ALVORD—If I was satisfied that the gentlemen who seem to be so very much interested in this particular matter, would not only be here on Wednesday, but also upon each and every day during the sessions of this Convention, for the purpose of giving us a working quorum to do the other business of the Convention, I would consent; but under the circumstances I cannot consent.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] cannot be received.

Mr. VEEDER—Since the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is so anxious and so tenacious about forcing us to attend here, I now raise the question of order that there is no quorum in the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—That point being made, the Secretary will call the roll of delegates.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I hope this point of order will be withdrawn and the objections that gave rise to it, and that so many of us as are here, will go on and do what we can to dispatch the business of the Convention. I appeal to my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] to withdraw his objection to the admission of this resolution.

Mr. ALVORD—I do not feel that it is either my duty or my right as a representative of the people of this State to withdraw it

Mr. BELL—I would like to suggest a way by which we can get out of this dilemma. Let this matter be postponed by unanimous consent until that report comes up.

Mr. VEEDER—I want to set it down for a certain day; but the gentleman will not consent to that.

Mr. BELL—The difficulty will be that if it is postponed to a certain day, gentlemen will be present on that day in force, and on that day only.

Mr. VEEDER—I must insist on my point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will call the roll of delegates.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll of delegates, and called the name of Mr. A. F. Allen, who answered to the call.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move that this Convention adjourn until seven o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDENT—That motion is too late; one delegate having already answered to his name.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call of the roll, and was interrupted by Mr. VEEDER—If I understand the gentlemen on the other side correctly, they are willing to assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Dutchess [Mr. Nelson], that this be postponed until the consideration of the report of the Committee of Adulterated Liquors, without a day certain. If it is satisfactory to them to postpone it until it comes up in regular order, I am entirely satisfied and I will withdraw my point of order.

The PRESIDENT—No objection being made the call of the roll is suspended by unanimous consent, and it is ordered that the further consideration of this section be postponed until the consideration of the report of the Committee on Adulterated Liquors, without prejudice to the adoption of the remainder of this article.

Mr. VEEDER—That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. WALES—I offer the following as a separate section:

SEC. 22. The Legislature at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide by law for the collection of the United States deposit fund, as rapidly as the terms upon which it is loaned in the several counties will permit. And also for its investment, under direction of the Treasurer of the State, in bonds of the government of the United States.

The question was put on the adoption of the section offered by Mr. Wales, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VEEDER—I wish to renew my proposition in reference to uniform laws, to insert after line 19, section 21, the words: "In relation to the election, appointment, powers, duties and qualifications of inspectors and canvassers of elections." That proposition is precisely what I submitted before in Committee of the Whole. I desire gentleman to express their opinions whether we shall have appointed by the board of police inspectors of elections in the city of New York who reside perhaps in Harlem, or whether we can have the privilege of choosing inspectors of elections the same as you have in the country, to be either elected or appointed, and men who are residents of the localities in which they are called upon to act. I desire them to express their opinions whether our laws upon this subject are to be uniform or not.

Mr. ALVORD—I am very sorry indeed that I come so often in collision with the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] in matters of this kind, but it seems to me that he should delay these propositions of his, and bring them up by way of reconsideration at the right time. I therefore raise the point of order, that this proposition is liable to the same objection as the proposition made by him before in different form.

Mr. VEEDER—I submit that it is not, because that was a proposition made in Committee of the Whole on this article, and not on the article about which the gentleman is talking. On the other article of which the gentleman is talking, I did not make that point. It was made by my colleague, but it was made when the article on suffrage was under consideration.

Mr. PRESIDENT—This is not the proposition made by the gentleman [Mr. Veeder] before, which the Chair ruled out of order. The Chair believes this proposition to be in order.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Veeder, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VEEDER—I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT—That motion lies on the table under the rule.

Mr. BAKER—I move to amend the twentieth section by inserting in the fourteenth line as follows:

Digitized by Google

"Or granting or donating any moneys out of the treasury of this State for or to any charitable institution, association or purpose whatever, unless the act or resolution so granting or donating such moneys shall provide for the equal distribution thereof among the several counties of the State, or for the equal participation of said counties therein, in proportion to the amount respectively contributed thereto by them by taxation."

I am as anxious, sir, to secure a uniform rule in respect to the imposition of the burden of taxation and the distribution of the benefits arising from it as the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Veeder] is to have uniform laws in respect to the regulation or prohibition of the sale of liquors, or in respect to the powers and duties of the registers and other election officers. I offer this amendment at this time, for the reason that, from the action of the Convention yesterday upon the report of the Committee on Charities, there seems to be a disposition to insert nothing in the Constitution regulating the manner and mode of making appropriations or of distributing these appropriations among the beneficiaries of State charities. It has been conceded by almost every gentleman who has spoken upon the subject of charities, that, it is for the interest of the State to make donations for charitable purposes. Now, if it is a duty on the part of the State to contribute large amounts of money annually for charitable purposes, it is equally true, and beyond dispute, that the necessity for charities pervades every part of the State alike, and that those who contribute the money should all participate in the benefits arising from such contributions. This section provides for an equal, fair, and just distribution of these benefits, in proportion to the burden of raising the money; and I cannot conceive how any gentleman, actuated by a fair and candid liberality, can vote against an amendment of this kind, without incurring suspicion of being governed by selfish motives. It is said that the cities have more destitute and poor persons to provide for than the country; but this proposition I deny. In proportion to numbers of population, our country villages and our rural towns have fully their own proportion of the poor and needy among them, and our boards of supervisors have as extensive claims upon their charity, in proportion to their means, as have the different charitable institutions in the cities of the State. It is said by some gentlemen that paupers and destitute persons from the country often go to the cities and become charges upon and receive aid and assistance from the city authorities. That is probably so, but I reply that there is not a county in the State, in the rural districts, but has to provide for and support a large number of paupers from the different cities of the State. Frequently, in the winter, but always in the spring, paupers are sent out from the city into the rural districts, with a supervisor's or poor-master's pass, and are "dumped" out wherever the pass expires, and thrown upon the mercy of the local authorities, who are obliged to furnish them with public aid; and in my own county it is no uncommon thing for the poor-houses to be crowded with emigrants from the cities. I do not undertake to say that this business is not reciprocal between the rural districts and the cities; but I do say that when the Legislature makes an appropriation for the relief of the poor, or for the maintenance of orphan asylums or other charitable institutions, there is as much need and as much right that such appropriation should extend its benefits into the country as there is in the city. All I ask in this amendment is, that, the same law that makes the donation shall provide for the equal distribution of the benefits arising from it.

Mr. ALVORD—This is simply reiterating the same arguments that were used upon the discussion of a branch of this subject yesterday. I am sorry to differ from my friend from Montgomery [Mr. Baker], but it strikes me that by simply stating a few facts that cannot be disputed, the gentleman will be induced to consent to withdraw his proposition. In the first place I deem this to be properly the work of the Legislature. The Legislature has acted in the right direction for the last four or five years, by voting a sum to be distributed among the different localities in the State, in proportion to the assessed valuation of the property in each county.

Mr. BAKER—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALVORD—I will.

Mr. BAKER—I desire to ask the gentleman, does the statute of 1866 or of 1867 provide for the distribution of the appropriation among the counties according to their assessed value, and with the further condition that it is to be according to the number of the recipients of charity in the several counties?

Mr. ALVORD—I hope the gentleman will not take up my whole five minutes in asking questions, but I will answer him. According to the act of 1866 the distribution is to be made according to the assessed value of property in the different counties; and if the requirements were not performed upon the part of the supervisors of any particular county, the money was to remain in the treasury, and not to be distributed to others; but the difficulty in this matter is here. The county of Montgomery needs no hospital; the county of Erie does need a hospital, and the city and county of New York needs several such institutions; and they are needed, not so much for the resident population as for the people who come there from all parts of the State, and of the world, and require aid; so that it is impossible to do any thing like justice toward the charities of the State by putting an inflexible rule like this into the Constitution. If such a rule were adopted, the result would be, as a matter of course, that, the hospitals located upon the great lines and at the great termini of travel throughout the State, would be unable to be sustained at all, because you would have to give to each one of the counties of the State these charitable donations, in the same proportion that you would give them to these institutions; whereas, in very many of those counties, there is no such establishment as a hospital, and no necessity for one, while at these great centers of travel and traffic, such institutions are absolutely necessary, and necessary, as I have already said, not so much for the local population, as for those who come there from other places.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] will not be adopted. The principle which he advocates may be very good for general action, but I can understand that there may well be exigencies in the history of the State where the State should not be tied up by such a provision. Suppose that the cholera should break out in the city of New York, or yellow fever, and suppose there should be a terrible destruction of life by these diseases, and that the charitable institutions of that part of the State should be called upon to make immense expenditures, and that this scourge should not extend beyond that city and neighborhood. Now, if the proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] should be adopted, it would be utterly impossible for the Legislature to make an appropriation to meet the exigency that had arisen without taxing the people enormously, because they would have to make proportional appropriations to the other counties of the State—to the county of Rensselaer, for instance—although the providence of God had protected us there from the cholera and the fever. I can well conceive, sir, that a great many exigencies might arise in the history of this State, where the adoption of this rule would only impose additional burdens upon the people in order to raise money by taxation to be distributed among the respective counties for charitable purposes, without any necessity whatever, but simply because there has been a great calamity in one locality in the State which it was imperatively necessary to meet.

Mr. E. BROOKS—If my friend from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] intends to press his amendment, I hope he will consent to another amendment to be voted upon at the same time—an amendment in the form of a proviso, as follows: "Provided, that all moneys raised in any of the counties of this State for schools and charitable institutions shall be expended in the counties where the money is raised."

Mr. BAKER—I accept the proposition.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I like the suggestion of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker], particularly as modified by my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], if we are to continue this habit of going down to the different localities of the State and gathering from them their means and bringing them up here to Albany, and then distributing them with a diminution of a certain percentage, the amount of which is a matter of considerable flexibility or "plasticity," as my friend from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] would say if he were here [laughter]—depending a good deal upon the consciences of members of the Legislature and the lobby. I say now, if we are to continue this practice, certainly some provision, such as that suggested by the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker], should be adopted. That there are great evils here in the present system of State appropriations, and even in our system of local appropriations, there is no doubt. An illustration of this can be found in almost any locality. I know that in my own vicinity, within a few miles of my residence, there are now two or three individuals retained under the most painful circumstances in the care of their relatives or families, being in some instances in indigent circumstances. In one of these cases, the repulsive chain has to be used to fasten the patient to the floor, although the relatives are as kind as the circumstances of the case will permit; and in another case there are two sons who nobly devote themselves alternately to the care of their afflicted mother. Now, sir, why are those individuals excluded from being benefited by the munificent donations that the State has made for asylums at Utica and elsewhere in the State? It is because these people very naturally do not wish to place their relatives so far away from them. Now, a rule of the kind suggested by the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] would enable counties to make their own local arrangements for the benefit of such sufferers. In none of the counties of Long Island, except the county of Kings, is there any provision for the insane: and I say again that, if we are to continue this plan—this imposition upon the tax payers of the State, there are certainly good reasons why some such provision as that here suggested should be made. In reference to the distribution of paupers throughout the State, the gentleman admits very frankly that if the rural districts are sometimes burdened with the State] paupers, they also return a considerable number upon the city. From the semi-official examination, which I had occasion to make some years ago, it came within my knowledge that upon the island of New York, in the vicinity of the lunatic asylum on Blackwell's Island, there have often been found in a single day, between dark and daylight, thirty or forty individuals from the interior of the State, and sometimes from other States, who have been charitably placed by the city of New York upon Blackwell's Island in the magnificent institution which it sustains there. We must remember, sir, that of the insane alone there are eight or ten thousand of them distributed throughout the State. Some of them, of course, in the asylums and public institutions; but a great many of them under the care of their relatives under such circumstances as I have described. Now, I hope that the principle embodied in the proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] will be in some way recognized here so as to obviate this great wrong. Even if we are to continue to act upon this wrong principle of concentrating here the charitable funds of the State, we can at least, by a provision of this character, secure a fair distribution of these funds; and in this way the localities can provide for their own necessities in a much better manner than those necessities can be provided for here.

Mr. BERGEN—I do not know but the adoption of the proposition as it now stands, will tend to do away with an injustice which has existed in this State for a considerable period. I know that under our present laws and under our past laws, the county of Kings has paid annually about $500,000 into the school fund, and that the distribution of that fund was so managed that we got only about $300,000 back; and New York was treated the same way. I always considered it unfair and unjust, but we never could get any redress because the majority of the State were the gainers by the rule, and they chose to preserve it unchanged. Now, as to the lunatics, the State provides a lunatic asylum at Utica, and I believe they are about building another. In the county of Kings we have a lunatic asylum supported at our own expense, not receiving one dollar from the State; yet we are taxed for the support of these State institutions in which we have, I may say, no inmates—possibly there might be a single one from our county, although I doubt it. The same is true of New York. On Blackwell's Island the city of New York has an insane asylum, which is supported, as I understand, entirely by the city; yet the people of that city and county are taxed for the support of the State institution.

Mr. KETCHUM—I would ask the gentleman whether he does not know that now, every town in the State sustains its own lunatics except two from each town that are received into the State asylums.

Mr. BERGEN—I know that every town in the State has a right to send them to Utica if it likes. The State have paid for the buildings and grounds, but they have not paid for the buildings and grounds in the county of Kings?

Mr. KETCHUM—Does not the gentleman know that very many other counties in the State have local institutions for the insane, and that every other county has to pay for the State asylums the same as the county of Kings?

Mr. BERGEN—The county of Kings pays at all events without receiving in return much benefit.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Baker and it was declared lost.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I offer the following resolution to come in at the end of the twenty-first section:

"But no law shall be passed granting the right to construct and operate a railroad within any of the cities, towns or incorporated villages of this State without the consent of the local authorities of such city, town or village and also the consent of the owners of at least one-third in value of the property as fixed by the assessment roll of the previous year, on that portion of each street through or over which the same shall be constructed, or in case the consent of such property owners cannot be obtained, then without the consent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which said road shall be located; such consent to be obtained and authenticated in such manner as the Legislature shall by general law for that purpose provide."

Gentlemen of the Convention will observe that in this amendment, which I now propose, is contained simply the proposition upon which the Convention voted before and which it adopted in the section which was subsequently struck out. It provides simply that no railroad shall be built in cities or in incorporated villages of the State without the consent of the local authorities which is deemed on all hands to be proper, and which, it has been said, is according to the present state of the law. However that may be, by putting it into the Constitution we will guard against a repeal of the law by the Legislature if it now exists in that form; so that, in no case will any body be able to construct such railroads without obtaining the consent of the municipal authorities. This I understand to be deemed proper by all the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of striking out the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], who is not now present. This proposition then provides that the consent of the owners of at least one-third of the property in value on the lines of the proposed road shall be obtained. The original section requires the consent of the owners to one-half the property in value, but I have reduced it to one-third, so as to meet the objection of gentlemen who thought that one-half was too large a proportion. In case that consent cannot be obtained, application is to be made to the supreme court to obtain consent. All that portion of the article relating to the sale of the franchise at auction has been left out of my amendment. As I said before, each one of these propositions which I now propose, was adopted by this Convention by a separate vote; but they were stricken out on the vote to strike out the whole article. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will adopt my amendment, which is only intended to protect us against what it is admitted would be an improper, unjust action on the part of the Legislature. It will also avoid the necessity, under which I would feel myself, to move to lay on the table the vote adopting the whole, in order to preserve my motion and reconsider the vote by which the article was stricken out.

Mr. BERGEN—I move the same amendment to this that I moved on a previous occasion, to insert after the words "cities or incorporated villages," the word "towns."

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I have no objection to that. I accept it.

Mr. ALVORD—I voted in Committee of the Whole, and voted here when the proposition came up, to strike out this section, and I see no reason to change my view in the altered proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston]. That proposition is liable to this serious objection, that it results in making a perfect monopoly of the roads now in existence in the cities where these corporations control, to a very considerable extent, through the aggregation of their capital and the influence growing out thereof, the city, village, or town authorities. It is a very dangerous provision to put in the fundamental law of the State, and I trust that this whole matter will be left to the Legislature.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I ask to be permitted to answer the gentleman.

The PRESIDENT—No objection being made the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—It was argued by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that there was no necessity for this article, for the reason that the existing law required that the consent of these local authorities should be obtained. Now, if that is the case, the objection urged by the gentleman from Onondaga applies now to the existing law quite as well as it does to the amendment that I proposed.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Certainly.

Mr. ALVORD—It is whether if you put this provision in the Constitution and it should become perfectly obvious that the local authorities were under the control of the existing roads, the Legislature would have the right to pass a law to obviate the difficulty?

Digitized by Google

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Well, sir, I understand that there can be abuses under any Constitution or any law. I would answer that question by asking another, whether if this should go into the Constitution the Legislature would then have the power to grant away the franchises of our cities without their consent? It is to meet that evil that I propose this amendment.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I voted against striking out the seventeenth section for the reason that I believed that it would be better to prohibit the Legislature from granting railroad charters in cities or villages without the consent of the local authorities. I shall vote for the amendment now proposed for the reason that I believe that, notwithstanding there may be danger that the present corporations in cities will try to prevent any further construction of roads, yet I believe that the evil which has grown out of the chartering of these roads, is so much greater that it would be best to put a stop to it. Every winter we have the spectacle of the granting of charters for railroad schemes in the city of New York and of parties waiting here as lobbyists on one side and on the other, and we have this scene enacted over and over again at every succeeding Legislature. Now, let us send this thing home to the local authorities, and say to them, "If you want railroads, consent to have them, and the Legislature will have the power to give them to you when you ask for them." If, on the other hand, they do not desire these railroads, why let them so decide through their local authorities. I think the matter should be left to the local authorities, and for that reason I shall vote for the gentleman's amendment, taking the risk of any evils that may result from the adoption of the provision.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I offer the following substitute, with a view to meet some of the difficulties suggested here in regard to the control of the local authorities: To the end of the twenty-first section add:

"Nor shall any general law be passed by the Legislature to permit the construction or operation of any railroad within the bounds of any city, town or incorporated village, without requiring therein the consent of the local authorities of such city, town or village, and of the owners of one-third of the assessed value of the land contiguous to the line of such road, or the authority of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which such road is to be operated, and prescribing therein the mode of obtaining such consent or authority."

In this substitute it is provided that, the consent of the local authorities shall be obtained, together with that of the owners of one-third of the property (in value) contiguous to the line of such road, taking the same measure in regard to the consent of the owners of the property as is contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], or the assent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which such road is to be operated. And I do this because, heretofore, in the discussions which have arisen at various times in regard to the laying of railroads in cities, an objection was suggested which this is calculated to meet, and I think it does remove the difficulty, and leave it to the Legislature to decide whether the consent of the general term shall be obtained, or the consent of the local authorities of the district, and it does away with all the difficulties which gentlemen apprehend from the possession of the consciences and free will of the local authorities by railroads already existing. And if the Legislature, in their discretion, think that the local authorities are not to be trusted, it can be transferred from them to the supreme court, and the decision be left to a body of men who are not necessarily connected with or influenced by the existing roads.

Mr. BERGEN—Is an amendment to the substitute now in order?

The PRESIDENT—An amendment to the substitute is in order.

Mr. BERGEN—I would move to add after the word "cities" the word "towns."

Mr. ROBERTSON—I accept that amendment. That word was omitted by mistake.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—If I understood the difference between the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] and my own proposition I would probably accept his, but I do not see that there is any difference.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The difference is that the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] is the proposition which was contained in the original clause, which required the alternatives to be merely the consent of the property owners or the authority of the general term of the supreme court, but the consent of the local authorities was required as indispensable. In the substitute which I offer I propose to make the consent of the local authorities or the consent of the owners one alternative, and the authority of the general term of the supreme court the other, so that the Legislature will elect between the two which shall give the sanction for the laying of the road.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—With that explanation, I prefer my own amendment for this reason: I conceive that the cities have an interest in these franchises which should not be taken away without their consent. I think they have quite as much interest in these franchises as the owners of the property have, and while I would be very willing to leave it to the general term as a practical question, yet, as a matter of principle, I think the consent of the city authorities should be obtained.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] presents this question fairly. If the Convention designed by their action not to have railroads built improvidently in the cities, villages and towns, their object will be attained by the adoption of his proposition. If they design to have no more railroads built, their object will be attained by adopting the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston]. Now, it depends entirely on what we want. If we wish to have the present monopolies retain their monopoly for all coming time, then the consent of the local authorities to the building of these railroads should be made indispensable; but if the object of this Convention is to have railroads built only when the needs of the localities require them, then the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] is an entirely safe one, because it makes it necessary to have the assent of the general term of the supreme court, elected by the electors of the locality, if the consent of the local authorities cannot be obtained. Now, although I deem it entirely unnecessary to put any provision of this kind in the Constitution, yet, I am entirely satisfied with the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson], as being a proposition likely to secure the great object of accommodating the people with these railroads whenever they desire such accommodation.

The question was put on the substitute offered by Mr. Robertson, and it was declared lost.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope, sir, that the amendment proposed by my friend from Kings [Mr. Livingston] will be sustained by the Convention. It recognizes the principle that the majority of the Convention are in favor of the principle of allowing the local authorities to determine this matter, and I trust that, before this Convention disperses, we shall have something that will allow the government of our cities to be more conservative than they have been, but even as they have been, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is entirely wrong in saying that more confidence is felt by the constituencies in the Legislature than in the local authorities. Bad as the local authorities may be, they are more amenable to the local public opinion than the Legislature. A man can meet an assistant councilman or alderman in the street and tell him to his face that he has done wrong, or, if he please, that he is a rascal. [Laughter.] Whereas it would cost forty dollars to have that privilege here. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] has spoken of the Constitution of 1846. Sir, one of the great features of that Constitution was decentralization; but, sir, having said what I have said upon this subject, I do not longer desire to detain the Convention.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The question has been put to me in reference to my substitute, "who are the local authorities of a town?" and I can only hand it over to the author of the phrase [Mr. Livingston].

Mr. LIVINGSTON — I must refer the question to the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Bergen] who proposed the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not understand that there are any town local authorities.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—If I may volunteer an answer, sir, I would say that they are the board of town officers known to the law, though not incorporated.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would suggest further, that, this proposition seems to take it for granted that railroads are only laid on streets or across streets; whereas they may be laid over lands where there are no streets. This provides for the consent of the owners of property on the line of the street over which or across which the railroad passes; but it does not provide for the case of a railroad laid where there are no streets.

Mr. LIVINGSTON — If the gentleman will propose an amendment in that respect I will adopt it.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Then I suggest that it be amended by the phrase, "contiguous to the line of railroad."

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move the previous question upon the amendment and the article.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Mr. President—

Mr. ALVORD—I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the hour of two o'clock has arrived.

The PRESIDENT—It had not arrived when the Chair put the motion.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived the PRESIDENT announced that the Convention would take a recess until seven P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock.

Mr. ARCHER — I offer the following as a privileged resolution,

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That Hiram T. French, heretofore appointed assistant doorkeeper of this Convention, be detailed to perform the duties of assistant sergeant-at-arms.

The question was put on the adoption of the resolution offered by Mr. Archer, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ALVORD—I move that when the Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday evening, at seven o'clock.

Mr. BARTO—Make it Tuesday at ten o'clock.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—No, no!

Mr. BEADLE—I propose to amend the resolution by making it ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT—That is already the present order.

Mr. BEADLE—I understood that if we adjourn to-night our next session will be on Monday evening. My objection to adjourn until Monday evening is this: A number of delegates are here, and there is a still larger number in the city who, like myself, have remained here for the purpose of transacting the business that devolves upon us. I think it is due to those of us who sit here and stay away from our homes and business, that we be permitted, if we so desire, to transact business to-morrow as well as any other day in the week.

Mr. ALVORD—I had supposed it was evident to all persons here that there would be no quorum present, and that any one who should raise that question would put us in a dilemma that would be unpleasant, and for that reason I offered the proposition; but upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Chemung [Mr. Beadle] I am entirely willing to stay here to-morrow, and therefore take the liberty of withdrawing the motion.

Mr. GOULD—I renew the proposition. It is certain we cannot hold a session to-morrow.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] please state why we cannot.

Digitized by Google

Mr. GOULD—Because there were not fifty members here to-day, and there will not probably be more than forty to-morrow.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Well, Mr. President, considering that we have not had a quorum present to-day, I think we have got along very well by the practice of courtesy toward one another in respect to raising that question, and I think we can get along equally well by exhibiting the same courtesy to-morrow. Who is responsible in case there are not more than forty members here to-morrow? We can go on with our business to-morrow with whatever number is present, and if the question is raised as to our having a quorum, let the responsibility of blocking our proceedings rest with him who raises the question. We have been doing business here through courtesy, and we have gone on very well; and if with courtesy we succeed so well with sixty members present, I think that, with the same courtesy exhibited with forty present, we shall do much better. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—When the wrath of God was threatened upon a certain city [laughter] the servant of God pleaded with the Deity, and it was found that the city could be saved by a certain number of righteous men. Then it was afterward found that it could be saved by a smaller number, and then by a still smaller number; and as I have no doubt we shall find a number here to-morrow sufficiently large to have saved Sodom [laughter], I think it is better for even that number of good men to go on and transact the business, than to have our business stopped. This has become an intolerable burden upon men who have any thing to do. I have tried to forbear from my business to come here and work this thing out; but you cannot hold on always, and I trust that such as are willing to remain here and attend to business, will be allowed to do so, and that no question will be raised as to our having a quorum. I have no doubt that there will be a quorum (presumptively) to-morrow. [Laughter.] Let that presumptive quorum go on and transact the business, and if the rest of the Convention do not desire to attend, when they do arrive they will find all the work done for them.

Mr. GOULD—I have never heard a faith so great in any man before, and in view of that faith and in compliment to it, I withdraw the motion. [Laughter.]

The Convention again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature as amended in Committee of the whole.

The PRESIDENT announced the pending question to be on the amendment offered by Mr. Livingston, to section 20, by adding thereto the following:

"But no law shall be passed granting the right to contract and operate a railroad within any of the cities, towns or incorporated villages of this State without the consent of the local authorities of such city, town or village; and also the consent of the owners of at least one-third in value of the property as fixed by the assessment roll of the previous year, on that portion of each street through, or over, which the same shall be constructed; or, in case the consent of such property owners cannot be obtained, then without the consent of the general term of the supreme court of the district in which said road shall be located; such consent to be obtained and authenticated in such manner as the Legislature shall, by general law, for that purpose provide."

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Livingston, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SEAVER—I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the motion of Mr. Seaver, it was laid on the table, under the rule.

The PRESIDENT announced the question to be on the adoption of the article as amended.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The previous question having been ordered, the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I did not understand the motion for the previous question to apply to any thing except the pending proposition.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] moved the previous question on the article.

Mr. ALVORD—I move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the previous question.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair decides the motion out of order, the business under the order for the previous question, having been partly executed.

The question was then put on the adoption of the article as amended, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SEAVER—I move a reconsideration of the adoption of the article, and ask that the motion lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT—The motion will lie on the table under the rule.

The Convention then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Future Amendments and Revision of the Constitution, Mr. VERPLANCK, of Erie, in the chair.

After reading document No. 108, being the article reported by the committee, the SECRETARY read the first section, as follows:

SEC. 1. Any amendment or amendments to this Constitution may be proposed in the Senate or Assembly; and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each of the two houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and be referred to the Legislature to be chosen at the next general election when Senators shall be chosen, and shall be published for three months next previous to the time of making such choice, and if in the Legislature so next chosen as aforesaid, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each house, then it shall be the duty of the Legislature to submit such proposed amendment or amendments to the people, in such manner and at such time as the Legislature shall prescribe; and if the people shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of the electors voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become part of the Constitution.

Mr. ALVORD—I would like to have some gentleman suggest an amendment to meet a difficulty to which my attention has been called by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. As we have no general election for Senators under the Constitution as we have revised it, but have only one-half of the Senators elected each alternate two years, the language of the section, as reported, is inappropriate.

Mr. HALE—I would suggest to the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that the language is not "at the next general election of Senators," but "at the next general election at which Senators are chosen." That would be a general election.

Mr. ALVORD—The idea was, unquestionably, on the part of the committee in framing this language, to have a new Legislature speak for the second time upon the proposition as originally proposed by the first Legislature, so that the views of the people could be heard on the subject through the new Legislature. But as we are now situated, with our Senators going out of office one-half at a time instead of the whole number, it seems to me that the benefit sought is entirely done away with. I think it might be well enough to strike out that portion of the section. I move to strike out the words "to be chosen at the next general election at which Senators shall be chosen," and leave it to be referred to the next Legislature.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—That would as effectually carry out the general aim of the provision as if both branches were elected. The proposition for an amendment of the Constitution would be involved in the next election after it had passed the Legislature, instead of being involved in the election of both branches of the Legislature, the people could give the expression of their views upon an amendment in the election of the lower branch.

Mr. ALVORD—In order to avoid the necessity of making a double motion, a further amendment will be required in the ninth and tenth lines. It is to strike out the words "so next chosen as aforesaid," and insert the word "next" before the word Legislature, so that it will read "and if in the next Legislature such proposed amendment," etc.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—When the article was framed, if I recollect aright, the question as to how the Senators should be elected was not settled. Under the present Constitution it is impossible to perfect an amendment to the instrument until after an election of Senators has intervened. These elections take place every two years. In view of the various propositions that were made to have Senators elected every year, or every two years, as the case might be, this language was adopted, but if it is deemed satisfactory to the Convention that a constitutional amendment may be passed one year, and be submitted to the Legislature immediately following, and then be submitted to the people for adoption, the amendment here proposed to the section under consideration would accomplish that result. The same thing would be accomplished now if we have one-half our Senators elected one year and another half the next year. The same thing results from the language used in the present clause if there is an election of Senators every year.

Mr. ALVORD—The election for Senators takes place every two years. We have so altered the Constitution in that regard that it has been agreed that we elect Senators for four years, one-half to be elected every two years. At the first election for Senators under the Constitution, the Senators from the districts having odd numbers are to be elected for two years, and those from districts having even numbers for four years, and thereafter it is required that each two years an election shall be held for half of the Senate.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I had forgotten the fact that the tenure of office for Senators had been extended to four years. As the article is framed, it will require the intervention of a senatorial election after a constitutional amendment is first proposed before it can be passed upon by a second Legislature. Under the proposed amendment it can be done in a single year. The section as framed was designed to postpone the time in which an amendment might be perfected, so that it could receive the sanction of two succeeding Legislatures, one of which should be after a new election of Senators, as is required by the present Constitution. It leaves the subject precisely as it is now. For myself, I have no choice in regard to it, being well satisfied to have the provision so framed that two immediately succeeding Legislatures can perfect such an amendment and submit it to the people, instead of making it necessary to defer action by a second Legislature for one year, more, as might otherwise sometimes be the necessary result. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] will make it possible to perfect an amendment of the Constitution under certain circumstances one year sooner than might be done under the proposed article. Such would be the case when an amendment should be proposed in the first year after an election of Senators, as now.

Mr. ALVORD—I cannot see any possible reason why the clause should be retained when only one-half the Senators of the State are chosen at any senatorial election. It might be well, in the present Constitution, when all the Senators expressing the views of the whole State, so far as that branch of the Legislature is concerned, are elected at the same time. But here, there would be an expression of the views of only one-half of the State, so far as the Senate is concerned, and for that reason, it seems to me that, no advantage is to be gained by letting the question of an amendment to the Constitution go over a general election at which Senators are elected, as is provided in the present Constitution; for certainly the people, speaking through the members of a new assembly, would have all the opportunity necessary to give expression to their views upon the amendment of the Constitution which had passed the previous Legislature.

Mr. VAN COTT—The change in the phraseology requires another change in the section which I have submitted to the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and which I understand he accepts as his motion It is to strike out in the seventh and eighth lines the words "when Senators shall be chosen," and insert "thereto," and then, after the word "previous" in the eighth line; strike out the words "to the time of making such choice."

Mr. ALVORD—I am entirely satisfied with that amendment. Perhaps it is better than the one I suggested.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I would like to hear the section read as it is proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY read as follows:

"And be referred to the Legislature to be chosen at the next general election when Senators shall be chosen and shall be published for three months next previous thereto; and if in the Legislature so next chosen as aforesaid, such amendment or amendments" etc.

Mr. ALVORD—The words "when Senators shall be chosen" are to come out.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—It seems to me that the word "thereto," suggested by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott], makes the section rather awkward.

Mr. VAN COTT—It reads thus: "shall be referred to the Legislature to be chosen at the next general election, and shall be published for three months next previous thereto; and if in the Legislature," etc.

Mr. ALVORD—The next Senate is not chosen at a general election—only a part of the Senate; therefore, it should be left to the next Legislature. It is sufficient, without any reference to a general election or any thing of the kind.

Mr. HALE—I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I am disinclined to favor any proposition which will make an amendment to the Constitution any more easily effected than it is now. I can see nothing in the reason suggested by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. The theory of this section, as it now is, is, that, the people shall have an opportunity to change their representation, not only in the Assembly but in the Senate, before a change in the Constitution is effected. Now the gentleman from Onondaga argues that, because all the Senators are not to be chosen at the same election under the Constitution we propose, therefore, this clause would be of no use. I submit that there is nothing in that argument. It is true that the people will have no opportunity to change the entire Senate; but they can change one-half the Senate between the time of the first and the second passage of the amendment by the Legislature. The effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga is to require a change in the Assembly while the Senate may remain entirely unchanged. If the Constitution we frame shall be adopted, which provides that one-half the Senators shall be elected each alternate two years, why should we not continue the existing safe-guard in the Constitution, and have the concurrence of two Senates, differently constituted, in favor of a proposed amendment to the Constitution, as well as of two Assemblies, differently constituted, before the people are called upon to vote upon a proposed amendment.

Mr. MERRITT—If the action of the second Legislature to be chosen were to be final in making an amendment to the Constitution under this article, there would be pertinency in the remarks of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. But the object of the article is simply to prepare an amendment to be submitted to the people themselves, and they are to decide whether the amendment to the Constitution proposed shall be made. The Legislature is the agent of the people. They can only initiate and prepare the amendment for the final action of the people. There is no necessity for this clause, with the view of getting an expression of the people upon the merits of the proposed amendment, which can be just as well passed the second year as after the new election of Senators; for the people can speak their sentiments in the election of the Assembly. Of course there must be the concurrent action of the two branches of the Legislature, but if you get an expression upon any question of public importance upon which the people desire the Legislature to act, in the election of members of the Assembly, it is all that is needed. The expense or the difficulties that would grow out of the submission of any important amendment are not such but that the people would be willing to incur it. I am very sure that the Legislature would not initiate an amendment and incur the expense of submitting it to the people, unless they demanded it. I am therefore, in favor of the amendment proposed to the section by the gentleman from Onondaga.

Mr. ALVORD—I merely wish to say a few words in answer to the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. It is not a very violent supposition, in view of what we are accomplishing in the Convention, that, our Constitution being accepted by the people, and we electing alternately our Senators, as is proposed to do, this state of things may exist: the Senators who remain in the Legislature, may, perhaps with one or two exceptions be in favor of a certain proposition to amend the Constitution to be submitted. They still continue to represent a large majority of the people of their localities; whereas Senators, who come in, may undertake to make that particular thing a matter of politics in their locality, and thus succeed in being elected by a very small majority in their districts; so that the result would be that, with the aid of two or three of the Senators remaining, the new Senators would be enabled to defeat the proposition for an amendment to the Constitution, although they actually represented but the merest minority of the people of the State.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to this fact: if I recollect the provision in regard to the organization of the Legislature, the election of Senators in a given year is to be in alternate districts over the whole State.

Mr. ALVORD—I understand that perfectly. But the object, and the only object urged for the putting in of this provision requiring that there should be an abeyance in the final action of the Legislature until there should be a senatorial election, was that the lower house, the Assembly, was changed, and that there should also be a complete change in the Senate as well, so that both bodies should come fresh from the people to speak the people's sentiments in reference to the proposed amendment. All that is secured by retaining this provision as reported by the committee, is expression of the opinion of one-half of the smaller body of the Legislature which comes fresh from the people; and we do not get them from the body of the people, we only get them from different localities in the body of the people. Therefore, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and unwise, and it strikes me that there should be no restriction in regard to it any further than that, we shall submit the proposed amendment to two successive Legislatures before sending it to the people for ratification.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—We can now amend our Constitution, if the exigency requires it, in a little less than two years. We have seen a time in this State when certainly my friend from Essex [Mr. Hale] and myself desired to have the Constitution amended. We have amended it during the progress of the war in a way which I trust was entirely satisfactory to my friend from Essex as it was to myself, and by which amendment soldiers in the field in defense of their country and its integrity were allowed to vote, who, by the Constitution as it previously existed in this State, could not have voted. We have found it necessary, at one time, to amend the Constitution since the year 1846, in reference to important and pressing financial measures. It does seem to me that we shall often need to make this amendment, at least we are liable to need to amend the Constitution within a period shorter than the Constitution could be amended if we followed the letter of the report of the committee. I am entirely satisfied that it would be sufficient to have the question submitted to the people of the State, after the preliminaries of passing two successive legislative organizations by a majority, as required in this proposition of the committee, even though one-half of one house had not been changed, or the same house has to pass upon the measure after the lapse of a year, as the amendment has certainly to pass one new house lately elected by the people, and which has been elected in view of the fact that the amendment was pending. Now, it seems to me we shall be entirely safe if we delay putting more shackles upon it, that we really may have our hands tied—may find ourselves powerless at a time when all feel that a majority of the people of this State, and the public interests require that a proposed amendment to the Constitution should be made. I think that we had better make the change.

Mr. RUMSEY—I should like to hear the amendment read as it now stands.

Mr. ALVORD—It is to strike out the words "to be chosen at the next general election when Senators shall be chosen," leaving it to read "be referred to the next Legislature, and shall be published for three months prior to the next general election, and if in the next Legislature such proposed amendments shall be agreed to," etc.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—The more I hear this amendment read, and the modifications of it, the less I am satisfied with them. Sir, this article was framed almost literally in accordance with the language of the present Constitution. There was a little change in the phraseology at this place to meet a supposed change that might be made in regard to the election of Senators. I entirely agree with my friend from Essex [Mr. Hale] that the proposed change is not desirable, not called for by any necessity. The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] says there have been times when we all desired an amendment to the Constitution, in regard to allowing soldiers to vote. Had we any difficulty on that subject? Was there any unnecessary delay as the Constitution now stands in perfecting that amendment?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Had the Constitution not been changed, Horatio Seymour would have been Governor of this State to-day, instead of the present incumbent, and so he would have been in 1864.

Mr. BARTO—It might have been better for the State if he had been. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am only debating the subject from a republican stand-point. [Laughter.]

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Did any difficulty grow out of that case under the present Constitution? Was there any injurious delay in perfecting the amendment allowing soldiers to vote, or in regard to the question of amendment on the subject of finance to which the gentleman refers? Was not that amendment effected in due season for all practical purposes, and were not the public interests well subserved in effecting the change that was made, so far as the time was concerned? Was there any delay in making amendments under the Constitution that was detrimental to the public interest at all? And has there been any case, and can the gentleman point to any case where it has seemed that the public exigency required an immediate and speedy amendment to the Constitution, that the amendment has not been perfected in due time, and without injurious delay under the present Constitution? Sir, it seems to me proper to regard the question of amending the fundamental law of the land as a grave and solemn matter, and one that should be carefully considered, and well considered, by the whole people, and deliberated upon for a sufficient length of time to enable them in all parts of the State to form and express their opinion upon it, and to understand it in all its bearings. Now, sir, there is no delay proposed by the article as framed, beyond the delay that would be necessary under the existing Constitution, as I have before stated. If, under the proposed Constitution, we elect one-half of the Senators from different sections of the State, they certainly will represent the views of one-half of the people of the State. We certainly have one-half of the body fresh from the people, and prepared to speak their sentiments upon the subject. If an emergency should have required, say last year, a constitutional amendment, and it passed the Legislature, then there can be no possible delay about it whatever under the clause as reported by the committee, because the present Legislature could act upon it, and then the question would be submitted to the people as soon as the Legislature should designate, and no possible emergency could arise which would delay the progress of the constitutional amendment more than about a year, the same as under the Constitution as it is. If an amendment was proposed to the present Legislature, and it should adopt it, at the end of two years it could be acted upon by a second Legislature, and submitted to the people for their ratification. In no event need there be, under this article, more than two years' delay required in securing a constitutional amendment. If the change is to be made, as suggested, I think there should be interlined the word "succeeding," before "Legislature."

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN—Does the gentleman propose that amendment?

Mr. E. A. BROWN—No, sir. I am finding fault with the amendment as it is proposed. [Laughter.] Every thing that is desired to be accomplished can be accomplished by striking out the words "when Senators shall be chosen," at the end of the eighth line. As the amendment is proposed it is not good English.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman does not, I think, understand my amendment. I will read it so that he will understand it.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I stated it just as it was proposed to be made at the end of the eighth line. It is to strike out "to" and insert "thereto," so as to make it read, "previous thereto the time," etc.

Mr. ALVORD—The amendment as it is now is this: "be referred to the next Legislature, and shall be published for three months previous to the next general election, and if in the next Legislature such proposed amendment or amendments," etc. That is the way it reads.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I do not wish to criticise the words of the propositions of gentlemen. I prefer to look at the section in all its aspects, as drawn by the committee and reported by them and designed to be adopted in the Constitution. It is not the fault of the committee that we are in this dilemma. It is the fault of the Convention that they have changed the tenure of office of Senators since the report was drawn and which has made this amendment necessary.

Mr. HALE—I ask whether the gentleman understands that, taking the article that we have adopted in regard to the organization of the Legislature, and taking this article precisely as it is, there will be any more delay necessary to get an amendment to the Constitution than there is now.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—In all human probability there would be. I will explain to the gentleman if he will have the kindness to listen. We will suppose the proposed Constitution in operation, and next fall we elect Senators, half for two and half for four years, as the case may be, and the Assembly for the succeeding year. In the month of January next, a constitutional amendment is proposed. Now, if the provision in this article stands, a succeeding Legislature cannot take any action upon the amendment, because there would have been no change in the Senate and it would postpone action upon the matter for two years from the time the first action was taken, instead of postponing it for one year.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman allow me another suggestion? Suppose that under the existing Constitution an amendment should be proposed to the Legislature now in session, is it possible, under the Constitution as now existing, that it could be adopted by the people within two years?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—As I understand the constitutional provision, it may be ratified by the next Legislature and may be submitted to the people of the State for their vote a year from the coming fall.

Mr. HALE—The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I so understand it. I believe that has been the practice in our State when constitutional amendments have been adopted.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—The gentleman [Mr. M. I. Townsend] is mistaken in regard to the provision of the present Constitution upon that subject. An amendment adopted by the present Legislature, cannot be acted upon by a Legislature until two years from now.

Mr. CURTIS—I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Future Amendments of the Constitution, if it was the intention of the committee to change the present plan and enable the people to decide sooner, or was it the intention to continue the present practice?

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I will answer the gentleman by saying that the committee at the time they framed this article conformed it almost literally to the clause in the present Constitution. It was designed to adopt the section of the present Constitution provided the present rule in regard to the election of Senators should continue. If the change in regard to the election of Senators should be such that they should be elected every year then they designed to change this article in the present Constitution so that the amendment would be perfected the year next after it was proposed. That was the intention of the committee as I understand it, that an amendment should not be presented for the action of the second Legislature until after the election of Senators should take place, whether one-quarter, one-half, or the whole were elected at the general election when Senators were regularly chosen. Now, it is a fact that, under the present Constitution, it is impossible to perfect an amendment that is proposed in the Legislature immediately after the election of Senators until two years from that time. There must be an intervening election of Senators before the amendment can be perfected and so it will be in the proposed article as it now stands If the article is adopted as proposed by the committee, it will still require that an election of Senators should take place and the new Senators take their seats before the amendment can be perfected, although only half the Senators of the State be elected. It leaves it precisely as it now is, and as it has been for the last twenty years, with no change whatever in that respect. I insist upon it that no change is called for; that the fundamental law of the land should partake of that degree of stability of which we have heard so much said in this Convention; that no political party, however strong, in the State, should have the power by mere caprice and passion to uproot the Constitution of the State and substitute something in its place which the sober second thought of the people would not ratify. I am in favor of the Constitution in this respect as it has been for the last twenty years.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—For the last forty years?

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Yes, for the last forty-five years.

Mr. KINNEY—I can see very readily why the present Constititution was framed as it is. Under the present provision, the people of the entire State can have an entirely new representation in the Senate every two years, and therefore it would give an expression of their views in the Senate under the provision of the present Constitution; but to have retained the provision which has been reported by the committee, they could only secure the expression of the opinion of only one-half of the people every two years. So I think it is very improper to leave in the provision, but think it would be much better to let the will of the people be expressed in the election of members of the Assembly. They can express their views if they wish, in opposition to any proposed amendment to the Constitution, by the election of a house of Assembly which would be in opposition to it, and just as effectually as they could if their views were represented in both branches of the Legislature. I think it is wise and proper to leave the subject to the action of the newly elected Assembly so far as any further expression is concerned, leaving, of course, the same Senate to act upon it a second time. Emergencies may arise, as they have arisen, when it would be very important for the interests of the people of the State to change the Constitution within two years and not be compelled to wait for three years, which may be the length of time that would be required if the section reported by the committee is retained. If an amendment were proposed to-day in the Legislature it is obvious under this section that the amendment could not be adopted under three years, but if we change the section so that the next Legislature may act upon the proposition which is proposed and adopted by this Legislature, then we can change our Constitution one year earlier, and the people will have an opportunity to act upon the question through their Legislature—at least through the Assembly branch of it, and then, after two successive Legislatures have acted upon it, the people can ratify the amendment, and that I look upon as the great safeguard against hasty legislation in the alteration of the Constitution, and hence I favor the amendment.

Mr. PROSSER—I agree with the gentleman from Tioga [Mr. Kinney] in this respect, that it is better the people of the State should have an opportunity within two years, of amending the organic law, provided two successive Legislatures have approved of the amendment, without reference to the time when the initiation is taken. Hence, I shall favor the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SEAVER—I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment as follows:

Strike out the word "Legislature" in line six, all of lines seven, eight. nine and to. and including, the word "aforesaid" in line ten, and insert in lieu thereof: "next succeeding Legislature, and shall be published for at least three months next previous to the time of holding the general election preceding the meeting thereof, and if—

Mr. HALE—This body has been laboring for some considerable time in endeavoring to make a good Constitution. We commenced, as probably most of us will recollect, about the first of June last, and have been sitting most of the time since then.

Mr. PROSSER—Nearly nine months. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE—We continued our sessions until the last of September, then met again in the middle of November and continued until Christmas time, and then on the fourteenth of this month, we reassembled. The question is whether we are of the opinion that the amount of labor we have bestowed in perfecting the Constitution which we are about to submit to the people, is bestowed in vain—whether our work is a failure, and it is desirable on account of the imperfection of what we have done, that it shall be changed frequently, and whether we shall repeal the rule under which we have acted in this State for the last forty-five years, by enabling changes to be effected in our Constitution easier than they have ever been made before. If my friends in this Convention have come to the conclusion that it is desirable that our work should be changed, and changed easily, I hope they will vote for the proposed amendment. But, Mr. Chairman, my opinion is that we will make a pretty good Constitution, and that there is no especial necessity for us to open the door for changes any oftener than heretofore. The Convention of 1846 spent only about three or four months in their work, and still they were presumptuous enough to provide that the people should not change the Constitution unless by the concurrence of two Legislatures, both branches of which were to be changed. Now, sir, we have determined that there shall be a general election of Senators once in two years, just as there has been for the last twenty years. There has been no change in that respect, except that instead of electing all the Senators at one election, we elect only half at each senatorial election. The argument sounds to me very strange, that, because the people cannot change all their Senators, they shall not have the privilege of giving expression to their views on the subject of the proposed amendment in the election of one-half of the Senators. I can see nothing in the Constitution, as we have adopted it, either in the erroneous provisions we have put in it, or in regard to the organization of the Legislature, which requires us to give the people an opportunity to tear to pieces our work any oftener than they have done it heretofore. I shall therefore vote to retain the section precisely as it has been reported by the committee, with substantially the same language that has been in the Constitution for the last twenty years.

Mr. SEAVER—I will call the attention of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], to the fact that, the proposed amendment leaves the Constitution in precisely the same condition in which it has been for the last twenty years. It might so happen, under the present Constitution, that an amendment would be proposed during the last year of the senatorial term, when it would be referred to the next Legislature. It requires the concurrence of only two successive Legislatures. Changing the mode of electing our senators so that one-half are elected every two years, it is impracticable to retain the provision as it stands in the present Constitution. It is inapplicable to the condition of things that we propose. So that we get the concurrence of two successive Legislatures to any proposed amendment, we get all that is desired. That is all that has been done heretofore, and is all that we should look for now.

Mr. CURTIS—The gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], will see that the words in the Constitution of 1846, "referred to the Legislature, to be chosen at the next general election of Senators," although substantially the same as the words used in the present article, mean a different thing. In the Constitution of 1846 the word "Senators" is used to express the Senate — the whole body of the Senate. If, therefore, the rule of interpretation which is applied to the Constitution of 1846 is now to be applied to this article, it will inevitably leave a space of some four years, possibly, to intervene; and thus even the opportunity to secure an amendment to the Constitution will be delayed for that time.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the language proposed by the committee, which I supposed to be precisely the language of the Constitution of 1846—I may be mistaken. It is, "at the next general election when Senators shall be chosen," which is once in two years.

Mr. CURTIS—It is substantially the same in the Constitution of 1846. It is referred to the Legislature to be chosen at the next general election of Senators." In the present article it is to be "referred to the next general election when Senators shall be chosen." Suppose that two Senators have died previous to the general election. Then at that election two Senators will be elected. In the sense of the present article, that is the next general election when Senators shall be chosen; and that would defeat the intention of the article as stated by the Chairman. Therefore, it is clear to me, as I supposed when I addressed my question to the Chairman, that the present article is prepared with a different view of the constitution of the Senate, from that which the article upon that subject as adopted by us, now provided, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], remarks; and consequently the necessity of some change in the phraseology of this article, in order to bring it to the precise point of the present Constitution, is evident.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr Seaver, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SPENCER—I move to strike out of lines eight and nine the words "and shall be published for three months next previous to the time of making such choice,"

Mr. ALVORD—I suppose the question is now upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—The other amendment having been disposed of, a second amendment is in order.

Mr. SPENCER—Do I understand that another amendment is pending?

The CHAIRMAN—There is an amendment pending, the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

Mr. SPENCER—I will withdraw my amendment until that is disposed of.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Alvord, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 29 ayes, noes not counted.

Mr. SPENCER—I now move the amendment proposed by me, to strike out of lines eight and nine the words "and shall be published three months next previous to the time of making such choice.

Mr. FOLGER—I request that the section be read as amended, from the sixth line down to the twelfth.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the section as amended.

Mr. SPENCER—I now make another trial. I move to strike out the words "and shall be published for three months next previous to the time of making such choice." Not that I have any objection to the publication of the notice, but that this clause, as it is here, is entirely useless for any purpose whatever. Ever since the history of the government, I believe, the laws have been published—all laws, all joint resolutions, and all other resolutions of the Legislature, in the usual form of published volumes; and that is all which this would require; and it would give no more notice to the people than is now given by the published volumes of the laws; so that this provision here, although it is in the present Constitution, adds nothing to the obligation of the public officers, or of the Legislature, to provide for giving notice to the people of a proposed amendment.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—It seems to me that the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] misapprehends the object of this publication, the object being to call the attention of the electors especially to the fact that the election involves the proposed amendment to the Constitution. This was the object, no more nor less.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered to section 1, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. At the general election to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also at such other time as the Legislature may by law prescribe, the question, "Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?" shall be decided by the electors; and in case a majority of the electors voting on the question at such election, shall decide in favor of a Convention, the Legislature at its next session, shall provide by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

Mr. BARTO—I move to amend this section by inserting after the word "majority," in the sixth line, the words "of the whole number," and strike out the words "on the question," in the seventh line, and insert the words "for members of Assembly," so that it will read, "and in case a majority of the whole number of electors voting for members of the Assembly at such election."

Mr. BELL—I would like to ask the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto] how he can ascertain the whole number.

Mr. BARTO—From the returns in the Secretary of State's office.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—There is no general return made of the number of votes cast for members of Assembly. Substitute the word "Governor" and it will reach the same point, and, I think, will be an improvement.

Mr. CURTIS—It seems to me that the purport of this amendment is, that, there shall be a majority of the electors voting upon one question to decide another. The question to be submitted is, whether the people of the State wish a Constitutional Convention. The amendment proposes to provide that that question shall be decided by a majority of those voting for members of the Assembly. It seems to me there is no congruity between the two subjects.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—This question was raised before the committee, and has heretofore been suggested in Convention. Previous to 1821 no question was ever submitted directly to the people whether they would have a Convention to revise or amend their Constitution, or whether they would adopt a proposed Constitution, or an amendment to their Constitution. A proposition was made, an act passed by the Legislature, which resulted in submitting that question—of holding a Convention—to the people, in 1821. In that year the legal voters of the State numbered 259,387. At the previous election for the office of Governor (in 1820), 93,437 voted for that officer. The number was much less, of course, than the whole number of legal voters in the State, but the number of those permitted to vote for Governor was restricted by the property qualification required for the electors who voted for Governor. Of the 259,387 voters in the State in that year, 144,277 were all that voted upon the question of holding a Convention in 1821 to revise and amend the Constitution of the State—a little more than half of the whole number of electors, who were permitted to vote upon the question. The vote was 109,376 for, and 34,901 against, holding such Convention. In February, 1822, after the Convention had completed its labors and the result was submitted to the people for ratification—and it may well be supposed that it was deemed at that time a very important question for the people of this State, being the first time that it was ever submitted to them to adopt or reject any Constitution by the vote of the people—notwithstanding, in point of fact, sir, that it was an important question, and so deemed by the people of this State, the whole number of votes given upon the question of ratification or rejection of that Constitution was only 116,134—74,732 in favor of adopting the Constitution, and 41,402 against it. Now, sir, if the requirement proposed by the honorable gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto] had been made the rule in 1821, that Constitution would have failed of being made or adopted by the electors of the State. In 1826 another important question was submitted to the people of this State in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, and that was removing the property qualification as applicable to the white voters of the State. It may be well supposed, and in point of historical fact is true, that that question agitated thoroughly the people of this State, but when the proposed amendment was perfected by the Legislature and submitted to the people, the question received, all told, 130,292 votes, viz.: 127,077 for, and 3,215 against, the amendment. As I said before, the vote for Governor in 1826 was restricted on account of the property qualification and amounted to only 96,074, but at the election of Senators in 1827—and always a less number of voters are called out in years when a Governor is not elected and when Congressmen are not elected—in 1827 the vote for Senators in the State was 177,809. The whole number of voters in the State was 308,000 in 1826, and 321,000 in 1827. Now, the next question that came before the people of the State, to which I will call attention, was the amendment proposed in 1833, and that was to authorize the Legislature to reduce the duties on salt. That was one proposition; another proposition was to allow the electors in the city of New York, to elect their own mayor. On the first question, as to the salt duties, the whole number of votes on the question of adopting that amendment to the Constitution was 101,152, viz.: 93,286 for, and 786 against, and the vote for Governor was 323,982 in the year before, in 1832; and the vote for Senators in 1833 was 186,540, making something over 85,000 more votes for Senators than were given on the adoption of this amendment. On the question of allowing the electors of the city of New York to choose the mayor of that city, submitted also in 1833, the vote was for the amendment, 48,977, against it, 1,963—a total of 50,913—or nearly 136,000 less than the vote for Senators at that election, and the senatorial vote was only forty-seven per cent of the legal voters of the State, as shown by the census. The question of calling a Convention to revise the Constitution submitted in 1845 received 213,257 for, and 33,860 against—total, 247,117; total vote for Senators the same year, 337,496, or 90,379 more votes for Senators than on the question of holding a Convention, and the vote for Senators was only about sixty-two and a third per cent of the legal electors of the State at that time. The total vote on adopting the Constitution of 1846, was only 313,964, while the aggregate vote for Governor the same year was 406,720, or 92,756 more than on the question of ratifying the proposed Constitution. And so I might proceed through the whole list, clear down to the present time. There has not been one single occasion when a vote was taken either on the question of calling a Constitutional Convention, of ratifying a proposed Constitution, or on the question of adopting or rejecting an amendment of the Constitution, when the aggregate vote so given has come anywhere near the aggregate vote for the principal officers of the State elected at the same election; sometimes not one-quarter, sometimes not one-half the amount, sometimes lacking one hundred or two hundred thousand. And so in regard to the very question submitted under the present Constitution, whether this Convention should be held—it lacked about 110,000 votes upon the question of calling this Convention, or not calling it; there were 110,000 votes less than on the question of Governor; and so in 1858, when the question was submitted to the people whether they would call a Constitutional Convention, or not, there were 135,166 in favor of it, and 145,126 against it.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND — Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Do I understand him to say there were one hundred thousand votes short of the necessary vote last year; that on the question of calling the Convention there were one hundred thousand votes less than for the Governor? I understood him to say so.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I will state again, and give the exact figures. The vote for Governor in 1866 was 719,195, and the vote on the question of Convention or no Convention was 609,219; about 110,000 less on the question for Convention or no Convention than on the question of Governor. In 1858 the vote for and against calling a Convention was 276,692. The vote for Governor was 544,816, nearly twice the number given on the question of a Convention. And so I might allude to the other amendments—that in regard to negro suffrage in 1860, and several other propositions to amend the Constitution. Not one single case is to be found, except in regard to Governor in 1820 and 1826, when the number of voters was limited by the property qualification, not one single case can be found where the vote of the people on the question either of a Convention to revise and amend the Constitution, or upon the adoption of a Constitution, or upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution, to be perfected by the Legislature and submitted to the people, reached any thing like the vote which was given for public officers at the general election; and the affirmative vote in no one case (except as I have stated as to the Constitution of 1846) amounts to a majority of those who voted on the question of Governor or Senators at the same election. The largest proportional vote that I remember of being ever given upon those questions was in 1860, against the change on the question of suffrage, and in 1866, on the question of calling this Convention; but in neither case, if I remember right—certainly not in 1866—was there a majority of those who voted for Governor in favor of calling this Convention. So that the amendment proposed, Mr. Chairman, would amount, practically, in all human probability, to an absolute prohibition of any amendment to the Constitution, however desirable it might be deemed by the people of the State; for, sir, I cannot conceive any likelihood, or any probability, that the people hereafter will turn out and vote more generally on such questions than they have done heretofore. It is not to be supposed that, hereafter, questions of more importance to the people of the State are to be submitted in this form, and for these purposes, than have been submitted heretofore on the same questions. The article in question is substantially that in the present Constitution; and for myself, I am decidedly in favor of retaining it. The committee who have considered this subject were some of them very strenuously in favor of it, and I do not know that any one has uttered any objection to it. I hope it will meet the favorable consideration of this committee.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—The question at immediate issue is whether, what may be styled a fragmentary vote shall decide the important question of calling a Constitutional Convention, or whether a prescribed vote shall be required. It was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of the article in the present Constitution—although from a defect in the reported debates the fact is not fully stated—that no vote less than a majority of the largest vote of the people voting on other questions at the general election should sanction the important step of calling a Constitutional Convention once in twenty years, or at any other time the Legislature should submit the question. I have missed, in our scattered attendance and vacant seats this evening, the assertion which has been made fifty times heretofore in the Convention, that, we were making a Constitution for twenty years. That has been the constant cry. We are legislating now for twenty years. The theme this evening is to lessen the restriction even within three years, which is now the time of limitation which has been existing since 1821 for an amendment of the Constitution through the Legislature. I am in favor of the views expressed by the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto] in his amendment to retain all the barriers that now exist against too frequently placing even in as wise a body as this, or any other that may follow us, the power of shattering, assailing or changing the fundamental law, whilst the proviso exists; and it undoubtedly will as it has existed in the State for forty-six years, of allowing two Legislatures, with the approval of the people, to make general or special amendments. There is no necessity for putting the people to the expense and excitement—for there will be excitement in ordinary times attending the meeting of this body. We are assembled in extraordinary times, when, as I have said, the world appears to be infatuated. Without conventions nothing can be done. The base-ball clubs hold their conventions; the pugilists theirs. Every thing takes the form of a convention. We have got them over the Union now in ten or a dozen different States, in all their various forms and hues, and I consider it would be wise in us to retain all the barriers regarding and restraining these calls, that the framers of the instrument, under which we have lived for twenty years, meant should exist. I remember distinctly the fact, although it is not stated in the debates, that when that provision was adopted in 1846, there was a remark made to the circle sitting near myself on the floor, "We have fixed this question so that there will be no other Convention within twenty years, and not then unless it is required by a decided and emphatic vote of a majority of the electors of the State." What will be the effect, carrying out the ideas of the extremes—for that is the way we take to illustrate questions here—if we adopt the plan of the chairman of the committee, considering the carelessness of the people of the State and their neglect, at times, of the discharge of their duties as electors? Some excitement may sweep over them, for we are very much a people of one idea; it may be temperance, spiritualism or Fenianism, or secession, if you please, which latter I fervently hope we may never see again; and in the excitement of an election the whole question of the Convention would be lost sight of. I think this guard which has been suggested is necessary: that the vote upon the question should be at least equal to a moiety of the vote taken at the same time for the office of Governor, changing in that respect the language of the existing Constitution, which requires a majority of those "qualified to vote for members of the Legislature" in the State; and making this change simply on the ground that no return is made to the Secretary of State of the vote for members of Legislature. The Secretary of State's office greatly neglected their duty in submitting the question, whether the people would sustain a Convention or not, in not requiring of the county clerks a return of the number of votes cast in their county for the members of the Legislature. There is no such return found in the Secretary's office; the return is necessarily found in regard to the office of the Governor. Without that return, it was wholly incompetent for them to declare that the necessary vote had been given to call this Convention. My opinion, as heretofore expressed, is that it never was legally called. We have waived that matter, however. I have joined with others in meeting in Convention to modify and perfect the Constitution. Under this view I do not wonder that the committee of the Legislature last winter, some members of which have been honored with a seat on this floor, hesitated, as they did, for a long while, to report a bill in reference to the matter at all. All the legislation that was required, was on providing for the election of members. That is the language of the Constitution. The moment they went one jot beyond that, they went beyond their authority. I hope I am not intrusive in asking whether these doubts were not the cause of the long delay on the part of the committee of the Legislature in sanctioning the report, which I suppose they had from the Secretary of State's office, that the people had sanctioned a call for a Convention. I never deemed that they had sanctioned it. I always supposed the vote was seven thousand short. My figures show that. The gentleman's figures show as I understood him, more votes needed, making it still worse; and furnishing still more reason for hesitancy on the part of the Judiciary Committee in the last Legislature, and still more authority for delay. I hope we shall do nothing now, at such a period of excitement and disturbance generally, as we are in, and which unfortunately is likely to continue, to take down the bars, so that the Constitution and laws of this great Commonwealth can be too readily assailed in any way, either with good or evil intent. We must remember it has been said here—I have learned it since I have been in this Convention, and it is a pleasing fact for us of this State,—that the Constitution of 1777 — framed mainly by the gentleman whose stately pictorial official representation graces your left, sir — John Jay — was said to form the essential type of the Constitution of the United States in 1787. We know, sir, how reluctant the people were, as the chairman of the Committee has said here, to change essentially the Constitution of 1777 in 1821. We know how reluctant our people have been since 1846 to modify the Constitution when it has been proposed to do so. Several different attempts were made—one or two to call a Convention—another to modify the Constitution, and it has been voted down by large votes; and I believe that, as I have said before, a constitutional vote of the people of this State did not authorize this Convention; thus confirming my theory of their reluctance to organic changes. Still, we are here and must give some return, if practicable, for the time that has been spent, and the money that will be disbursed, before we get through. I should be glad to hear, if now in order, the views of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], who knows the difficulties which surrounded the subject last year in the Senate, upon this point.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—My friend misapprehended me in what I said in regard to the vote for a Convention. The vote for the Convention was 352,854, and half of the votes for Governor about 359,000.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Then the gentleman confirms my view, that, under the proper construction of the article the vote was seven or eight thousand short of the prescribed vote. The immediate point is, shall we allow a small, fragmentary vote to control? Shall five thousand votes control the question, if there are no more cast, when there are probably nine hundred thousand voters in the State? Some may say that the people ought to attend to it. That may do very well in theory, but in practice it will not answer. The people often want guards and checks. Some will say confidently, "I don't want any of these; they are not needed;" but I have found by an experience, and a pretty active one, of over fifty years, that checks and guards were always required and useful, and it is our duty here to retain them in all their efficiency in the Constitution.

The question was then put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Barto, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—I move to strike out, in the second line, the words "eighty-six," and insert "eighty-eight," or insert "eight" in place of "six," so as to make the year in which the vote shall be taken 1888 instead of 1886.

Mr. KINNEY—In case a Convention should be ordered that would bring the Convention in the same year with the presidential election. I think we have seen enough of Conventions sitting during intense political contests.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It would be the odd year.

Mr. KINNEY—That will be the year in which the vote for or against the Constitution will be taken, and the next year it will be ordered, which is the year of political excitement.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It would occur in the odd year.

Mr. KINNEY—That is true; I am mistaken, and I withdraw my objection.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Hitchcock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. WALES—I move to strike out the words "eighty-eight" and "twentieth," in the second line, and insert "ninety-three" and "twenty-fifth," so that these recurring calls will come every twenty-five years instead of every twenty years.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Wales, and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move that the committee rise and report the article to the Convention and recommend its passage.

Mr. GRAVES—I would like to have the article read and see what the amendments are.

The article as amended was read by the SECRETARY.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. VERPLANCK, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the article reported from the standing Committee on Future Amendments and Revisions of the Constitution, and had gone through with the same and made some amendments thereto; and had instructed their Chairman to report the same to the Convention and recommend its passage.

There being no objection the report of the committee was agreed to, and the article referred to the Committee on Revision.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—If it is now in order I wish to move to lay on the table a notice of reconsideration of the vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto].

The motion was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT—The next business is the report of the Committee on Cities, their organization, government and powers.

Mr. MERRITT—The Chairman of that committee is necessarily absent this evening, and did not expect this report to be taken up for consideration. He hoped, however, if it should come up, that it might be laid over for the evening session. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared carried.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. C. L. Allen, and it was declared lost.

The PRESIDENT—The Convention will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon the report of the standing Committee on Education; Mr. M. I. Townsend, of Rensselaer, will take the chair.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would ask to be excused from the fact that uncontrollable circumstances will compel my absence from the Convention in a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman is excused. Mr. Prosser, of Erie, will take the chair.

Mr. PROSSER, accordingly took the chair.

The SECRETARY then read the report of the Committee on Education and the funds pertaining thereto, at the conclusion of which

The first section was read by the SECRETARY as follows:

SEC. 1. The capital of the common school fund; the capital of the literature fund; the capital of the United States deposit fund; the capital of the college land-scrip fund, and the capital of the Cornell endowment fund as it shall be paid into the treasury, shall be respectively preserved inviolate. The revenues of said common school fund shall be applied to the support of common schools; the revenues of said literature fund shall be applied to the support of academies, and the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars of the revenues of the United States deposit fund shall each year be appropriated to and made a part of the capital of the said common school fund; the revenues of the college land-scrip fund shall each year be appropriated and applied to the support of the Cornell University, in the mode and for the purposes defined by the act of Congress donating public lands to the several States and Territories, approved July 2d, 1862; and the revenues of the Cornell endowment fund shall each year be paid to the trustees of the Cornell University for its use and benefit.

Mr. ALVORD—Mr. Chairman, it is evident that since we went into Committee of the Whole a considerable number of the members of the Convention have left. I therefore move that the committee do now rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the Committee rose and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convenion.

Mr. PROSSER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Education and the Funds pertaining thereto; had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention, and ask leave to sit again.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. WALES—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Wales, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, January 18, 1868.

The Convention met at ten A. M., pursuant to adjournment.

The journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. MERRITT—We are making such satisfactory progress in our work at this time that we may soon hope to be able to submit it to the people, and I now offer this resolution, looking to that end.

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to examine into and report upon the following subjects:

1 The manner and form in which the Constitution as amended and adopted, shall be submitted to the people, for their rejection or adoption.

2. The publication of the amendments, or of the Constitution as amended.

Digitized by Google

3. The form of the notice of election.
4. The form of the ballot or ballots.
5. The time at which the Constitution or amendments shall be submitted to the people.

The question was put on the resolution of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. CURTIS—I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Georgia Constitutional Convention, requesting that he may be favored with a printed copy of the journals of this Convention in pursuance to which request I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Convention be instructed to furnish one copy of the debates as they are printed, to the Secretary of the Georgia Constitutional Convention, in accordance with his request.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would state to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], that if this resolution calls for any copies additional to those allowed by the rules it must be referred to the Committee on Contingent expenses. The resolution will take that reference for inquiry.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to strike out of the article on suffrage, and the qualifications to hold office, in section —, the words, "nor while a student of any seminary of learning," and report the article to the Convention.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman rising to debate the resolution, it lies on the table under the rule.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I desire to inquire of the Chair, at this time, in what position we stand in reference to an adjournment to-day; whether there is any resolution making it imperative upon us, when we adjourn, to adjourn to Monday evening?

The PRESIDENT — The Chair understands that under the existing rule, when the Convention adjourns to-day, it adjourns to meet on Monday evening at seven o'clock.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Will it be in order to move a reconsideration of that?

The PRESIDENT—No motion to reconsider is necessary.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I move that when this Convention adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. CURTIS—Is it not the standing rule for the Convention to adjourn at twelve o'clock on Saturday?

The PRESIDENT—It is not; that portion of the rule is abrogated.

Mr. GRAVES—Is an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] in order.

The PRESIDENT—It is not.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. S. Townsend, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CASE—In view of the difficulty that we have had in keeping a quorum present, and hoping that this may tend to obviate it, I offer the following resolution:

WHEREAS, Several members of the Convention have for some time past wholly absented themselves from its daily session, not participating in its deliberations; and

WHEREAS, It is presumed the causes that have heretofore will hereafter prevent their attendance and participation in the labors and duties devolving upon them as delegates; therefore

Resolved, That all delegates that are prevented from further discharge of the duties they owe their constituents, in attendance on the Convention, by circumstances beyond their control, be respectfully requested to resign their seats in this body, to the end that a less number will be required to constitute a quorum for transaction of business, thereby facilitating the completion of the important work remaining unfinished.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I think there is enough of this kind of thing in the Assembly, without having it here—

The PRESIDENT — The gentleman rising to debate the resolution, it lies on the table under the rule.

Mr. HALE—I move that this Convention do adjourn to-day, at twelve o'clock M.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—This motion is not debatable.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale, and it was declared lost.

The Convention again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on Education and the Funds pertaining thereto, Mr. PROSSER, of Erie, in the chair.

The SECRETARY again read the first section, as follows:

SEC. 1. The capital of the common school fund, the capital of the literature fund, the capital of the United States deposit fund, the capital of the college land scrip fund, and the capital of the Cornell endowment fund, as it shall be paid into the treasury, shall be respectively preserved inviolate. The revenues of said common school fund shall be applied to the support of common schools; the revenues of said literature fund shall be applied to the support of academies, and the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars of the revenue of the United States deposit fund shall each year be appropriated to and made a part of the capital of the said common school fund; the revenues of the college land scrip fund shall each year be appropriated and applied to the support of the Cornell University, in the mode and for the purposes defined by the act of Congress donating public lands to the several States and Territories, approved July 2, 1862; and the revenues of the Cornell endowment fund shall each year be paid to the trustees of the Cornell University, for its use and benefit.

Mr. CURTIS—Before proceeding to amend this section, I wish to make a motion for the purpose of testing the will of the committee. It is inevitable that the session of the Convention to-day will be very brief. It is evident that the number in attendance is very small, and that it will be necessary for the Committee on Education, in case the debate proceeds, to make certain statements in regard to the article now under consideration, which should be made in the hearing of the full Convention, and which will not come before the members of the committee at large unless they should be present. It will, therefore, involve the necessity of repeating by fragments hereafter whatever might be said on the subject to-day, and in view of that fact I shall move that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope not, sir. Let us go on and perfect this article, and then, if those gentlemen who are now absent have the bad taste, when they come here, to overturn what we have done, let them do it. I am surprised that this motion should be made by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], because I had always supposed that he was a man in favor of going ahead.

Mr. CURTIS—I make the motion because of the evident fact that there are so few members present that we cannot make any considerable progress.

Mr. ALVORD—I call the gentleman to order; the motion is not debatable.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will not now rise—

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] is out of order.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Then we are both out of order. [Laughter.]

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Curtis, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. PROSSER from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the standing Committee on Education and the Funds pertaining thereto, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention, and ask leave to sit again.

A DELEGATE—I move that the committee have leave to sit again.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Would a motion be in order to go again immediately into Committee of the Whole upon this subject?

The PRESIDENT—The motion for leave to sit again may be amended in that way.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Then I make that motion.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—It must be evident to gentlemen here that the number present is so small that we shall hardly be able to go on and transact any business, and I hope, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] will be adopted.

Mr. CURTIS—My motion was simply intended to save the time of members of the Convention, because, it is inevitable that whatever I might say in explanation of the report of this morning, I should have to repeat upon the continuation of the discussion when we should have a fuller attendance hereafter. It is a matter of plain perception, and I am sure the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] cannot fail to see it.

Mr. ALVORD—The difficulty in this case, suggested by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] will be the difficulty in each and every one of the cases that will come up here. We have to do one of two things, either to adjourn now and wait until we get a quorum, or to go on as far as we can in the transaction of the business before the Convention. The difficulty is, that, if the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] be permitted to have his view of this case carried out by the Convention, that action will have to be continually repeated hereafter, because the same difficulty will be continually coming up.

Mr. CURTIS—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] will certainly acknowledge that Saturday has always been an exceptional day with us in the Convention. So far as I am aware, we have never done any serious or considerable business on Saturdays.

Mr. ALVORD—Then if we cannot do any thing, let us adjourn.

Mr. BELL—I have a very great regard for the members of this Convention who are absent, particularly those who are necessarily absent; but I have a greater esteem for those who are present to attend to their duties; and if we have to wait to present and discuss reports until we have a quorum, I fear we shall not be able to any thing at all. I should be very glad to favor the desire of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] on this subject, but I do not see how we can do it without giving up the attempt to do any business. I am not aware that at any time during the past we have had a quorum here.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—There has never been a quorum actually present in this hall for one minute during the past week.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—Oh yes.

Mr. BELL—With all due deference to the Chairman of the Committee on Education, I am of opinion that we had better go on with this article now, and debate it as best we may. If other members who are absent are dissatisfied with the results at which we have arrived during their absence, they will have the chance to go over the ground again, as they have already done in some instances; but it is due to ourselves and our constituents that we make progress here as rapidly as possible, whether we have a quorum or not; and therefore I am in favor of going on with the consideration of this report.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am exceedingly sorry that the members of the Convention who do not attend here are so pressed with their private business, or are so regardless of the public interests, as not to be here. But the intention of the larger proportion of the members of this Convention, in regard to attendance upon its sittings, is perfectly manifest at the present time. There is left, however, in this Convention intellectual power enough to transact any business in which the State is interested. It is no boast to say that we have gentlemen here who are experienced in legislation, experienced in the business of life, and acquainted with the needs of the State, and that we have enough of such gentlemen to go on and judiciously arrange every article that is to be arranged and perfected by this Convention. We have a number here that can be counted on for regular attendance very much larger than the numbers of the State Senate, to which the most important interests of the State are intrusted, and through which every act of legislation must pass. Now, why should not we, who are here, and who are left to discharge our duties as members of this Convention, go on and transact our business, and why should we be subjected to personal inconvenience or loss by attending here from day to day waiting for men who do not come, and who plainly do not mean to come, except as it suits themselves? Sir, I should not esteem it a calamity to this State, if just the number of men who are here to-day should make the final disposition of this article. We should probably arrange it as judiciously as if there were greater numbers in attendance upon this floor. Last night when I opposed an adjournment over to-day, I suggested that if we had but twenty members here to-day, and a presumptive quorum, that we should go on with the business; and I understood last night that it was in that spirit we were to come here to day. Now, sir, I hope that we shall not decide that the gentlemen now sitting in this hall are not competent to discuss and dispose of this article.

Mr. MERRITT—While I am free to admit the soundness of the position taken by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. It must be evident to all that we have but a very small number of members present. This report is as important as any that has come before us, or that will come before us during the progress of our labors. It is an article which affects every school district in the State, and one which should have a very full and deliberate discussion, and I therefore move that this Convention do now adjourn, giving notice to all who may wish to be here next Monday, that this subject will then be taken up. I do this as a matter of courtesy to the committee, and of justice to the subject of their report.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], to again go into Committee of the Whole on this report.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, for the previous question, and it was declared carried, and the main question ordered.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, to go into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Education and the Funds pertaining thereto, and it was declared carried.

The Convention then again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the standing Committee on Education and the Funds pertaining thereto, Mr. PROSSER, of Erie, in the chair.

Mr. GOULD—I move to pass over the first section.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Why?

Mr. GOULD—Because the first section will probably elicit a very considerable amount of debate, and we shall gain no time whatever by considering it, and I think we had better go on with the second section.

Mr. ARCHER—I can see no reason for passing over the first section that will not apply to each subsequent section, and if we are constrained to proceed now with the consideration of this report, I hope we shall take it up in its order.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Gould, and it was declared lost.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I move to amend the first section by striking out from lines twelve and thirteen the words, "to the support of the Cornell University," so that the clause will read: "The revenue of the college land scrip fund shall each year be appropriated and applied in the mode and for the purpose defined by the act of Congress donating public lands to the several States and Territories, approved July 2d, 1862." I desire to make a few remarks in support of this amendment. It seems to me that the recommendation of the committee to appropriate the revenues of this college land scrip fund to the Cornell University involves a very wide departure from what has been our accustomed policy in similar matters heretofore, and I think it will be conceded that we should not depart from what has been the traditional policy of the State in matters of mere expediency, unless such departure is manfestly an improvement, or unless the chances preponderate very much in favor of its being so. Now, the traditional policy of the State, heretofore, in regard to funds which have been devoted to educational purposes, has uniformily been to provide for the inviolability of the capital by a Constitutional provision, and by a similar provision to appropriate their revenues in general terms to certain kinds of education; but we have never yet had in the Constitution a specific appropriation of the revenues of any of these funds to a particular institution. This has been the policy of the State for nearly fifty years, as long as we have had any policy on the subject of education indicated in the Constitution. It was embodied in the Constitution of 1821. Twenty-five years' experience dictated its re-affirmance in the Constitution of 1846, and it has stood the test of our additional experience down to the present time. The Committee on Education bear witness to this by recommending the transfer, literally, from the Constitution of 1846, of all the provisions in relation to education in that instrument; the only change which they recommend to be made is in regard to the revenues of these new funds, the college land scrip fund, and the Cornell endowment fund. Now, as to the Cornell endowment fund, there was a misunderstanding between Mr. Cornell and the commissioners of the land office as to the meaning of that provision of the act, authorizing the sale of the scrip, which required that the profits, after the sixty cents an acre, which the law intended should go into the college land scrip fund, should also be paid in by the purchaser for the benefit of the institution which was organized by that act. Mr. Cornell claimed that he had a right to make that a fund which should appear as a gift from him, and the commissioners of the land office accepted it as such; which makes the case of that fund an exceptional one, and perhaps, the recommendation of the committee, as to the income of that fund, is right. But there is nothing of that kind to affect the college land scrip fund, and I cannot see what necessity there is, or what advantages will accrue to the cause of education, from appropriating in that way the income of that fund to an institution which has not yet gone into practical operation. The committee in their report have not assigned any reason why it should be done;

Digitized by Google

though, perhaps, they may do so in their remarks before this committee. But it seems to me there are many reasons why it should not be done, and that the advantages of complying with their recommendation are at least problematical. The income of this college land scrip fund is already appropriated by the act of Congress making the grant, and by the act of the Legislature accepting it, to the support of institutions which shall make education, as connected with agriculture and the mechanic arts a leading feature. Then, by a subsequent act of the Legislature, the revenues have been appropriated to the Cornell University on certain conditions, one of which is, that Mr. Cornell should give five hundred thousand dollars as a part of the endowment of this university, that amount to be given beyond recall. Another condition was, that he was to give twenty-five thousand dollars as the endowment of a professorship of agricultural chemistry in the Genesee College at Lima. The sequel has shown that this latter "gift" was but a temporary loan. The law organizing and incorporating the Cornell University was passed in the spring of 1865, and little more than two years elapsed before an act of the Legislature was passed, refunding to Mr. Cornell out of the State treasury the amount which he had given to found this professorship in the Genesee College. Now, whether the provision in the law incorporating the Cornell University, that any subsequent act of the Legislature looking to the refunding of the larger gift shall not be valid—whether that provision is absolutely binding on subsequent Legislatures, is a question on which there are differences of opinion, and I think the preponderance of opinion would be in favor of the idea that one Legislature could not bind subsequent Legislatures. I am told by those who were here at the time the act was under the consideration of the Legislature, that it was understood, although it was not so expressed in the law, that both gifts were irrevocable. Now, it seems to me to be but a requirement of ordinary fairness and prudence, that the conditions to be performed by the State, and those to be performed by Mr. Cornell should both rest on guaranties of like stability; and not that there should be on the one side a constitutional provision which is practically unchangeable (for in a matter of that kind, you could rarely effect an amendment of the Constitution in the ordinary way) and on the other side simply an act of the Legislature which may be amended or repealable at any time, as we have seen by the passage of the act refunding to Mr. Cornell the smaller gift. If the State held these lands by absolute ownership, the case would be somewhat different; but even then it would not be wise for the State to thus divest itself for twenty years to come, of all control over the revenues of this fund. But the State is not the absolute owner; it holds this fund as a trustee rather than as an owner. In accepting the grant the State became liable for the performance of certain conditions which were annexed to it. Now, the interests of the State seem to me clearly to require, and I think the interests of education generally, if not the particular interests of the institution which receives this grant, also require, that there should be some power which can watch over with jealous care the expenditure of these revenues from year to year, so that, in the first place, the State may be able to carry out in good faith the obligations which it assumed when it accepted this grant, and may be able to protect itself against liability to loss; because, should these revenues be misapplied, the State would certainly be bound, in honor at least, to make good the loss. Now, to do this effectually, it seems to me that the proper provision in regard to this gift and its income, in the Constitution we are framing, is to protect the capital as recommended by the committee, and then to appropriate the revenues in general terms, to the purposes defined in the act of Congress; and that is the object of the amendment which I have offered, and that would be in accordance with our past policy in regard to all educational funds, and would leave the Legislature free, from year to year, to exercise any supervision or control which might be necessary to guard against the unforeseen but possible contingencies of the future. If we were dealing with a matter on which experience had thrown any light, we might be better able to judge of the propriety of a provision like this; but we should remember that educational institutions, having the peculiar features required by the act of Congress granting these lands, are of such recent date, that they may be regarded as an almost untried experiment. Take any other class of our institutions of education, our colleges, academies or common schools, and each one of them, in its present state of efficiency, is the result of the experience of at least half a century, and we do not believe that they have, by any means, reached perfection, and we certainly cannot regard these institutions contemplated in this act as having yet reached such a degree of perfection that we can safely set them in motion and let them go on without State supervision or control. Now, it is not to be supposed that the plan of organization drawn up by the trustees of the Cornell University is so perfect but that it will be found susceptible of many improvements, and certainly, there should be a power somewhere outside the board of trustees to initiate these improvements when they are called for by the public sentiment. We all know that, it is an idea quite generally entertained, and I think with some foundation in truth, that institutions of learning which are richly endowed, and under the control of self-perpetuating bodies of trustees, have a tendency to lag behind the progress of the age, to have an undue reverence for the past, and to have a sort of instinctive dread of change as dangerous innovation. The Cornell University is intended to be an embodiment of the most advanced ideas in relation to education. But we do not know what effect time may have upon that institution in this particular, and it will do no harm, at all events—and it may be a great good—it may be a healthful stimulus—for the institution to endeavor to carry out the purposes for which it was founded and for which these revenues were granted, to have a power which from year to year can supervise their proceedings and their use of their revenues. Now, if the act of 1865, which incorporates the Cornell University and grants these revenues to that university on certain conditions, constitutes such a contract (so long as Mr. Cornell complies with the prescribed conditions) as places it beyond the power of invalidation by the Legislature, what necessity is there, looking solely to the interests of that institution, for such a provision as this? It would simply have the effect of lessening the inducements to comply with the requirements of the law. But, if it is the intention of this provision, to appropriate these revenues to that institution, to secure them to it beyond any contingency which might arise from Mr. Cornell's failure to comply with the conditions of the appropriation, why certainly it is manifestly unwise for this Convention to sanction any such idea. Now, upon the supposition that the act of 1865, incorporating the Cornell University, and the subsequent act of 1866, authorizing the sale of the land scrip, and the contract between the commissioners of the land office and Mr. Cornell, which resulted from that act, have not placed this matter beyond the power of the Legislature, it is well to look at it in another aspect. The good policy of making one institution the sole beneficiary of this grant has been doubted by many. The founder of the Cornell University was most decidedly opposed to it, when the revenues of this fund were granted to the People's College. It is well known that the friends of that institution—the People's College—presented very strong claims for years—that they had endeavored to get through Congress a law, granting lands for that purpose. They were almost alone from this State in their efforts to secure that end. Once the law passed both Houses of Congress, but it was defeated by the veto of President Buchanan. They perseyered in their efforts, however, and finally the law passed both Houses, and received the signature of President Lincoln in 1862. But with all these claims upon the Legislature in favor of their right to the income of this fund, the Legislature did not deem it prudent to appropriate those revenues without limit, to that institution. They provided that, whenever, in the opinion of the Regents of the University, the revenues should be in excess of the wants of the People's College, the Regents might withhold that excess, and bestow it upon those other institutions which might comply with the requirements of the law of Congress. At that time it was not supposed that the capital of this fund would, in any event, reach one million of dollars. But it appears by Document No. 47 on our files, that by the estimates of Mr. Cornell, the college which he has founded will, aside from the college land scrip fond, have an endowment of more than two and a quarter millions of dollars. Add this fund to it, and the total endowment is $2,944,000. Now, the plan of organization of the Cornell University which has been placed on our desks, contemplates twenty-six professors, resident and non-resident, and from the schedule of salaries in the same plan, it can be easily seen that a capital of $1,000,000 will produce ample means to pay all the salaries of the faculty and leave a surplus. The law of Congress does not allow any portion of the capital to be expended for buildings or in repairs, and it only allows ten per cent, and that only by the consent of the State Legislature, to be used for the purchase of sites, or for experimental forms, or for apparatus; so that, if you take from this sum the whole of the amount which may lawfully be used for these purposes, you will find that, over and above the college land scrip fund, which amounts to $594,000, the Cornell University will then, if Mr. Cornell's estimates are realized, have an endowment of more than two millions of dollars. Now a circular has been placed upon our desks in relation to the Cornell University, which assumes that the failure of the State of Michigan, when she scattered her land-grant funds, and her signal success when she concentrated them, is conclusive evidence in favor of the State of New York concentrating the income of this immense fund on one institution. The act granting these lands was passed about five years ago last July. Now, five years would be considered a very short time in which to test the relative merits of two systems of education, allowing two and a half years to each. What the contingencies connected with the experiment in Michigan have been I do not know; but assuming that, in five years, two systems of policy in regard to educational funds have been thoroughly tested, and one of them found to be a failure and the other a success, seems to me to be assuming a great deal. But there is no parallel between the two cases. The State of Michigan received two hundred and forty thousand acres of land—the State of New York received nine hundred and ninety thousand acres, more than four times as much as the amount received by Michigan. Now, if Michigan has so signally succeeded by concentrating that land grant, it is rather an argument in favor of New York's giving liberal endowments to several institutions, instead of giving a perfectly lavish endowment to one. There is another fact connected with this matter, which appears in Document No. 47, which complicates the matter somewhat, and which, of course, would render the policy of a fixed and permanent provision like this less wise; and that is, that this college land scrip had been contracted for sale, but the scrip had not all been located; and the contract allows the purchaser, Mr. Cornell, three years, within which to locate the scrip. Then it allows him twenty years in which to completely fulfill the contract. Well, the conditions may very much change within twenty years, and certainly we shall leave it in the power of the Legislature to meet these altered conditions, if they should occur. The experience we have had, as to these very lands, should warn us to be cautious how we make constitutional provisions whose wisdom or propriety may largely depend upon how, in the future, contracts which are not completed shall be fulfilled, and whether estimates which are based upon anticipations of the future shall be fully realized. When the Legislature determined to appropriate the revenues of this fund to the People's College, the trustees of that institution, in addition to the strong claims which they could urge in consequence of their instrumentality in obtaining the grant, had already erected buildings, which had almost reached completion, and which could not now be erected for less than seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars, and probably one hundred and fifty thousand dollars would not be an extravagant estimate. They had done all this from private sources before getting this grant, and a few thousand dollars more would have enabled them to comply with the act of the Legislature which bestowed the revenues upon that institution; they had published and circulated plans of organization as voluminous, and perhaps as well digested as those placed upon our desks here. And if my memory serves me aright, they had also selected some of the incumbents of the more important professorships, and the friends of the institution believed that a few months would see it in successful operation. But like the Cornell University, that institution depended very much for its being put in successful operation upon the energy and liberality of one man; and just at this critical time in its fortunes a dispensation of Providence cast a cloud over the mind of that man, from which it never recovered, and what had been the cherished aspiration of his life up to that time became to him a matter of perfect indifference, if, indeed, I might not characterize his feeling in regard to it by a still stronger term. Under those circumstances the trustees who had already strained every nerve and exhausted every effort to comply with the law, were unable to do so. The conditions of the law of Congress required that States desiring to avail themselves of its benefits should do so within a limited time: that the State might not lose these benefits, the Legislature, after waiting some time, passed an act conferring these revenues upon the Cornell University, an institution which had no existence, except perhaps, in the conception of its founder, at the time when the friends of the People's College were laboring to secure this grant; but giving, however, the friends of the People's College three months within which to comply with the conditions of the grant; but this, under the circumstances, was an impossibility. The People's College has since recovered from the temporary paralysis into which it was thrown by this event, and is now in operation, and is laboring with reasonable assurance of ultimate success to carry out the objects for which it was chartered, considering the rigid policy which the State has adopted toward that institution. To confer these revenues now, by an unalterable constitutional provision, upon an institution that has not yet gone into practical operation, and which certainly has not yet been shown to be a success, would be unjust to every institution of the State which might otherwise hope for some of the benefits of this fund, if they should be in excess of the legitimate wants of the Cornell University; for it should not be our policy to give extravagant grants of money to any one institution. It would be peculiary unjust to the People's College, under the circumstances I have mentioned. If we regard this provision recommended by the Committee on Education in the light of justice or of good policy, it seems to me to be a provision of such doubtful expediency that we would not be warranted in placing it in the Constitution. It might also be a precedent for constitutionally discriminating in behalf of particular institutions hereafter, should they come before us with the plausible claims which this institution presents. I would not wish to be understood as saying what I have in support of this amendment in any spirit of hostility to the Cornell University; for, in common with others, I admire the munificence which has so liberally endowed that institution from a private source, and I believe the State should encourage such liberality in all proper ways, but such encouragement should always be subordinate to the great interests of education, which we desire to promote.

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOLGER—I desire to notice a remark which has been made by the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. Lawrence]. It shows that he has fallen into an error which is not confined to himself but is held by many in the community. It is contained in his statement that one of the conditions of the grant to the Cornell University was that, Mr. Cornell should pay twenty-five thousand dollars to the Genesee College at Lima. Having some knowledge of that transaction, I am prepared to say that no such condition was ever, of its own motion, fixed by the Legislature upon the act passed for the benefit of the Cornell University.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—My authority for that statement is Document No. 47, being the report of the commissioners of the land-office to this Convention, in which they state this: "The conditions on which the grant depended were first, that the Hon. Ezra Cornell should donate to the university the sum of five hundred thousand dollars; second, that he should pay over to the trustees of Genesee College, located at Lima, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars." Then it gives the further conditions.

Mr. FOLGER—That only shows how extensive and how deep-rooted in the mind of the public that error has become, and how necessary it is in this public manner to refute the statement at once. That bill was introduced into the Senate, and it passed that body; it then went to the House of Assembly, where it met with a very formidable opposition from the agents of a religious body in this state. It became apparent to the friends of Mr. Cornell and of the Cornell University, as they thought, that the bill was likely to fail, or they be compelled to divide the funds, by reason of the opposition of the friends of Genesee College, while the agents of Genesee College, on their part, did not feel too certain of success. Then a proposition was made outside of the Legislature, in the lobby, that if Mr. Cornell would pay twenty-five thousand dollars to the Genesee College, the friends of that institution would withdraw their opposition to the bill, and it might go through the Assembly. It was altogether an affair outside of the Legislature. It was a struggle between the friends of Genesee College, on the one side, for the donation of a part of these lands, and of the friends of the Cornell University on the other side, for the whole of them—each struggling for the donation, or a part of it. This offer was made. After a consultation was had among the friends of the Cornell University, one of them advised Mr. Cornell that the condition exacted by the Genesee College had better be complied with; and it was agreed that Mr. Cornell should give to the Genesee College twenty-five thousand dollars, on the condition that the opposition of its agents should be withdrawn to the passage of the bill through the Assembly.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Was not that condition inserted in the law?

Mr. FOLGER—I am about to state exactly how that took place; for there has been a great deal of denunciation of the Legislature by men who have been misinformed on the subject. As I said, that was an agreement that was concluded outside of the Legislature. But Mr. Cornell (and I approve of and applaud him for it), then said that he would do nothing in the dark; that if he was to give this sum for the withdrawal of this opposition it should be made public, and inserted in the bill, so that no man could accuse him of any underhanded work. At the request of a particular friend in the Assembly representing his assembly district (Mr. Lord, of Tompkins), that condition was, by unanimous consent, inserted in the bill, and in that shape it passed the Legislature—put in that shape, not by legislative demand, but by legislative acquiescence to the request of the friends of the Cornell University, to gratify Mr. Cornell, who desired that the transaction should be open and above board. The Legislature never thought of affixing such a condition as that in the bill. The payment of $25,000 was a proposition made by the friends of Mr. Cornell, or acceded to by them, to silence the opposition which they dreaded, fearing it would be detrimental to the university—to their effort for securing the whole of the grant to the Cornell University. The opposition was instituted by the denomination to which I have alluded, to secure a part of it in behalf of their institution. Such is the history of the insertion of the $25,000 condition in this act. When, the year after, Mr. Senator White, the chairman of the Committee on Literature, asked me if it was not proper that the Legislature should return that $25,000 to the Cornell University, I told him, as I say now, that it was the most impudent proposition ever presented to the Legislature of this State, that the treasury of the State should recompense money which had been given to buy off the lobby. That, sir, is the whole of it. I have heard it stated in the board of trustees of the Cornell University, by the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould], who is now laboring under the same error, as it has been stated here by the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence], using pretty much the same expressions that have been used here, that this was a condition fixed by the Legislature, and that it was a monstrous and outrageous condition. My indignation hardly permitted me to sit still, but, at the solicitation of others I did. But now, when this charge against the Legislature is made in this public way, I am enabled to publicly refute the calumny, and say that the condition was not imposed upon Mr. Cornell by the Legislature, but was a matter that was arranged between the friends of the Cornell University and the parties who were opposing the grant. I do not make this remark by way of controverting the arguments of the gentleman from Schuyler, but only to put the record right in respect to a matter which has been used as a stigma upon the Legislature.

Mr. HALE—I would ask the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] whether this was inserted in the bill in the form of a condition as the bill passed the Legislature?

Mr. FOLGER—I do not know but that it was inserted as a condition; but however it may appear in the act, the truth in relation to it is as I have stated it. Mr. Lord, of Tompkins, or some friend of the Cornell University, moved it in the Assembly, and for the reason, and a very proper reason it was, that Mr. Cornell would not pay this money quietly and in the dark, but if he was to pay it at all he must have it spread upon the record.

Mr. ALVORD—I do not desire to enter at any length into the discussion of the present amendment, but I, too, desire to put the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] right in respect to another matter in reference to the People's College at Havana. Long before any cloud came over the mind of the gentleman to whom he has alluded (Mr. Charles Cook), but in the face and eyes of the agreement which was incorporated in the bill that gave this property to the People's College, and a bill which was drawn up with his approbation and consent, he refused persistently to conform to the propositions there made in the bill by surrendering the title to the land upon which the People's College was to be built, and the appurtenances thereto, and he never swerved from that proposition. His claim was that until the institution was started and commenced operations and received the property from the State, he would hold in his own hands, and not give to the trustees as required by the bill, the title to the property—the fee to the land upon which the People's College was placed; and it was upon the demand upon the part of the Regents of the University, often and often repeated—and I speak of what I do know—and his continued refusal, that the bill was passed by the Legislature giving him even three months more to conform to the requirements of this act, and then, if he did not, he should be foreclosed so far as regards the People's College at Havana was concerned.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—My understanding of that matter is different from that of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. Mr. Cook gave a deed requiring that the trustees should use the property for a college, and not for any other purpose. I was present at the meeting of the board of trustees in which Mr. Cook made the proposition to the trustees, though I have not seen the deed.

Mr. ALVORD—I cannot say what propositions may have passed between Mr. Cook, on the one side, and the board of trustees of the People's College, on the other. I speak now from my official knowledge that there never was any deed given by Charles Cook for that property to any body.

Mr. BELL—This matter occupied a large share of the attention of the Legislature in 1863 and 1865. I had the honor of holding a seat in the Senate at that time, and it was the disposition of the Legislature to confer the proceeds arising from the liberal grants of land from the United States upon the People's College. The act of 1863 was passed in accordance with that view, reserving the right that, whenever, in the opinion of the Regents of the University, a sufficient amount had been obtained to maintain that institution, the balance should be divided among other institutions that would comply with the act of Congress making the original grant. It is well known to every member of the Legislature, that took any action in that matter, that the founder of the People's College entertained strange and conflicting views on this subject. Having assured the committee that the necessary lands, buildings, etc., as contemplated by the act of Congress under which this grant was made, would be furnished at Havana without expense to the State, when the committee called his attention to the bill they had drawn, which required a strict compliance with these conditions on his part, or by the People's College, before this munificent donation could be made available, he replied, with strong emphasis, that he would do no such thing. Unfortunately, during the pendency of the bill in the Senate he fell sick, unable to leave his room. While the bill was still under consideration he sent a relative of his, who assured the committee that Mr. Cook would comply with the conditions of our bill. It was thereupon reported and it became a law. I do not think any of the committee ever received an unqualified assurance from Charles Cook, the founder of the People's College, that he would comply with that act; in fact he made use of the expression in my hearing and it has always remained fixed in my mind, that those were conditions that would never be complied with, and that he would see the committee and the Legislature in — heaven before he would do it. [Laughter.] Whatever his intentions may have been, whatever negotiations may have passed between him and the trustees of People's College, I am unable to say; but he never gave his consent to the Legislature or to the committee that he would comply with those conditions. The thing passed on, the matter being left entirely with him and the trustees of the People's College to comply with those conditions, until the year 1865. During the session of that year it was ascertained that a portion of the lands donated by the United States had been sold and that the moneys had been paid into the treasury. Provision was to be made by which the act of 1863 should be carried into effect and the benefits accruing from the donation of Congress should be applied to the People's College or some other institution to be provided. A liberal offer having been made by the Cornell University, a bill was drawn by which, on condition that Mr. Cornell should donate five hundred thousand dollars for the use of that institution, it should receive the entire proceeds of the donation of Congres, in accordance with the provisions of the act donating the lands. Much discussion was had on this subject. As has been stated by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], whose recollections of this matter agree with my own, a very strange statement was made after the bill had passed the Senate, that twenty-five thousand dollars would be required for the Geneseo College before this bill could go through the House. Of course, those who were active in the legislation of 1863, by which the grant of lands from the United States was accepted and the income therefrom appropriated to the People's College, were astounded and horror striken that such a demand should then be made. At first this new and unexpected demand was strenuously resisted and the friends of the Cornell University said they would allow the bill to be defeated, if it must be defeated for the non-compliance with that demand. After the matter had stood in that position for several days, and I do not know but weeks, the founder of the Cornell University became a little nervous on the subject and his friends advised him to accede to the demand. Interviews were had with different parties, and the payment of $25,000 to Genesee College was finally placed in the bill as a condition for its passage through the Assembly. When this was done, I was still unwilling, as many others were, that the founder of the People's College should not have another opportunity to fulfill the engagement imposed upon him by the act of 1863, and thus allow the proceeds of this donation to inure to the benefit of that institution; therefore a further provision was inserted in the bill that the founder of the People's College, or the trustees of that institution should still have three months in which to comply with the conditions of that act, but if they failed to comply within that time, these funds were to be vested in the Cornell University. This, I believe to be a truthful history of this matter, as I recollect it from personal contact with the affair. Now, in regard to the very able argument which my friend from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] has made, I have simply to say that those who are at all conversant with the history of our higher educational institutions, must have seen the propriety of concentrating these funds in one institution, and that it would be highly detrimental to distribute this donation broadcast over the State, and divide it between six or eight different institutions. In fact, applications were made and strongly urged that this donation should be divided between eight different institutions, one of which to be located in each judicial district of the State. It is known that nearly all of our higher institutions have been very feebly supported. They have had a feeble existence from the fact that we have more of them than we can properly sustain. Instead of dividing this donation in the same manner among them all, or giving it to any one of the existing colleges, it was thought to be a wiser course to concentrate the whole sum in a new institution, and insure to it a healthy and vigorous existence, with sufficient endowment to enable it to perform fully the object of its creation. I hope that nothing may be done here to wrest this donation from this purpose. I think it is wise, and I think in the end it will prove a great blessing to the State.

Mr. GOULD—The question which is to be decided at the present time is what is the best disposition of this great fund of the people of the State of New York. The doctrine, "salus populi est suprema lex," must determine this matter in the long run. Now, sir, before we can settle this matter as it should be settled, we must understand something of the necessity of a great and powerful agricultural college. We have heard, in the course of the discussions before this Convention, a statement from the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. Church] which may well appal every citizen of the State. We have seen in that report the tremendous indebtedness which hangs over us, and which, unless we look upon the other side of the picture, is sufficient to fill our hearts with despair. But, sir, the chairman of the Committee on the Finances of the State did not look on the other side of the picture. He did not show us all the potentialities of wealth in this State, and especially of agricultural wealth. He did not tell us, sir, that four millions of tons of hay are raised in the State of New York, which were worth in the market $40,000,000. He did not tell us that the pasturage of the State of New York was worth an equal sum, that the grass crop of the State of New York alone amounted to $80,000,000 per annum. Well, sir, I think I have a right, from the official position which I have held as president of the State agricultural society, to express opinions which ought to go for something with the members of this Convention, and I do state, without a shadow of doubt, that it is within the power of the farmers of this State to make two blades of grass grow where only one blade had grown before. There is no difficulty in this process if they are only rightly informed how to do it. What is the result of making two blades of grass to grow where one grew before? It is to add $80,000,000 annually to the productions of the State. Now, sir, I am very confident that if a properly managed agricultural college were established, where the young farmers of this State can be thoroughly educated, it will not be twenty years before the grass crop will be doubled in this State upon the same area that now exists, and there is a possibility of largely extending that area. There are ways and means that I could detail in this Convention. For instance, by means of irrigation, which adds immensely to the agricultural wealth of Europe, but which is very little understood by the farmers of this State at the present time. Sir, a computation has been made in reference to the river Rhone, that ten thousand cubic yards of water in that river contain sufficient material to build up an ox. But, sir, we have on the streams of the State of New York which run into the sea, carrying with them all their wealth, but which might be diverted for the purposes of irrigation, enough real wealth, in the shape of rich food for our growing crops, to add $10,000,000 annually to the grass crop alone. Why is this not done? Because the farmers of New York are not educated to it. They are not aware of the immense value which exists in it, and they are not aware of the practical means by which this may be distributed here, as it is distributed over the fields of Italy and other portions of Europe, where the principles of irrigation are known. Now, if we have an agricultural college that is a good one—not a small one, not a petty one, but one under the care of professors who are eminent men in their profession—all this knowledge would be spread before us. Now, sir, what are the other facts of the case? You are old enough, sir, to remember when Troy flour was a necessity over almost the whole of New England and the whole of New York. No prudent housewife thought she could keep house without "Troy flour." Where did the wheat come from from which the Troy flour was made which was distributed to such an extent over all the New England States and the State of New York? That wheat was raised in the county of Albany, in the northern part of the county of Columbia, the county of Rensselaer, the county of Washington, the county of Schenectady, and the county of Montgomery. These counties, at that time, produced an amount of wheat which was sufficient, almost, to feed the whole of New England. Now, sir, the counties which I have spoken of do not raise enough wheat to support one-tenth of their population. Why is this, sir? What has driven this great amount of wheat from these counties? It is, sir, because of a single worm, a little worm which is made by an insect not larger than a pin's head. It was introduced here from England, and it has spread at the rate of thirty miles a year, and that insect has absolutely banished the growth of wheat from the counties I have just named. When it was ascertained that this disease was spreading here, an order in council was drawn in England, that no American wheat should be introduced into that kingdom, lest the disease should be introduced there; but before promulgating that order, it was referred to some of the most eminent naturalists of that kingdom, who reported that the insect in question was not indigenous to America; but that it had been exported from England itself, and that the insect was always there—that it was a native of England. Then the question arose, why was not the insect as dangerous in England as it was in the United States; and the answer was that in England there was a parasite still more delicate than the insect itself which, as soon as the worm was developed, stung the worm, and by that sting the worm was killed; and thus its increase was kept within bounds. The only question with naturalists has been how we can get a single pair of those parasites brought over to America. If that could be done it would prove the destruction of the worm which has been so destructive to wheat growing in the counties I have named. With all the resources of science, to enable us to bring over that parasite, with hundreds of bottles containing it sent here, they invariably died on the passage. We want to know some means by which the ravages of this insect can be stopped. If that could be done the value of the production of wheat would be increased thirty per cent, and that increase would enable us to pay the taxes which terrify us so much, and would be that much clear gain of wealth to the people of this State. Sir, we have, in the State of New York, one million one hundred and twenty-three thousand six hundred and thirty-four cows. Now, sir, we know, and I need not tell the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] and the gentlemen who reside in other dairy districts here, what an immense amount of wealth there is in the products of butter and cheese, which are made from the milk of these cows, and how much they enable us to contribute to pay the taxation of the State. Now, sir, through a terrible malady which has come upon these cows, there were no less than forty thousand last year in the county of Herkimer alone, which aborted in consequence of the presence of this epidemic. This disease also exists in the county of Oneida and several other dairy counties. We do not know what the causes of this are. The farmers with their rude means of investigation, have not been able to ascertain the cause of the difficulty, and it still continues, and it is for the highest interest for this State, that that epidemic should be exterminated. But, sir, we have no organized body of men in the State of New York whose duty it is to make this investigation. If we had an agricultural college endowed with a corps of professors who would carefully and thoroughly investigate this matter and look into it from the root and foundation, we should be enabled to discover the cause of this thing, and ascertain a practical remedy for it, so that it might be exterminated. If we could have a remedy adequate to cure this epidemic—the abortion among cows in the State of New York—it would add millions of dollars to our wealth. It is very necessary then that we should have one great institution in the State of New York, sufficiently well endowed to provide for securing the services of the most eminent men that could be found in the whole country, so that this great question may be thoroughly investigated and receive such elucidation as the magnitude of the interest involved so imperiously requires. We need just such a university as the Cornell University, with its entomologists to grapple with the diseases of the wheat, the grape, the hop, the apple, the currant, and other agricultural products caused by the ravages of insects, its physiologist, its veterinary professors to study the diseases of animals and provide a cure for them. Now, having shown as I think, satisfactorily, if we can judge Babylon by a brick, some of the few inestimable benefits to be conferred upon this State by such an institution, I go on to show why it is desirable to give this endowment to the Cornell University. The gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. Lawrence], tells us that this principle which has been laid down by the Committee on Education involves a very wide departure from the previous policy of the State. Sir, how does it make a wide departure from the previous policy of the State? Have the people of the State of New York ever avowed a policy that they would not adhere to a bargain that they had solemnly made? Has such a policy ever been avowed by the people of the State of New York that they would violate a pledged word? I have not heard of such a policy. It seems to me that any other course than the grant of a constitutional guaranty of this kind would be a departure from our previous policy; it would look to the probability or to the possibility certainly of the State receding from its bargain solemnly made and for which it has received a most valuable consideration at the hands of Ezra Cornell. The gentleman, as I understand it, admits that the college land scrip fund is inalienable, that there is no power whatever in the State of New York to alienate that fund which has been created solely by the intelligence and activity of Mr. Cornell himself. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he was willing that the guaranty to that college of the land scrip fund should go in the article we are preparing.

Mr. FOLGER—There are two funds—one the land scrip fund and the other the endowment fund.

Mr. GOULD—I understood the gentleman to say that the land scrip fund was inalienable.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—No; I said the endowment fund.

Mr. FOLGER—The land scrip fund is the first price of the land scrip — what the Comptroller gets for it. It is thus, the Comptroller has this land scrip for nine hundred and ninety thousand and odd acres of land. The highest price at which it has been sold by him is, I believe, no more than eighty-five cents per acre, and some has been sold as low or lower than sixty. The land scrip fund, by act of Congress, is entirely inalienable by the State, and the revenues from it must be devoted for the purpose of maintaining a college at which agricultural knowledge and military tactics are to be taught: but in making the arragement with Mr. Cornell, by which he was to receive this scrip from the Comptroller at a certain price, he agreed, upon his part that, whatever profits should come from it should form another fund, which is called the endowment fund; so that the land scrip fund is composed of the first price of the land scrip and the endowment fund is made up of the profits and the sum contributed by Mr. Cornell.

Mr. GOULD—I misquoted the word; what I meant was the endowment fund.

Mr. CURTIS—For the purpose of completing the statement which the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has made, I will state that the land scrip fund, in addition to the price Mr. Cornell pays for the scrip, there is set off thirty cents an acre of the profits received in the transaction, which sum is added to the land scrip fund, and these two items together constitute what is called the land scrip fund.

Mr. GOULD—All I mean to say is, that one of these funds, technically called the endowment fund, is not contested by the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence]. If I understood him, he is willing that a constitutional guaranty should be given for that fund. His only question is in regard to the land scrip fund itself. Now what are the circumstances connected with this matter? The preliminary statement has been clearly made by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] and by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell]. It has been shown that every opportunity which any mortal man could desire was given to Mr. Cook and the trustees of the People's College to comply with the conditions that the Legislature had laid down preliminary to granting them this munificent donation given by the Congress of the United States. But Mr. Cook utterly refused to comply with those conditions. What title, then, has he, and how is it any hardship upon him or upon the People's College, that this grant should be withheld from that institution? The offer was made to him on condition that he should comply with certain conditions, and he refused to comply with those conditions, and therefore the offer naturally and legitimately lapsed. He had no claim to it whatever. What are the circumstances in regard to Mr. Cornell? He offered to endow the institution with the sum of five hundred thousand dollars as a condition of the grant being made to the Cornell University. He offered it in good faith, and he has actually paid the money into the treasury, and has fulfilled all the conditions which are required on his part—every one of them; and the State of New York, in consequence of this consideration, has granted to the Cornell University the use of the fund it received from the United States. Now, sir, the gentleman [Mr. A. Lawrence] says that the State cannot alienate its interest because it is a trustee of this fund. The words of the act of Congress are that this land is to be granted to each State. To be sure, it makes certain conditions in reference to the use of the grant, but, as long as those conditions are complied with, the grant is absolute on the part of the general government. Sir, the State of New York, when granting this fund to the Cornell University, imposed the same conditions, and, so long as the Cornell University fulfills those conditions, just so long has it an inalienable right to the proceeds of the land. And, sir, the organic law of the State, ought to prevent him and the university from being "black-mailed" during every session of the Legislature. Every gentleman knows that that is desirable, for it is as certain as that the sun will rise, that unless this constitutional guaranty is given, this black-mailing will be attempted to be levied upon this institution, its beneficent acts will be arrested every year, and the question will arise whether it will be able to maintain the corps of eminent professors which is necessary for the purposes I have described in the opening portion of my remarks. Now, sir, it seems to me that this Convention ought not to hesitate in giving this constitutional guaranty. We have not, sir, a very large number of men like Ezra Cornell. He is a man of whom I love to speak—a man who is brightest among the real jewels of New York. Arising, sir, out of abject poverty, he has, by the force of his own genius and intelligence, accumulated a handsome and princely fortune. Other men take care to enjoy fortunes during their life-time, but not so with Ezra Cornell. In his very life-time, while in the full vigor and power of manhood he dedicates a munificent proportion of his private fortune to found a university which shall be for the benefit, not of rich men only, but of the mechanic and the farmer, and all others who, like himself, in early life are compelled to struggle with penury and privation. Sir, can we afford to reject munificent gratuities of this kind? How can the State of New York ever hope to be made the beneficiary in the future of like minded men, if it now, in the spirit of petty traffic, says: "We have got you fast, and we will withdraw from our part of the bargain." Sir, it puts the people of the State of New York in a condition so utterly disgraceful, that if the State were to adopt the suggestion, it would become a hissing and a by-word throughout the whole civilized world. Now, sir, in regard to the statement made by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. I remember very well, on one occasion, to have handled the Legislature without mittens. I take this occasion, however, to acknowledge that I was mistaken in regard to the matter. I accept the explanation which has just been made by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], and the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell]. I admit that I was mistaken—that it was merely the trustees of Lima College who are guilty of this black-mailing, and that the Legislature neither suggested or sanctioned it. Now, the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. Lawrence] says that there should be reciprocity in this matter. He says that the State is bound, on the one hand, if this constitutional provision is adopted, but that Mr. Cornell is not bound on the other. I do not understand why there is any want of reciprocity in this. It seems to me that the matter is obligatory on each side. It seems to me that Mr. Cornell is bound to give a valid education to the farmers and the mechanics of this State, and that he cannot in any way get clear of this obligation. So, on the other hand, as long as he does comply with the stipulations he has made, and as long as the Cornell University gives this, so long is the State bound to give the whole amount of the endowment which was granted by the general government. He says that the State ought to have a right to see to it that a proper application is made of this fund. Sir, the condition of the article which has been presented by the committee on education will be no bar whatever to the right of the State to see to it; if, at any time, the Cornell University should, in any way, fail to comply with the stipulations which are annexed to the acceptance of that fund, and should become a defaulter to the State, the State has a right to step in at any time and compel the university to perform its part of the contract, or, if it refuses to do so, it will then have the power to change the constitutional provision, and resume its control. The supreme court is the official visitor of all State institutions, and, if any institution fraudulently refuses to perform its part of the contract, the supreme court of New York has abundant power to step in and compel the institution to do it. The gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] alleges that the trustees of the Cornell University are a self-perpetuating institution; that it is a close corporation. That, sir, is not so. There is no self-perpetuation about it.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—Does not the majority of the board of trustees have power of filling vacancies in its own body?

Mr. GOULD—Only for the present. There is a provision that as soon as there are one hundred young men who have graduated from that institution, those graduates shall have the power of electing the trustees.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—They can perpetuate themselves outside of the authority of the State under their charter.

Mr. GOULD—They are prevented from perpetuating themselves by the power granted to the graduates of the university to fill vacancies as they arise, and by ex officio members. It is not therefore a close corporation, in the ordinary sense of the term, and thus the charge falls to the ground.

Mr. BARTO—How many are there?

Digitized by Google

Mr. GOULD—As soon as they have a hundred graduates they have a right to elect one, and as the graduates of the institution increase, the proportion of the board elected by them is increased.

Mr. CURTIS — There are certain ex officio trustees mentioned in the act.

Mr. GOULD—Yes, sir, and among them is mentioned the Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor, and the President of the State Agricultural Society. There are seven of these ex officio members in all.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I know that there are certain ex officio trustees, but those who are chosen in the manner I mention are a controlling majority of the board.

Mr. GOULD — I believe I have met nearly all the arguments which have been presented by the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence]. The arguments in favor of carrying out in good faith, the article as proposed by the Committee on Education, are absolutely unanswerable and overwhelming. We cannot by any possibility refuse to carry them out, unless we incur danger and disgrace; and I hope, without any further ceremony, the Constitutional Convention will sustain the recommendation of the committee as being for the best interests of the State.

Mr. FOLGER—I offer the following amendment: In line fifteen, after the figures "1862," insert the following words: "So long as said university shall fully comply with and perform the conditions of the act of Legislature establishing said university." I offer that amendment to meet what I conceive to be the stress of the argument of the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence]. I did not understand him to object to this institution, its plan and purpose. I understand him as conceding that its organization was well planned, that its object was good, and that if it succeeded according to its anticipation it would make an institution desirable to the State and highly to be approved of; but he seemed to fear that a constitutional provision which should run for twenty years, might be in existence after this university had failed to comply with the conditions of the act of the Legislature which established it, and which gave this ample fund. That seemed to be the stress of his argument. It was certainly that portion of it which had the most effect upon me. I think my amendment meets that difficulty, as it provides that, while we should give, by the Constitution, the avails of this fund to the university, we still retain in the hands of the people through the Legislature, the power to retract it if the university fails at any time to perform the obligation on its side. As the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] observed, the State has entered into a quasi-contract with the Cornell University for the establishment of an agricultural college by which, in consideration that on the part of Mr. Cornell, he had given, or would make a donation of five hundred thousand dollars, and in consideration of one other thing, which has been omitted by all the gentlemen who have spoken, that the university shall receive for education one youth from each assembly district in this State annually, free from any charge for tuition—in consideration of these two things, one on the part of Mr. Cornell and the other on the part of the university, the State has solemnly said by act of Legislature that this fund shall be paid over to the treasury of this institution. Now, this appears to me morally and legally a contract, a contract not to be retracted were it not that there is a certain provision contained in the act which may enable the Legislature to alter, repeal, or amend the act. The precise force and extent of such a section I believe has not yet received a judicial interpretation.

Mr. ALVORD—I understand the law to be that one student from each assembly district shall be educated each year for four years, which would, after four years, make the number of students receiving free education in the whole State, five hundred and twelve, continuously.

Mr. FOLGER—Now, sir, I say that this act having been solemnly passed, and this condition imposed, and Mr. Cornell having advanced five hundred thousand dollars, and paid in the money or secured its payment to the satisfaction of the State officers, he has complied with so much of the condition on his part; and so, if the university received from each assembly district these youth, and continues to do so for years, the State incurs an obligation, and should see to it that it faithfully fulfills it. I do not understand the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] to object to this. The difficulty he fears is that, by and by, the university may fail of carrying out its part of the agreement, and then, if a clause like this is not in the Constitution, the only remedy of the State will be in another constitutional amendment. My amendment leaves it so that, if the university fails in performing its part of the bargain, the matter is left in the hands of the Legislature to repeal, alter, or amend in any way they see fit. But the university needs some protection on its part against hasty, improvident, and wicked legislation, if such there be, and from the current opinions it would seem that there might be such. This protection is offered by this amendment, and no legislation can take place in reference to the matter until the Cornell University should fail to comply with the conditions of the grant.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I understand it be the view of the gentleman [Mr. Folger], as a lawyer, that Mr. Cornell has complied with the conditions of this law, and that the Legislature has no power to invalidate the contract. What is the necessity, then, of a constitutional provision, giving any stronger sanction to it? In the case of Mr. Cornell, let us suppose, for I do not anticipate any thing of that kind (this constitutional provision being adopted), that he or his heirs should apply to the Legislature for an act to refund this money, and that such an act is passed. This constitutional provision, with the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] adopted, would have no effect to prevent any thing of that kind.

Mr. FOLGER—It is doubtless true that a statute conferring benefits upon a party, may be called a contract, and is held to be a contract; but I think the gentleman did not understand me, when I said that, there is another clause in the latter part of the act, reserving authority to alter, amend and repeal a part of the contract; and when the university advances money it does it subject to that clause of reservation, that the act can be altered or amended at any time. As I said before, what the effect and force of such a clause in an act may be, I believe, we have, as yet, no judicial determination in this State; but if it is to be carried to the full effect that the Legislature may, at any time, of its own will, and capriciously, if it chooses, alter, repeal or amend this act, then the incorporation of the Cornell University with the donation of this fund, is no more than a license revokable at the will and pleasure of the Legislature. No person can say that so munificent an undertaking as this university should be dependent upon the caprice of the Legislature from year to year. It will require a series of years to develop all the results that are calculated upon; there should be something in the organic law which will insure this to the university, and those interested in it in perpetuity if it perpetually fulfills its obligations.

Mr. BELL—This whole matter resolves itself into a very narrow compass under the explanations given in regard to the acts of Congress and in regard to the dispositions made of the lands by the Legislature. The only question left for us, it seems to me, is this: does this Convention think it advisable to ratify that act of the Legislature and place this matter in the Constitution where it may be irreversible, and become the settled policy of the State for the next twenty years. It occurs to me that this is all there is of the question. Those who do not take that view of it, of course think best that it be left to future legislation, and that the same manipulations and the same tactics may be used in regard to this fund as it is now donated, as have been used and that were used when it was being donated and appropriated to this particular institution. I am clearly of the opinion that this Convention should ratify the act of the Legislature on this subject.

Mr. CURTIS—Before the vote is taken on this amendment, sir, I should like to state some of the facts in regard to this grant and to the Cornell University and to the relation of both to the interests of the people of the State. In July, 1862, the grant of these lands was made to various States according to their representation in Congress, and the portion of the State of New York was very nearly a million of acres. The scrip so given to the various States has at this time been entirely absorbed. Twenty-two of the States have accepted the grant and have made various dispositions of it. Of these twenty-two States eleven have joined the fund to those already existing in certain institutions; eleven have established new institutions to be founded on this grant, and only one, Massachusetts, has made any division of it. Massachusetts has allowed three-tenths to the School of Technology in Boston and seven-tenths to the Agricultural College at Amherst. Now, sir, this noble grant being made to the various States, a grant intended to conserve the highest conceivable interests of a free people, we find, and naturally with pride and pleasure, that a citizen of New York alone of all the citizens of the United States, comes forward to receive the offer made by the Congress of the United States, and says, "I will do all that I can; all that my energies, my time and my resources will allow, to make this grant worth twice, three times, four times, five times its nominal and apparent value." The other States, sir, I say, have disposed already of this scrip, and from the State of Kentucky comes an admiring and regretful cry, "See what New York has done with this grant!" Nor is there a single State, or a single citizen anywhere in this country, who does not feel that the State of New York is making the wisest use of the opportunity. Now, sir, when this grant was made, it became the duty of the State of New York to dispose of it. It accepted the grant in March, 1863. It was well understood that it had been made by Congress in pursuance of certain representations at the Capitol, and that the foremost among those who were urgent was a gentleman interested in an institution already mentioned in the debate, the People's College, at Havana. The State, in disposing of this grant, might, indeed, either distribute it among the various colleges, or give it to some single college. But the distribution of the fund, Mr. Chairman, would have been simply throwing it to the winds, throwing it into the sea. There is no gentleman familiar with the history of education who does not know that the higher institutions of education in New York are staggering, that at this moment, New York, first in population, first in resources, first in energy of all the States in this country, is not first in the standard of the higher education. There are various reasons to be assigned for this fact, which before the debate on this article is concluded may come before the attention of the committee. But one of the chief, one of the cardinal reasons of that fact is the inadequacy of the endowment, upon which these various institutions rest. I think, therefore, that the Legislature of this State, upon due deliberation, wisely determined that at least the grant of the United States should not be thrown away, that it should not become the prey of the rapacity of contending interests in the Legislature. Then the question arose whether it should be given to any institution already existing. There was some thought of giving it to the Agricultural College at Ovid. The Agricultural College at Ovid, however, lay under the disability of a mortgage of seventy thousand dollars, which must first be raised before it could enjoy the benefits of the fund, and the trustees of that college agreed that the grant should go elsewhere. It was then offered under certain conditions, to the People's College, of which the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence], has already told us. Now, Mr. Chairman, the history of the People's College in relation to that grant, is surely a history the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence], cannot wish to have repeated. It is not a creditable history, certainly, to that institution; I mean that it is not creditable, upon the supposition that it really wished to enjoy the benefit of this grant. Let me mention one or two facts. One of the conditions was that within three years, there should be ten professors at that college. But, when, after the lapse of two years, five years being the time allotted by Congress as the limitation of the benefit of the grant, the Legislature, wishing to know whether the People's College was really deserving of this grant, by complying with the conditions, requested the Board of Regents to appoint a committee to visit and inquire into the state of the affairs of that institution. It was found as to this first condition of ten professors—two years having elapsed, one year only remaining—that there were three professors, none of whom—I say it, of course, without the least personal feeling—none of whom were eminent in their various departments. The college at that time had been in existence some twelve years, and in its collegiate department—two years of the three allotted having expired—there was not a single student. There were certain students in what was called the preparatory department—that is to say, there were certain young men fitting themselves to enter college. As to the building, it was one of the conditions that the college should furnish accommodations, within a specified time, for two hundred and fifty pupils. It was found upon examination that there was a building which, by putting two students in a room, would probably accommodate one hundred and fifty students; nor had there been any provision for heating the building or furnishing it. So with the outhouses and the farm. There was to be a farm of two hundred acres for the purposes of the school. There was, indeed, a farm of two hundred acres, but at the very time of the visitation of this committee there was a bill pending before the Legislature to release the college from the necessity of holding more than one hundred acres. Then, finally, sir, in regard to the matter which my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has cited, it was a further condition that as none of the funds granted by the United States could be laid out in buildings or erections of any kind, the property should be perfectly unincumbered. Now, sir, the gentleman who was hoping to build a college to his name in the People's College had at that time a deed of more than $30,000 upon the property of that college. The Legislature of 1862 had passed a law granting $10,000 to the institution, upon condition that this gentleman released his claim. He declined to do it. The same offer was open to the college for a second time. The gentleman still declined. But when it was perfectly apparent that the grant was likely to be taken away from the college, the gentleman came forward and offered to relinquish his reversionary interest, provided the endowment of the college was put beyond question. He was not willing to make that relinquishment the condition of its being an absolutely free institution, but would relinquish his claim on condition that other persons should make it free. And therefore it was, upon the report of this committee of the Board of Regents, that the Legislature at once declared that not only was there no compliance on the part of the People's College with the intention and condition of the act of the Legislature, but that, humanly reasoning, there was evidence of no intention of compliance. Then, sir, it was that a citizen of this State appeared and said, "I will give $500,000 upon condition that the institution which shall be founded by that sum shall receive the avails of the United States grant." Mr. Cornell, who made this offer, added to it a farm, which was required in the conditions of the act, the estimated value of which was $50,000. He had already bought for the purposes of the university the Jewett paleontological collection of the State of New York, unquestionably the finest in this country. His other gifts of various smaller sums to the institution amount already to twenty-five thousand dollars, and in the town of Ithaca, in which he proposed that his institution should be planted he had erected, at an expense of nearly one hundred thousand dollars, buildings for lecture rooms and lyceum purposes, which of course were at the service of the institution which was to be erected. Now, Mr. Chairman, a man who should say "I will give five hundred thousand dollars, provided I can have the benefit, and you will allow me to buy the land scrip which the United States gives you," would certainly be considered, in any State, a great benefactor. But here was a citizen not content with this. Here was a man who said "I will give five hundred thousand dollars upon condition that the avails of this land grant shall be given to that institution; and I will bind myself that all the profits which I may make from the transaction, shall also be devoted to the purposes of the university." Not for any selfish purpose, not for any individual purpose; they were to be given for the benefit of the people of the State of Now York forever. Mr. Chairman, I confess I have no words to express my sense of the greatness of this act. I think that the gentlemen of the committee should for a moment reflect what it is that one of our fellow citizens has done. We are all honored by this act of Mr. Cornell. The State is honored. The country is honored. Our children to the latest generation are benefited by this wise generosity. Many men, sir, in dying, have given great sums of money to found colleges, to build hospitals, to establish libraries. States and governments have taxed themselves for the same purpose, and it was well done. But, sir, here is a man, a private citizen, who in the ripe vigor of his life, gives a princely fortune, who adds to it his experience, his knowledge, his sagacity, his industry, his enterprise, and then gathers all together, and consecrates them, not to a personal purpose, not to an individual end, but to the highest common welfare. I like to believe, Mr. Chairman, that an act like that of Mr. Cornell's is the natural growth of the American system, in which the deed of the simple, private citizen outshines the magnificence of kings. Well, sir, the State, upon this consideration, made the agreement with Mr. Cornell. By the terms of the act, ingeniously, elaborately drawn, he is prevented, under any circumstances whatever from recovering a single dollar of the money which he has so given; and the State, therefore, in consideration of his gift, of the necessity of concentrating the advantages of this grant for the purpose of agricultural and mechanical education in the State, and because of the enormous increase thus secured to the grant, makes with him a contract, pledging the good faith of the people of the State of New York to Mr. Cornell, and to the university which is to be established, a university which if it fails to observe the conditions, as provided by the amendment of my friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger], will pay the penalty. Now, sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] amounts to this: Having secured from Mr. Cornell this money, this gift being made by him absolutely, and without return, the State upon due consideration having said to him, "If you will give this money and conform to these conditions, we will give you the avails of the land scrip grant" —the proposition, I say, sir, of the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] is, that the State shall open at every session of the Legislature the question whether this grant shall not now be dispersed, a portion given here and a portion given there. Of course the gentleman from Schuyler understands what the inevitable result of this will be. Every institution in this State which thought itself able, by the assistance of this grant, to establish a chair of agriculture, chemistry, or practical mechanics, at every meeting of the Legislature, either singly or in combination, would press, and press, and press the plea that the Cornell University had certainly had the use of this grant long enough, and it was high time that other institutions in other parts of the State should derive some benefit from it. Sir, the truth is this, the people of the State of New York, in their Legislature, pledged their faith. There is no question of that. It is, as the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] says, a contract between the people of the State and the Cornell University. They put it in the form of a statute. What do we propose to do now? Simply that the people who upon deliberation have done this, and have bound themselves as far as was possible at the time to do it, shall now put it into the fundamental law, because they mean it to be a fundamental act. And here in the Constitutional Convention, the people are afforded the opportunity of ratifying this contract made in their name. They will say: "We mean that Mr. Cornell, having done what we require him to do, we also will do what we promised Mr. Cornell we would do if he would conform to the conditions we laid down." But, sir, I can hardly speak of this point with proper tranquillity. It is virtually in its nature an immoral proposition—of course without the slightest question of the motives of the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence]. It is leaving the State an opportunity which, it seems to me, is not granted to the Cornell University. But, sir, by the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] every possible objection is removed. By that amendment it is made perfectly evident that until the university fails, to observe the conditions, it is the intention of New York that it shall enjoy the grant. It may be interesting, sir, to the Convention, as representatives of the State of New York, to know that in September of this year the Cornell University will open. Of the twenty-six professorships to be established seven are devoted to topics of immediate practical value. They are devoted to instruction in mechanics and agriculture. The University College at New Haven, Yale College, of fifty-three professors, has four chairs of the same kind. Of the twenty-six Cornell professors there are four already selected. Those four are young men and yet they are four young men who, by the common consent of the most eminent men of science in this country in their department, Professor Agassiz of Cambridge being at the head, are the four men of the most promising talent, and the most admirable scientific attainments. Of the occasional lectures which are to be founded in that university, Professor Agassiz himself has promised to give a course; Professor Pierce of Cambridge, perhaps the first living mathematician, has also promised his co-operation. I do not know, and my acquaintance is extensive, of a single man, in any State in this country, interested in science or literature or scholarship of any kind, who has not the most vital sympathy with the Cornell University. We are to have there the services of the highest genius of the land. The resident professors, under the chairmanship of the president, are such men as I have described. The term will begin in September. The actual receipts from the endowments are such as to promise an ample resource for the opening of the enterprise. The farm is furnished; the various scientific collections are either made or making; the apparatus is both collected and collecting; the library will be selected, in great part during the coming summer, and the university will begin as such a university ought to begin in this State, under every possible fair auspices of success; and yet—for I will leave nothing, however low, untouched—I have heard that the proposition of the committee is a proposition to put a single citizen of the State of New York into the Constitution. It is a proposition to constitutionalize Mr. Ezra Cornell! Mr. Chairman, it seems that some are resolved to make generosity difficult by making it suspected. I have heard very frequently during the term of this Convention a sneer of this kind, and I stop simply to put my foot upon it. It is the Cornell University, and perpetuates his name. When this objection was made, Mr. Cornell—the university not having been named by him or by his request—Mr. Cornell, when this remark was brought to his notice at a meeting of the trustees, desired that his name should be stricken out. "My object," said he, "is not to immortalize my name by having it in the university. My object is the public welfare, and I beg that my name be stricken out." Of course, sir, the trustees of the university, in obedience to a very natural and a very praiseworthy instinct in human nature—the same instinct which called Harvard College, Harvard; Yale College, Yale; Dartmouth College, Dartmouth; Brown University, Brown—at once and unanimously declared that the title of this university should be the Cornell University. And so it was further objected that the charter introduced the principle of hereditary succession, that the oldest lineal male heir of Mr. Cornell is always to be one of the trustees. This also being brought to his notice, Mr. Cornell requested that any such principle should be instantly thrown aside, that he had no desire that the influence of his family name in the university should thus be perpetuated.

But the trustees, in obedience to the same instinct, at once declared that that should always be a part of the law. And thus it is, Mr. Chairman, that all the personal renown which the founder of this great institution derives from it is the simple identification of his name with his superb foundation. The case seems to me to be so plain, the section as amended by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] so reasonable, the objections as urged by my friend from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] so unsubstantial, that I trust the Convention, coming fresh from the people of New York, will declare that the people of New York, having pledged their word, intend faithfully to keep it to the end.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It is an unpleasant duty for any man, if he feels it necessary to do so, to place himself in the apparent attitude of resisting the current of kindly feeling that flows out toward those who have done a great good. Now, sir, I wish to protest, at the commencement of my remarks, that in what I say I am not to be construed as lagging one whit behind my friend who has just taken his seat, in my admiration of the giver of this munificent gift that my friend has so eloquently eulogized. It is a noble act. It is not only noble, as compared with the ordinary acts of others, but I esteem it immensely more noble, because this act was done in the maturity of the giver's life. He has not waited until his death-bed, when he had done using his fortune, and then robbed his heirs by giving it away for a purpose that he was not willing to devote it to while in the maturity of his faculties, and able to enjoy it as the world enjoy their fortunes. But my friend must not forget, and this Convention must not forget, that Ezra Cornell is not the first man in the history of the world who has bestowed his beneficence for the benefit of his fellow-men. Oxford and Cambridge owe their endowments to the gifts of munificent patrons in the olden time. The celebrated Cardinal Woolsey, from his own means, built Christ Church College, and endowed it forever. And so it was in regard to the other colleges connected with those universities. They owe their existence almost entirely to the munificent gifts of individuals. And after the high panegyric that my friend has uttered here of Mr. Cornell, it should not be forgotten that we have other citizens contemporaneous with ourselves, and contemporaneous with this munificent public benefactor in the State of New York, who have given liberally of their funds for the benefit of education and the improvement of the race. I call his attention to Mr. Vassar, who has given a sum greatly disproportionate to the sum given by the gentleman whose name has been mentioned here, amounting to a good many times what the gift of Mr. Cornell has amounted to. He has not only given this sum, but exclusively from his private means has built the buildings for the use of the institution which he has created—has done it already—and he proposes in that institution to educate the voters of the State. For when the notions of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] of public policy are fully carried into effect, the voters of the State are to be educated at the university founded by Mr. Vassar. I would not, because Mr. Vassar has given more than Mr. Cornell, fail to do the least item of justice to Mr. Cornell in every possible respect, but I mention Mr. Vassar to the end that this Convention may not, in listening to the eloquence of my learned friend, forget that there are in this State other liberal men and other public benefactors besides this one, and not thrust this university into the Constitution in the forgetfulness that there are other benevolent and good men besides. Now, as I said, I have not the least possible hostility to Mr. Cornell, nor to Mr. Cornell's institution. This is a thing of the future; and I hope that in the future it will be every thing that my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], and my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould], suppose that it is going to be. I hope that that institution in coming time will extend the sphere of its action and influence from among the stars, among which one of the gentlemen has seemed to locate its operations, down through the whole system of human knowledge to those weevils that my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould] has spoken of, and the still smaller parasites that prey upon them. [Laughter.] I have no wish to disparage the action of this institution. I would live up to all the State has done, to the letter of it, and the spirit of it, honorably; but yet I cannot believe that I am acting immorally to leave those statutes simply in force. I do not believe that it would be immoral in this Convention to refuse to put this institution into the Constitution of this State, and to say that as long as this Constitution shall stand, the Legislature shall have no control over the funds that are mentioned in the clause in the first section of this proposed article that the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence] refers to. I distrust all propositions to create constitutional guaranties and guards in cases where they are not necessary. This world changes. Circumstances in the world change continually. Mr. Cornell may be dead to-morrow. Mr. Cornell may be bankrupt to-morrow. The good men, and the excellent men, and the intelligent men, that now constitute the board of trustees, may be dead to-morrow, and a set of men who knew not Joseph may be in their places. [Laughter.] What shall be the policy of that institution when these new trustees come in? What heresies of public politics, what heresies in religion, what heresies in the theories of life may yet creep into that institution when they are gone, neither these gentlemen themselves know nor I know? This institution may live up to the requirements of the laws that have been put upon the statute book, and under which Mr. Cornell is entirely satisfied to make the advances of his money as he has been making them. Every thing may be correct; every letter and figure may be complied with. And yet, although I do not believe it probable, I would remark, it would seem morally impossible, yet it is actually possible that the institution itself may become a nuisance in the midst of us. What gentleman here does not believe that it would be for the good of England to-day, had their parliament the power of legislating in regard to Oxford, the most magnificent institution of learning in the world, existing to-day to belittle the minds of men and emasculate them; with all its immense libraries, with all its immense professorships, with all its immense fellowships, and really lagging behind the age, and throwing its weight into the scale of the past and the effete? And yet it is proposed here that we shall put this portion of the funds of the State, to be managed for the people of the State as long as this Constitution shall exist, beyond our control. It is said that there are certain gentlemen that will be ex officio members of that institution. What will be the use of their being ex officio members of that institution? They will be in a minority. The Constitution will have prevented their doing any thing, and they might as well stay at Albany, as to go to the meetings of the board of trustees. If there is any thing they are not satisfied with, they must take it out in being dissatisfied. They will be ornamental rather than useful. I protest that when I express to this Convention my unwillingness to put these funds beyond the control of the State I am not acting immorally. There is no immorality about it. On the contrary I claim that it is immoral for the officers of this State, men that have been endowed with power, such as we possess here, from the votes of the people of this State, to put the funds of the people of this State or any portion of those funds beyond their reach for all coming time. It is there, according to my conception upon this subject, that the immorality lies. I am very desirous that this experiment should succeed, as much so as any man. Having all that I possess in this world invested in the soil of the country, bred an agriculturist, having now all my interest in agriculture except the little that I derive from my profession, I am free to say that this cry of agricultural colleges produces a great deal less effect upon my ears than it would have done if I had not heard the cry for thirty years, and seen thirty years of most disastrous failure. The mere agricultural part of the education here is not to constitute the strength of that institution, if it is to have strength. I hope it will teach those sciences that are immediately connected with agriculture, and teach them thoroughly and thus distribute a much more extensive knowledge of these subjects than is now possessed by the country.

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one moment? He will remember, whatever his views on agriculture, or the benefit of agricultural and mechanical colleges, that the act of the United States requires that this money shall be given to the endowment, support and maintenance of at least one college, where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to the agricultural and mechanical arts. So far as that is concerned, it is the intention of the United States, that whether agricultural or mechanical schools are good or not, they shall have the benefit of that grant.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—My friend is right about it, but he has certainly failed to appreciate the scope of my remarks. And let me say further, it was not to what my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] said on that subject, but to what my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould] said on the subject, that I was addressing myself. The mere fact that an institution is to teach its pupils on subjects connected with the agriculture of the country, does not furnish a reason why we should in this case depart from the wisdom that has hitherto controlled the legislation of the State in regard to other institutions and other matters with which the State is connected. It is said the State has pledged itself to Mr. Cornell, but the gentlemen concede, at the same time, that in the very acts in which the State pledged itself to Mr. Cornell, the right of repeal, amendment, and modification, was retained; and Mr. Cornell, knowing that the right of repeal, and amendment, and modification, was contained in these acts, made his bestowments and gave his charity. What do gentlemen propose now? Not to continue that state of things. If the gentlemen propose to continue the force of those acts, with the right of repeal, amendment and modification, it would be immoral not to continue it; but they propose now, by virtue of the reputation which Mr. Cornell has obtained by his charities and liberality, to strike out from those acts the saving clause, by which the people of the State of New York protected themselves when these laws were enacted. If that be wise legislation, if that be wise constitution-making I grant you an utter lack of wisdom so far as I am concerned. I do not understand that it is wise or politic that the State should give up its control over its own funds, and its own money. The State is connected with a thousand other enterprises—a thousand will not count the number of enterprises with which the State is connected, in some shape or other. We do not propose to put any of the rest of them into the Constitution. We proposed to constitutionalize charities the other day, but gave it up. I trust that we shall not constitutionalize this. And while I hope that the State of New York will live up most sacredly to the obligations it assumed in the enactment of these laws, in entering into the arrangement which it did enter into with Mr. Cornell, I hope that the State of New York will provide against all possible contingencies (I will not repeat the contingencies, for I have repeated them enough already) that may by possibility arise; and will retain in its own control the threads that shall ravel out any errors or mischiefs that shall grow up in the history of the future in connection with this institution. Believing, however, at the same time, that the Cornell University will be a success; hoping, in heaven's name, that it may be a success, feeling that if successful it will be an ornament and an honor to the State, I yet feel that, sitting here as one of one hundred and sixty guardians for the time being of the public interests of this State, I am not at liberty to put such a proportion of the funds of this State designed for educational purposes, beyond the control of the people of the State.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is any educational fund that is not taken care of and disposed of by the Constitution except this?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I will state, if the gentleman will allow me. Mrs. Willard gets up an academy that is a success. If it continues a success it receives yearly its share of that fund for the institution. If the institution goes by the board and does not keep itself in such circumstances as all other institutions must keep themselves in, it does not share in any of the funds. There is no other instance in the State, as I understand it, where any of the funds of the State are devoted to any other institution by name, so that if the institution fails to comply with the requisitions of the law, under the Constitution, the funds must still go to it.

Mr. VERPLANCK—The gentleman has hardly answered my question. It may be that the people of the State, through the Legislature, would desire to take the literature fund for the benefit of the common schools, and not reserve it for those favored institutions, the academies of the State. Why not leave it where the people of the State can control it? That is the argument of the gentleman in reference to the Cornell University fund. Keep it where the people can control it through the Legislature. The same doctrine precisely would apply to the literature fund.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] can scarcely be serious. Although not given to joking he certainly is joking on this subject. [Laughter.] To undertake to say that there is any comparison or any point in common between the provision of the Constitution that devotes to academies certain funds, and leaves the Legislature at liberty to say under what circumstances the academies shall have the control of those funds, or any residue of those funds, and under what circumstances they shall cease to be entitled to have any funds, and which applies this fund to all the academies of the State equally, and the proposition to donate them to any institution irrevocably—certainly the gentleman cannot be serious.

Mr FOLGER—If we eliminate from the argument of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] his characteristic humor and his characteristic ingenuity in stepping aside from the true course of the argument, I think his views may be reduced to these two propositions: in the first place, that this constitutional provision should should not be adopted, because the policy of the Cornell University may be changed, and then this university and its fund will be out of the control of the people; second, that he would not, on any account, put in the Constitution a provision giving these funds in perpetuity to this institution. As to the first of these propositions, that the policy of the university may be changed, either by the death of the founder or by a change of the trustees, it seems to me, that is not involved in this question, for there is nothing in this constitutional provision which inhibits the Legislature from visiting it by any provision of law; and if its policy is changed, if the trustees choose to step aside from the requirements of the act creating it, or to institute such a policy of teaching politics or religion, or any vagary, as may be distasteful to the people, there is nothing in the proposition now under consideration which forbids the Legislature from repealing the act which creates the university

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will my friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger] allow me to ask him a question? If we recognize in the Constitution the Cornell University as an incorporated body now existing, and bestow funds upon that institution as it now exists, will the Legislature retain the power to repeal or modify the enactment under which that institution has its organization? Will it not be crystalized in its present shape in the Constitution? Will it not be necessary that the institution should exist as it is now in order that it may receive the funds which go to it because it exists?

Mr. FOLGER—I think nothing more will be crystalized in the Constitution than we put in the form of a crystal. Now we do not put in the Constitution in the form of a crystal, or crystalize any particular policy, or any particular power in these trustees to create a policy, or to deviate from a policy; all we say is, by my amendment, that this college scrip fund shall be devoted in perpetuity to that institution so long as it complies with the conditions under which it was created; that so long as this fund shall be paid to the officers of this institution. But when they come, if they do, to teach a particular tenet in religion, or a particular heresy in politics, or any other vagary which is unacceptable to the people, the people hold the right to exercise the control reserved to them by the last clause of the act authorizing the Legislature at any time to alter, amend or repeal the charter. Certainly if the university is there yet, its financial officer, under this constitutional provision, will receive these funds; but there is nothing in the Constitution which says that they may devote those funds to any particular purpose, or any purpose aside from that recognized and anticipated by the act creating them. Therefore, it seems to me, this branch of the argument of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] falls to the ground; that there is no danger of our locating and sustaining in the midst of us by the funds of the people, any institution which shall degenerate into teaching vagaries of religion or politics. Then comes the other proposition, and it is a question of expediency for every gentleman to determine; and it seems to me, the substance of the question is this: shall we put into the Constitution what we have already put in the statute book? Are there arguments sufficient to induce this Convention to follow the same course which the Legislature followed? That course is to devote to this single institution the income of this fund. Have arguments been presented here—do they exist in the nature of things, and in sound reason—why one institution shall receive the benefits of this fund forever, and why no other institution shall divert it from them? Men may differ about that. For my own part, I have become convinced, although once opposed to that idea, that we can only succeed in making this fund largely useful by confining it to one institution, which shall grow up in a manner commensurate with the object designed to be accomplished when the funds were appropriated to this institution. The question is presented to us, as if we were sitting here as legislators, discussing about the advisability of the act giving these funds to the Cornell University. Would we do it? Would we do it upon the conditions contained in the act incorporating that university? That is the only question presented to us. The desire is that, we, as a constitution-making body, shall put in the Constitution the same form and condition of the contract which the Legislature made with the Cornell University, and no other, reserving to the people, through their Legislature, the same powers which the Legislature reserved to itself in the act which created it. Now, if gentlemen here have been convinced, either by their own reflections or by the arguments of the gentlemen from Columbia [Mr. Gould] and Richmond [Mr. Curtis] that it was a wise appropriation by the Legislature of these moneys, to give them to the Cornell University, I see no reason why they should hesitate to make a constitutional provision of what is now merely a legislative provision; for it is provided by my amendment, that, we retain the control of this institution if it departs from or violates the condition under which it is created. The necessity of a constitutional provision is this: to prevent the constant annoyance which might occur from interested persons applying to the Legislature, for a division and diverson of this fund from it. I need not say to the gentleman [Mr. M. I. Townsend] with the chronic nausea of legislation which he has, and which he has eructated upon us from day to day, that it would be an annoyance to the trustees of this university to be day after day and year after year, anticipating and contending with a request to the Legislature to alter, repeal, or amend the appropriation of this fund. The only object is to prevent that; but not to take away from the Legislature and from the people the power to repeal the act when the conditions under which it was made shall be defeated, when this institution shall devote its endowment to wrong purposes, or shall fail in any way to perform the conditions under which it received its fund.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I feel it my duty, in answer to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], to "eructate" a few moments longer, although it may be offensive to the trustees of the Cornell University who desire to use their position in this Convention to thrust their favorite pet into the Constitution of the State.

Mr. CURTIS—Which of the trustees are present?

Mr. FOLGER—I am a trustee.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I undertake to say, as a lawyer, and I call upon other lawyers here to set me right if I am wrong, that if we adopt the proposed provision in the Constitution, the Legislature will lose the power to alter, modify or amend the conditions of the grant made to that institution. And as we lawyers are fond of quoting eminent authority for our opinions, I quote the opinions of the three gentlemen who have set themselves forward in advocacy of this measure, and who have delivered opinions upon this floor. It has been said by these gentlemen, over and over again, that they desire that this should be put into the Constitution to the end that it shall not be altered or amended by the Legislature; and when I find myself sustained by such authority, I shall feel that I am in the discharge of my duty in "eructating" my views, which, on this point, at least, happen to agree with those of the gentleman.

Mr. ALVORD—I do not desire at this time to go into any extended debate on this matter, because I think it has been fully gone over by my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] and the gentleman from Ontario[Mr. Folger]; but I desire to impress one single idea upon the mind of this committee which it seems to me has not yet been fully understood by the committee, or mentioned in the remarks of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. In 1863, as has been stated, a certain amount of land was given to each one of the States of these United States in proportion to the number of their members of Congress. The result of the gift of a large body of land or at least land scrip representing this body of land throughout the United States of America, was the consequent depression in the price of the scrip in the money markets of the country, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. The first sale of the scrip in this State brought a little over eighty cents; and but a very small proportion of the scrip was sold: it was a matter of grave and serious concern, on the part of the State officers, acting under the statute as advisers to the Comptroller what should be done with this scrip. Others of the States of the Union were rapidly putting it on sale, and it was rapidly depreciating in the market until the State of Vermont sold its entire amount of land scrip for sixty cents an acre; and it went down in the market of the country in 1866, to the sum of fifty-five cents an acre, and a very small portion could be sold at that price. Other States were pressing this scrip on the market to such an extent that it reduced the price to the point I speak of. Then in addition to all that Mr. Cornell had done in the way of endowment of the institution called the Cornell University, carrying out fully and completely the agreement which had been made up to that time, as between him and the State, he steps in with his vast resources and ability and makes a proposition to the people of this State in reference to this land scrip. The State of New York, under the terms of the grant from the United States of America, had no right itself, as a sovereign State and the owner of the land scrip, to go into the western country and there locate the land and hold on to it until it should rise in value. That advantage was only given to the States in which there might be public land belonging to the United States. Therefore the State of New York, as a State, neither by any enactment of its own nor by the act of its public officers, could locate this land themselves and wait for the natural rise of the price of the land; and Mr. Cornell made this proposition: that he would take this land scrip in quantities from time to time, as much as might be necessary for the purpose of enabling him to locate it correctly, and he would give into the State treasury thirty cents an acre, absolutely to make the college land scrip fund; and he would then proceed to sell these lands, and would take the first thirty cents of profit and put it also in the land scrip fund, making it sixty cents an acre, or five cents more than the scrip was then selling for in the market. But he agreed (and his agreement is a solemn and binding one), in addition thereto, that he would locate this land and that he would sell it from time to time, not at his own motion, not at his own figures, but at a minimum price, to be fixed by the officers of the State, and after deducting the expenses of the operation and the interest upon any money that he might expend in locating the land, any remaining profits thereof should go into the public treasury of the State as an endowment fund for the institution. Now, sir, there have not been more than one hundred thousand acres of this land sold outside of the reach of this agreement upon the part of Mr. Cornell. The remaining portion of it has been placed in his hands from time to time, so that a very large proportion of it, more than half, has already been located; and such has been the appreciation in the value of those lands already located that, without undertaking to overstate it, I can say here that beyond any moral doubt whatever, instead of this producing as a fund for educational purposes the pitiful sum of $550,000 or $600,000 (as much as it would have produced if it had been sold as originally contemplated, and as has been done in other States), it must of necessity produce over two millions of dollars as the result of the sale of these lands, under this arrangement by Mr. Cornell. Now, I hold that whereas he has gone into the agreement, and has put his great energy and sagacity as a business man into this matter, and has added to that energy and sagacity also the moneys now enjoyed by him, he is as well entitled to the credit of paying $1,500,000, the amount over and above what the State would otherwise have realized, into the treasury, as he is entitled to the credit of having paid $500,000 for the foundation of the Cornell University; so that any bequest or gift for educational purposes that has ever been given within the limits of the United States of America, by any individual, living or dead, falls into insignificance by the side of the magnificent one of Mr. Cornell. Another thing, sir. I think that it is due to this occasion (inasmuch as public records should be made to a certain extent of all the doings in this regard), to say, from my knowledge of the fact, that there seems to have been more hesitation upon the part of Mr. Cornell himself than upon the part of any of his family. His sons, young men, active, vigorous, and just starting in life, his wife, his daughters, have all stood by him and urged him on in this regard, so that what Mr. Cornell has given to the cause of education has not been taken from the heirs expectant, but has been given with cheerfulness and with the entire consent and approval of those heirs, when they were aware that possibly an attempt on their part to prevent the gift would have been successful. Now, I do think, and at the risk of repeating what has been said by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], I say here, that it is the height of folly on the part of the people of this State, to undertake by any possible means to permit a loophole to exist where there might be a diffusion and scattering of this immense grant by the United States to the people of this State. And if there is any excuse needed for putting this into the Constitution of the State of New York, it is that it is demanded we shall thus secure this grant, to one single purpose, and have it under one single control, whereby the aggregate of the entire amount shall be kept together, and thus its full benefit shall be had, rather than that divided and scattered, its strength shall fail, and become weakness, and thus the great benefits that were hoped to be derived from it shall be lost to us and our children forever.

Mr. GOULD—I have not the vanity to suppose that I have the power of gilding refined gold or of painting the lily, or of adding perfume to the violet, and therefore after the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] and the exhaustive argument that he has made I should have preferred to submit the subject to the grave consideration of this Convention uninfluenced by any words of mine; but the remarks of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] seem to call for some answer in addition to that which they have already received, and I propose now to answer a few of the points made by that gentleman in order that the whole subject may be clearly before the Convention. He has told us that the ex officio officers of this university amount to nothing, that they might just as well not be there as to be present in the deliberations of the board. He alleges that it is a self-perpetuating institution and that it will assuredly crystalize into certain ruts of education which it will be absolutely necessary for the Legislature to interfere with in the future. But the gentleman has not told this Convention that there there are seven of those ex officio members, the Governor of the State of New York, the Lieutenant-Governor of the State, the Speaker of the Assembly, the librarian of the Cornell University, the president of the State Agricultural Society and others, amounting to seven in all. That, sir, does not look like crystalization. All interests are represented. The president of the State Agricultural Society, elected annually, and changed at each election, is a member of that board. Now, seven men constitute a powerful minority. They constitute a body, which, although a minority in the board, can exercise a very important influence in it; and, sir, it is not a self-perpetuating institution, as I remarked when I was up before. There is a provision by which the graduates of the university, after they shall number one hundred, have a right to be represented in the board, and they also have the power of election, so that there is ample provision against any such crystalization as the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] supposes would take place. Then again the gentleman has alleged that this institution may teach some sectarian doctrines that are disagreeable to the people of this State. Well, sir, the very charter of the institution, its fundamental law to which alone it owes its existence, provides against that. It provides expressly that the board of trustees shall not consist at any time of a majority of any one denomination, and also that it shall never consist of a majority of those who are of no denomination whatever; so that you can never have exclusive sectarian influence nor exclusive infidel influence in that university. So far as human sagacity can guard against difficulties of that kind the charter of the institution does guard. I need not repeat what the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has said, that the guaranty to this institution is not a guaranty for the perpetuation of the corporation known as the Cornell University. It still very properly reserves to itself the power of repealing the charter of that institution in case the necessity should arise. This constitutional provision does not interfere with that power at all. But it is alleged by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], that no other institution of learning in the State is put by name into the Constitution, and he has cited to us the case of Mr. Vassar, who has certainly been exceedingly liberal in endowing educational institutions. But why is not that institution in the Constitution? Mr. Vassar has never sought for any such provision as that which we propose to make for the Cornell University, and it was not necessary for the purposes of the institution he endowed. He gave, knowingly, a certain sum of money for the foundation of a female seminary. The Legislature did for him all that he asked and all that he desired; no other institution can, under any circumstances, claim a dollar of its funds, but the circumstances of the Cornell University are different. The grant from the State proceeds upon the assumption that if Mr. Cornell makes a liberal provision of five hundred thousand dollars for the endowment of the university, the State also will make a similar provision. These are mutual considerations in this case between Mr. Cornell and the State, and that is why it is an exceptional case, and it is because there is no other institution in the State where this mutual contract exists, that there is no necessity for a constitutional provision like this in reference to any other institution. It has been said here that Mr. Cornell made this gift with the certain knowledge that the Legislature reserved the right of withdrawing or altering it. They certainly did reserve that right, and Mr. Cornell knew the fact, and he knew that the Legislature was prohibited by the Constitution from making the grant on any other terms, but he had faith in human nature and he believed that when the people of the State of New York came to revise their fundamental law, as they must do this year, they would correct that mistake and would ratify the bargain already made by their representatives; as I sincerely trust they will do. Now allow me to say that no other institution that has ever been established in the State of New York has attracted so much interest outside of the State, or has been the means of causing so great an improvement in the educational purposes and arrangements of other States as the Cornell University. I know of my own knowledge that Harvard University has had its endowment increased, simply that it might still continue to be, not the superior, but the peer of the Cornell University. The vast endowments which have been lately given to Yale College have had their root and source in the same motive. Sir, I do trust that this Convention will not be governed in this matter by such considerations as those put forward by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. Mr. Cornell has no desire for credit, no desire for renown, by having his name connected with the university. He simply desires the privilege of doing some good, something which will live after him, and bless and fertilize the minds of our young men in all coming time. He does not ask that this institution shall bear his name, and if it should be the desire of this Convention to give it any other, I will guarantee in his behalf (although I am not authorized to do so) that he will consent that it shall have that other name. Only permit the institution to go and do the benificent work that he desires and intends it shall do for the State of New York, and he will be entirely willing to give up the name and all the honor and commemoration which flows from it, because he will still retain the consciousness that his wealth is conferring blessings upon the present generation and upon generations yet unborn. Sir, this university is designed to do what no other institution does in this land. We have many colleges, institutions for the most part that take every man who enters them and put him upon a Procrustean bed which requires him to pursue a certain number of studies in regard to which he has very little election. Now, sir, we know that every young man has a special vocation in life; that there is something in which every man takes more interest than he takes in any other one. The inclination of some men is to music, of others to drawing, of others to painting, of others to mechanic arts, of others to agriculture, of others to law, of others to medicine, of others to the ministry, and these different classes of men require different training and different special preparation in order to enable them to perform the functions that they are to assume with the greatest success and the greatest advantage to the public. The Cornell University proposes to give its children these advantages. It proposes to take the man just as he is, and if he desires to be a mechanic to make him acquainted with the laws of mechanics, or if he wants to be a farmer to teach him all that is necessary to make him a successful and accomplished farmer. It will teach the science of precious stones to the lapidary, and the ultimate structure of iron to the blacksmith. It will reveal the mysteries of architecture to the carpenter and the use of the theodolite to the engineer without asking him to learn one word of Latin or Greek. The Cornell University not only proposes to do this, but it proposes also to add to the amount of human knowledge—to be an investigating institution. It proposes to give us such a body of scientific men as we have never yet had in this State or in this country. If the State authorities desire scientific information in regard to any subject, this institution proposes to have a body of scientific men constantly at the service of the State to investigate the scientific problems that may arise, and to give the most satisfactory solutions of them possible at the time. This is a distinct feature of the Cornell University which ought not to be overlooked in this discussion. If we desire to have such an institution, if we desire to extend the area of human knowledge, then I trust that the means by which the Cornell University may be enabled to give it to us will not in any contingency be allowed to be taken away from it. I believe that I have now answered all the arguments of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. He has told us that it is not immoral for the State to make a contract with Mr. Cornell, and then back out of it and withdraw the consideration by which Mr. Cornell was induced to appropriate the munificent sum of $500,000 for this purpose. Now, if that is not immoral, I should like the gentleman to tell us what is immoral. Surely his dictionary must be different from those which are in general use among the people of the State of New York. I trust, sir, that we shall hesitate no longer, but that we shall perform the act which is required at our hands by the unanimous wish, at least, of the farmers of this State, and, I think I may say, by every one who is not interested in other institutions, and who is interested in promoting the highest interests of this State.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I desire to say a few words to correct what seems to be some misapprehensions in the minds of some of the gentlemen who have spoken here. In the remarks that I made this morning I spoke of institutions of learning which had self-perpetuating bodies of trustees. The gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] has endeavored to show that this institution is not one of that kind, by showing that when the graduates reach a certain number, the body of the trustees, except those who are ex officio, must be selected from these graduates. Now, there is not a gentleman here who is a graduate of a college, or who is acquainted with the graduates of colleges, who does not know that there is an esprit du corps pervading them as a body, from the highest professor down to the lowest student, which will make this mode of filling the vacancies in a board of trustees really have the effect to make that body self-perpetuating, as I stated. The same principle which governs the board of trustees will govern those members who are added to it in this way, for every body knows that a board will not take any man of opposite views. There seems to be another misapprehension here. This subject seems to be discussed with the idea that my amendment proposes to take away this fund from the Cornell University. Sir, it proposes no such thing. It proposes simply to put the conditions to be performed by the State and the conditions to be performed by Mr. Cornell on the same footing, to give each guaranties of the same degree of stability, and not to appropriate these funds by an unalterable constitutional provision, and then leave the conditions to be performed by Mr. Cornell so unguarded that, in a contingency that may be very well imagined, his heirs might apply to have this gift refunded on the ground that the institution already had funds enough. The object of my proposition is simply to put the matter so that it will stand fairly and equally on both sides. There is another misapprehension which I desire to have corrected. We have heard a great deal said in commendation of the liberality of Mr. Cornell, in all of which I concur. But this amendment refers simply to what is called the college land scrip fund, which is the first price of the land, and it is not pretended that it is any more, or really as much as the land is worth. The amount is $594,000, and this amendment applies only to that. Now, the Cornell endowment fund amounts, according to Mr. Cornell's estimate, to $2,350,000, of which $1,850,000 are profits derived from that land. That is the fund upon which all these brilliant eulogiums are passed, and nobody proposes to interfere with it. The Cornell University has that in perpetuity, and the question is entirely confined to this fund of $594,000, derived from this land scrip (which was sold for no more than it was worth), over which the State has a right to exercise supervision, and to secure the use of the fund for the purposes to which it was devoted by the act of Congress.

Mr. ALVORD—Do I understand the gentleman to say that that is no more than the scrip was worth?

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—Yes, sir; sixty cents an acre.

Mr. ALVORD—I would like to refer the gentleman to my friend from Chautauqua [Mr. A. F. Allen], who says that he was offered this at fifty cents per acre.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I see by the statement of the commissioners of the land office, that a portion of this scrip was sold at eighty-five cents per acre, and all that was sold previous to Mr. Cornell's sale, was sold at an average of sixty-five cents.

Mr. ALVORD—I would inform the gentleman that that sale was immediately upon its receipt from the United States, and that there was no other sale intermediate between that sale and the sale to Mr. Cornell.

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that Kentucky sold its share of thirty-three thousand acres at fifty cents an acre. The gentleman will further observe that when he gives $594,000 as the total amount of the college land scrip, that it arises from the fact Mr. Corpell offered to take the whole of the scrip and to allot thirty cents of the profits that he should derive from it to that fund.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I do not understand it so; I understand that the sale was made to him upon the express condition that he was to pay thirty cents when he took the scrip, and after realizing from it, was to pay the remaining thirty cents. If you sell a man a piece of land for a thousand dollars, and take five hundred dollars down, and five hundred dollars afterward, I do not understand that last five hundred dollars is a gift from him; but that would be a similar case to this.

Mr. BELL—As a further answer to the observations of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] who exultingly asks, why not put the Vassar Institute, and other similar institutions, into the Constitution, I would say that no other institution in the State is so completely under the control of the State as this Cornell University. I mean by that, that the State has a direct responsibility for every dollar that is realized from this land, and in confirmation of that I will read an extract from the act of Congress.

"The grant of land and land scrip hereby authorized shall be made on the following conditions, to which, as well as to the provisions herein contained, the previous assent of the several States shall be signified by legislative acts.

"1. If any portion of the fund invested as directed by the foregoing section, or any portion of the interest thereof, shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost, it shall be replaced by the State to which it belongs, so that the capital fund shall remain forever undiminished: and the annual interest shall be regularly applied, without diminution, to the purposes mentioned in the fourth section of this act, except that a sum not exceeding ten per cent upon the amount received by any State under the provisions of this act, may be expended for the purchase of lands for sites or experimental farms whenever authorized by the respective Legislatures of the States.

"2. No portion of said fund, or the interest thereon, shall be applied directly or indirectly, under any pretense whatever, for the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings.

"3. The State which may claim the benefit of the provisions of this act, shall provide within five years for at least one college, so described in the fourth section of this act," etc.

Now, sir, when the State of New York accepted this donation, it was obliged to comply with these conditions, and obliged, either out of its own treasury, or from the contributions of others, to provide farms, buildings and apparatus for the teaching of the arts mentioned in this act. In addition to this, as I said before, the State has a direct responsibility, and it is bound to see that no portion of this fund is squandered; and whenever any portion of it is squandered, the State is bound to make it up, by taxation or otherwise, from its own treasury. Now, the State has never entered into any such agreement with any other institution. It has not been pledged to enter into any such agreement with any other institution, and I regret that I have not the act of the Legislature of 1863, that I might read just what the State was pledged to do in this case before it was allowed to accept the scrip donated by Congress. I think the relations of the State to this institution differ materially from its relations to any other institution, and, therefore, that we may well depart in this case from the ordinary course of legislation in regard to these other institutions.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It is evident, sir, that we shall not finish this subject to-day, and as I made a motion by which, against the will of some members of the Convention, we have protracted our morning session, and as some gentlemen may wish to avail themselves of public conveyances to go out of the city before long, I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. FOLGER—The trouble is that gentlemen cannot avail themselves of public conveyances to go out of the city; it is too late.

Mr. CURTIS — The discussion having commenced, I hope it will proceed until the usual hour for the recess.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I withdraw my motion.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred upon the substitute of Mr. A. Lawrence, as amended.

Mr. WALES—Would the defeat of this amendment defeat the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]?

Mr. FOLGER—If the gentleman will permit me to state, my amendment was a substitute for that of the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence]. I offered my amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Schuyler, and my amendment having been adopted, it takes the place of the amendment of the gentleman from Schuyler, and the question now is, whether it shall be inserted in the original section.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move a reconsideration of the vote adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], in order that we may vote understandingly, because I think the effect of the vote just had was not understood.

Mr. RUMSEY—If we refuse to reconsider the vote we have just taken, I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] will remain as the question before the Convention, and that if we adopt it it will stand as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. A. Lawrence].

Mr. CURTIS—That I understand to be the exact state of the question.

Mr. RUMSEY—Then I hope the Convention will refuse to reconsider the vote we have just taken.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend to reconsider, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the proposition of Mr. A. Lawrence as amended by Mr. Folger, and it was declared adopted.

There being no further amendment offered to the first section, the SECRETARY read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. All the said educational funds, as they are paid into the treasury, shall be invested by the Comptroller in the stocks of the State of New York and of the United States, or loaned to counties and towns for county and town purposes exclusively and the State shall guarantee said funds against loss.

Mr. ALVORD—I am myself going to remain in the city over the Sabbath, and there are some few gentlemen present who are so situated that they can reach home this evening and be here by ten o'clock on Monday morning. Generally boys at school have at least Saturday afternoon and evening to themselves, and that we may have the same privilege, and for the purpose of moving that we adjourn so that we shall be enabled to pass over until Monday morning at ten o'clock and not be compelled to sit here this evening by waiting for the clock to reach the hour of two, when it will be too late to make a motion to adjourn, I move that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Whole reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Education and the Funds relating thereto, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the granting of leave, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT announced the following committee upon the manner and form in which the Constitution as amended and adopted in Convention, shall be submitted to the people:

Messrs. Merritt, Folger, Daly, Hale, Hutchins, A. J. Parker and Chesebro.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move that this Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Verplanck, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, January 20, 1868.

The Convention met at 10 A. M., pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. FARR.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The Convention resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the standing Committee on Education, Mr. PROSSER in the chair.

The SECRETARY read the section as follows:

SEC. 2. All the said educational funds, as they are paid into the treasury, shall be invested by the Comptroller in the stocks of the State of New York and of the United States, or loaned to counties and towns for county and town purposes exclusively, and the State shall guarantee said funds against loss.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to strike out in the second section all after the words "United States" in the third line—the remainder of the section. I do not desire to make any lengthy remarks upon this matter, but simply desire to say that this practice of making loans to counties and towns for county and town purposes, is a practice which has obtained in the past history of this State, and in very many instances the money has been absolutely lost, and the State, either by agreement that on the whole it was best to give it to county or town for some purpose claimed to be of general public interest, or in some other way, has lost the money altogether; while in other instances it has been a matter of considerable difficulty for the State to succeed in getting the interest. Then, again, it involves this simple proposition whether or not the access to the funds of the State through the operation of the law for the purpose of performing some act or thing of a quasi-public nature on the part of the towns or counties, does not engender a desire in them to incur expenditures which otherwise, if they were called upon to pay for them directly by taxation, economy would forbid them to incur. I believe, sir, that towns and counties are induced in this way to go into expenditures sometimes amounting to extravagance, feeling that they can easily obtain the money from the State, and need never pay any thing but the interest of it for all time to come. I think, therefore, that we had better restrict our towns and counties to paying out only such moneys as they are willing to tax themselves directly for, and not encourage them to run into debt upon the hope that the principal of that debt will never be called for.

Mr. CURTIS—The section now under consideration was introduced with great deliberation by the committee after consultation with the Comptroller of the State and with an honorable member of the Convention [Mr. Church], who had been Comptroller formerly. It was the result of their experience that such a provision as this would be most serviceable. As the matter now stands you are aware that this money is loaned to individuals upon mortgages which are the first lien, but such is the looseness of the present method of making the loan that within the last thirty years, according to the report of the Comptroller, the State has lost some $160,000 in this way. The loss of the principal is made up by the interest, and consequently there is a constant deterioration. Still it was deemed wise that the people of the different portions of the State should have the use of this money under sufficient guaranties, and it was with that view that we inserted this provision, as a safeguard in the making of these loans.

Mr. ALVORD—The difficulty in the past, so far as regards this matter, a difficulty which is avoided by having the section as I proposed to leave it, has been in this wise. So far as regards the United States deposit fund, certain amounts of this money went into the treasuries of the different counties of the State, and they undertook to loan it on real estate in the hands of individuals. The result has been, that through favoritism or otherwise, they have been careless in examining into the titles and into the actual value of the property upon which the loans have been made, so that in many instances the title has failed, and in other instances the value of the property when it has come to be submitted for sale on foreclosure of the mortgage, has been found to be merely nominal. This accounts for a considerable portion of the one hundred and sixty thousand dollars that have been lost. Another thing, they have been in the habit of loaning out the funds of the State, other than the educational fund, to academies and local institutions of learning, and after those loans have been made, the academies and other institutions have come down here to Albany and kept constantly hammering, until they have entirely hammered away the foundation of the loan, and the money has been given to them by the people of the State. Now, sir, these towns and counties if they want any money for any purpose under heaven, their people are able to pay that money, and should be compelled to pay it by taxation within a reasonable time; and they should not be permitted to borrow in that way. When they raise money in that way their debt, in their view, is put off almost indefinitely, and they run into unnecessary expenditure which they would avoid if they had to have taxation follow close upon expenditure. Now we have provided in this section, very correctly I think, so far as the committee is concerned, that for the future these moneys shall only be invested in the stocks of the United States or the stocks of the State of New York. This gives us a perfect security, and this is the way in which the funds should be invested; but making these loans, it seems to me, is only encouraging a sort of reckless extravagance which we had far better discourage.

Mr. GRAVES—I would like to inquire of the Chairman of the Committee on Education, what is meant by the last line of this section—"the State shall guarantee said funds against loss." Does that mean that if the towns and counties fail to pay the money, the money is to be taken out of the State treasury to supply the deficiency?

Mr. CURTIS—The money is to be taken out of the general fund, the school moneys to be always intact. That was the intention.

Mr. GRAVES—Then I understand that the treasury in general is to be depleted to make up any loss which may be sustained by any omission on the part of the towns or counties to pay the interest on these loans.

Mr. CURTIS—It is the misfortune of the State that the school fund is a great domain for predatory incursions from the other departments, and it was the design in this provision to keep this most important fund always intact, so it was provided that these losses should be made up by the State generally.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], for this reason. By the report of the Comptroller, we find that he reported $491,765.82 principal with the addition of interest, amounting to $188.256,71. When called upon to know what amount of interest was due upon money loaned and upon the interest on bonds for lands sold, we find by the reply that the interest reported should have been $78,097.27 less, hence by that statement it appears that no one at that time, was in possession of actual knowledge of what the real amount of money belonging to the school fund was. Also we find in that report a class of items amounting to about one thousand in number, in many instances the interest largely exceeding the principal, and in a few cases of loans to institutions and corporations, we find that the interest has accrued to one-half or one-third of the principal. It seems, to say the least, that there has been bad management of this fund; not very creditable to any official officer of the State. I charge this, not upon any one particular administration or officer because it seems to be a system that was inaugurated very many years ago, and perhaps at the time it was inaugurated in our early history there might have been a seeming propriety for permitting these loans, but at this day and condition of our State it seems quite unnecessary to make such loans in the manner that they have been made. I am aware, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has remarked, that many towns come up to the Legislature with the plea that they have borrowed money for some purpose of public benefit or advantage—perhaps to build an academy or some institution of learning—and they say, "You surely will not sell our academy; you are not going to distress us; the State is rich," and thus they get the liability discharged. This fund should be kept secure and good, but this system of finance will never keep it so, but will always, in aggregate of amount, be uncertain to a certain extent under the present management. For that reason I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and I feel almost inclined to introduce the following resolution, which, although it may not be proper at this time, but as it meets my view of the case I will now read the suggestion:

"The Legislature shall provide for the collection of all moneys belonging to the educational fund loaned to individuals, or for moneys due on bonds for lands sold on which payments of principal and interest are past due."

I do not know that it will be proper for this body to introduce this provision into the Constitution, but it seems to me that a radical change ought to be made in the management of this fund. This school fund should be brought down to a solid basis, so that we might know what we have to rely on from that fund.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord to strike out, and it was declared carried.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I move that in the third line, after the words "State of New York," there shall be inserted "or any cities thereof." It will be perceived by the committee that there is a possibility that with the coming of a better condition of our business affairs, the stocks of the State of New York may assume such a position in the market as would make the investment in them a very unprofitable one, and a possibility still more remote, that the same condition of things might exist with reference to the stocks of the United States. Now, we know, that with reference to the stocks of the cities of the State, great caution has always been exercised in their issue, and I believe that it may be safely asserted that not in a single case of the issue of the stocks of a city in this State, has there been a defalcation. These stocks we hold, too, under our control, they are part of our State system. The stocks of the city of New York present an aggregate value equal to half the value of the stocks of the State, and I think it would be very unwise to limit the investment of these funds to the stocks of the States or the stocks of the United States. the latter stocks over which we have no immediate control, and omit to allow investments to be made in the stocks of our own cities, over which we have a direct control. The fact of the profitableness of investments of the cities of our States that can be obtained about par, I should suppose would have had controlling effect in the minds of the Convention in their determination of this matter.

Mr. ALVORD—I think the opinion of the committee in regard to that matter has been settled by the provision refusing to loan to towns or counties. The stocks of the towns and counties of the State, are just as good, and perhaps a little better, than the stocks of the cities, and this is only a proposition to do by indirection the same thing that we have already decided not to do—facilitating the means by which cities can get hold of money from the State treasury and expend it extravagantly. The cities of our State, to-day, are loaded down vastly beyond the means of their people to bear.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Let me ask the gentleman, has there ever been a single defalcation in the case of any of our cities?

Mr. ALVORD—I am not talking about defalcations, sir. I trust that the people of the United States of America, if it should become necessary, will pay ninety-nine, aye, a hundred per cent on the dollar of their actual property for all their indebtedness, but this is not the question. I say that our cities to-day are paying three, four, five and six per cent in taxes in consequence of the fact that we have gone recklessly and extravagantly in debt because of the facilities that they have had to procure loans on their stocks and bonds. Now I trust that we are not going to give them additional facilities in the same direction. The city of New York, instead of being in debt half as much as the State, is to day indebted to the full as much as the State is, and there are a very few of the cities in the State which are not indebted to an amount, so far as the interest itself is concerned, of two to five cents on the dollar in the valuation of their property.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will say in reference to the indebtedness of the city of New York that it is some thirty millions of dollars, but that city has some fifteen millions of dollars of her own bonds in her treasury, and beside she has the Central Park, and the Croton water-works, and—

Mr. ALVORD—I take that all into consideration, sir. I stand up here as one of the believers of the fact that where an institution or a State or a city is in debt nominally in the way of stocks and has property available as against that indebtness, the sum total of the indebtedness is the balance. Now if you take the State of New York to-day, you find her with an indebtedness of fifty or fifty-five millions, including her canal debt; but give to the State the credit of that canal property which she owns, and it will sweep out of existence the whole of her indebtedness. That is the test that I apply, and it is for this reason that I say that the city of New York with her boasted fifteen millions in her treasury for the purpose of paying so much of her indebtedness, is absolutely indebted to even a greater extent han the State of New York.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—That indebtedness is the very stock itself that the gentleman has spoken of.

Mr. ALVORD—I understand the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] perfectly, and I understand the position that I occupy. It is true that in those large cities they have fire-engines, and city halls, and parks, and all such things, and other conveniences that are necessary for the benefit and use of the people in the cities, but they are not property which returns in dollars and cents to pay the interest and principal of their indebtedness as it shall become due. This kind of property cannot be used for that purpose. I say again, sir, that the city of New York is to-day indebted to the full as much as the State, and I trust that we shall not go any further in this direction than in the amendment proposed by myself.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I should like the gentleman to reply to the other branch of my argument that such a limitation as he proposes, under the section as it now stands, must necessarily very much decrease the revenues of the fund. By this provision you require investments in certain specified funds. Now, sir, we know the law of demand and supply and the shrewdness of those who deal in money, which is at least as great as those who deal in merchandise, and the moment it is found that these funds must be invested in the stock of the State of New York that necessity will become one of the elements of an increased value of that stock; and if we adhere to this proposition a result will be that we may have to pay one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty.

Mr. ALVORD—Let me answer the gentleman right here, before he goes any further. Under a resolution, one of the last that was passed while I was acting in an official capacity as a commissioner of the canal fund, we authorized the auditor to retire a portion of the State indebtedness which was becoming rapidly due within a period of about three or four years.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—In what year was that?

Mr. ALVORD—In 1866; and he retired a large portion of it at ninety-five cents on the dollar. I say, sir, that the stocks of the State of New York falling due, can be had at par.

Mr. CURTIS—May I ask the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] a question? What was the rate of interest?

Mr. ALVORD—The rate of interest was six per cent. They were stocks that were falling due, at a very near period, and the parties naturally desired to get their money out of them and invest it in others. A man who is engaged in this business of investing money in stocks as a legitimate business, not for speculation, will prefer to take a five per cent stock with twenty years to run, rather than a six or seven per cent stock with only three or four years to run. A five per cent twenty years stock that is perfectly available and good, is worth more than a six or seven per cent stock that has only one or two years to run; and our State stocks are now rapidly falling due, so that in the next ten or twelve years we shall have all of them out of the market, at least to that extent that there will not be any difficulty in this fund being invested in our stocks about at par.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I must say that I do not think the gentleman's reply entirely conclusive or judicious with reference to this matter. The facts which he details in regard to the stocks of 1866 may be explained thus. Since the war came upon us and our national government began to issue its stocks, the market has been crowded with other stocks, as good as, or better than our own, and that was the reason why parties holding our securities falling due within a year or two, were willing to accept a price which was even below par, because they could see their advantage in a very large presumptive profit to be had by investment in national securities; but if that condition of things had not existed I apprehend that the stocks of the State of New York could not have been bought below par, at the time the gentleman has named. There is another point to which, if the gentleman had directed his attention, I should have cheerfully given him my support; a point that I deem of far more consequence than this, in reference to the profitable and safe investment of these funds. It is that suggested by the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales] the other day, with reference to the change in the investment of the United States deposit fund. This Convention has exhibited a very praiseworthy spirit in opposition to the increase of State officers, but here we have, in every county of the State, a large number of officers who are engaged in a sort of ex officio business whenever they have an opportunity. Now, the provision suggested by the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales], directing the investment of these funds, as they come in from those mortgages—if not compelling the collection of those mortgages now due—in the stocks of the State of New York or of the United States, would be a very judicious one. We should probably get an equal rate of interest, and we should get rid of the chance among this class of men of "toll," as we choose to call it (though the plainer word is stealing), and thus put the whole matter in so plain a form that he who runs may read.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. S. Townsend, and it was declared lost.

Mr. WALES—I move to amend by adding the following:

"Provision shall be made for investing in the bonds of the United States government, under the direction of the Treasurer of the State, any part of the principal of the United States deposit fund which shall be paid in to the loan commissioners of the several counties of the State."

Mr. ALVORD—I would suggest to the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales], with all due deference, that we have already put that provision in the section, in these words: "All the said educational funds, as they are paid into the treasury, shall be invested by the Comptroller." The moment they are paid back to the loan commissioners of the different counties, they are in the treasury of the State, and the commissioners have no right, under this provision of the section, to do any thing else but invest them.

Mr. CURTIS—Unquestionably.

Mr. WALES—I withdraw the amendment.

The SECRETARY read the third section of the report of the Committee on Education, as follows:

SEC 3. The Legislature may provide for the payment into the treasury of money or securities for the general or special endowment of any literary or educational institution in this State; for the investment of the same, and for the payment of the interest upon said investment in accordance with the terms of the endowment as approved by the Legislature.

There being no amendment the SECRETARY read the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. The Legislature at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution shall elect, in joint ballot of the Senate and Assembly, a superintendent of public education, who shall hold his office for four years and until his successor is appointed. He shall have such powers, and perform such duties, and receive such compensation as may be prescribed by law.

The Legislature at the same session shall create a State board of education, to consist of seven members; of which board the superintendent of public education, the Secretary of State and the Comptroller, ex officio, shall form a part; and the other four members shall be elected or appointed as shall be provided by law.

The State board of education shall have general supervision of all the institutions of learning in this State, and shall perform such other duties as the Legislature may direct. The term of office and the compensation of the members shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. ALVORD—Without indicating what my action will be in regard to the latter portion of this section, I propose to amend the first paragraph by striking it out and inserting in lieu thereof:

"The office of the superintendent of public instruction is abolished. The powers and duties of such office shall be performed by the Secretary of State; and a separate bureau may be established in his office for that purpose by law."

Previous to and for a long time after the Convention of 1846, the duties now exercised by the superintendent of public instruction, who is undertaken to be constitutionalized here under a slightly different name, were performed, and performed with the approbation of the people of this State, as an adjunct to the office of the Secretary of State. There were other duties performed by the Comptroller, and when we come to that I shall endeavor to take the same course in regard to it, but I hold that, by a fair, unbiased reading of the Constitution of 1846, although it did not by direct terms it did by intendment provide that there shall be created no separate independent State officers other than were named in the Constitution, and that if any work or business or labor which might be particularly applicable to the position of either of these officers, was rendered necessary by the growth of population and wealth of the State, it should be done as this work is done at Washington, by erecting in such departments a separate and distinct bureau and giving it more vitality, force and consequence by placing at the head of that bureau a chief clerk or assistant of the original officer. The tendency of legislation has been to forget this provision of the Constitution of 1846 and to increase the number of public officers, standing independent and irresponsible so far as regards their duties each to the other; and the great trouble and difficulty in the history of our State for the past ten or fifteen years, in regard to these matters, has been this diffusion of responsibility, which has created a lack of interest in the discharge of the duties of the different officers. Your Secretary of State to-day, outside of the fact that he is a member of the canal board and of the commissioners of the land office, is reduced to a simple clerk. The duties of his office can be better performed by a subordinate who gives his entire attention to the mere details of the office, without the necessity of originating a single idea for the purpose of getting over any dilemma that might come before him. The duties of the office of Secretary of State are simply clerical, and there is nothing to do but to go according to the regularly laid down rules that have always governed the department. What is the result? Why, the result in the past has been, and I think it will probably be so in the future, that the Secretary of State of New York spends but a very little portion of his time at the Capital. There is no necessity whatever for him to spend much of his time here. He comes here on the occasion of the meeting of the canal board or of the commissioners of the land office, or when some strictly official routine duty compels his attendance; but for the most part he leaves the whole business of the office to his subordinates, and does not educate himself up to the performance even of those duties which he is thus occasionally compelled to do. He does not, and under the circumstances there is no necessity for his doing so, stay here in his office merely to perform these clerical duties; but, when he has official duties to perform that imperatively demand his attendance, he hastily leaves the ordinary business in which he is engaged and comes up and discharges those duties with probably no very great amount of knowledge in regard to them, and when they are hurriedly gone through with he returns again to his own private business and leaves the office to be run by his subordinates. So it is, too, with some other officers of the State. Now, why is it? It is because they have been shorn of their responsibility by this constant increase of independent officers. Although there is no question whatever, but that the Constitution of 1846, and the people in adopting it, meant that there should be direct responsibility on the part of the Comptroller of this State, and that he should see that not one dollar was taken from the State treasury, except upon the warrant and by the sanction of himself as the financial head, yet in the absence of exact terms in the Constitution forbidding it, this superintendent of public instruction has been made a financial officer also, an officer outside the Comptroller, not responsible to him, and drawing directly upon the treasury of the State. And so it has been in the canal department. The Legislature have created an auditor and made him a financial officer of the State, and so divested the Comptroller, to that extent, of the powers and duties that the Constitution contemplated that he should have. Now, sir, I care not whether this concentration of responsibility is called centralization or not. If it is centralization it is certainly centralization in the right direction, and in a way that will be beneficial to the interests of the people of this State, by making the heads of departments responsible to the people, and making all the rest of the officers subordinate and subservient to them. I for one shall hope that before we get through with our labors here, we shall have restored that brightest jewel in the crown of the Secretary of State in the past, his office as superintendent of the education of the people of the State; that we shall have returned to the Comptroller the legitimate duties of the banking and canal departments, as they were in the original Constitution, and that we shall fix the duties of this office, where they ought to be fixed, upon the Secretary of State, and get rid of this confusion and this want of responsibility which now exists, so that when citizens go to the head of a department to investigate any particular matter, they shall not be told: "That is out of my province; it belongs to another officer;" and when they go to that other officer they get the same answer, and are not able to put a finger upon the official who is really responsible. I trust that this superintendent of public instruction will be the Secretary of State of the State of New York. So far as the performance of the duties of the office are concerned, if it should be necessary that there shall be erected in the office of the Secretary of State a separate and distinct bureau, let us give the Legislature the right to do that by law.

Mr. BELL—I am compelled to differ somewhat with the honorable gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], who has just spoken. First, in regard to the authority of the Legislature to create the office of public instruction. Whatever is not expressly prohibited is in the hands of the people and the Legislature to do with it as they please. Our Constitution differs very materially from that of the United States. In that, the grants of power must be given by express language, and no powers are given by it unless they are directly granted in the instrument itself; but in this State all the power that is not expressly prohibited by the Constitution may be exercised by the Legislature; so that, unless there is an express and explicit prohibition in the Constitution of the State, any act can be passed, or office created, by the Legislature on that subject. Now, as to the propriety of vesting the duties that have heretofore been performed by the superintendent of public instruction in the Secretary of State, I am not clear, sir, that the duties would be so well and faithfully performed in that way as they would be by an officer created expressly for that particular duty. As is known, the duties of the office of the Secretary of State are more clerical than otherwise, and we do not look for a man in that position who understands our school system particularly; we do not look for those qualifications in the Secretary of State that we would look for in an officer charged directly with the educational interests of the State, and I am of opinion that those interests are of sufficient importance to require the entire time and talent of the best educator in the State, and unless we secure them that attention, I am fearful that our schools and our educational system generally will lack that energy and spirit of progress that are so desirable under a republican government. I am of the opinion that there are duties enough connected with this subject to occupy the entire time and attention of one man to the utmost, and therefore I am in favor of, in some way, either by election by the people or appointment by the Governor or the Legislature, vesting this matter in an officer to be called the superintendent of education, or the superintendent of instruction, as may be deemed best.

Mr. GRAVES—I should regret very much, sir, if this motion to strike out should prevail. I regard the establishment and perpetuation of our common school system as the most important bulwark against the overthrow of the liberties of the country, and the most important interest that can be known and recognized by the people. Whoever has looked for the last few years at the proceedings of the present superintendent of public instruction in connection with the acts and doings of the commissioners of the several counties in the State cannot but have observed that the advance of our common school system has far exceeded what has been done before since the organization of our government, and that to-day that system is eliciting the attention and interest not only of teachers in schools and academies, but of every well-wisher of our institutions and form of government. If your attention, sir, has been called for the last few years to the acts of our superintendent of public instruction, you cannot but have learned that great interest has been elicited all over the State, and that the community generally are more than ever engaged in the promotion of common schools, in the building of larger and more commodious school-houses, and are in every way paying more attention to the subject than ever before. All this increased interest and energy in the cause of education has been created, or at least warmed into existence by the zeal and activity manifested by the superintendent of public instruction. Now, sir, I should much regret that this great interest, so important in itself and so important also as the great bulwark of our republican institutions, should be in any way interfered with, and therefore I hope that the motion to strike out will not prevail.

Mr. CURTIS—I was not present, sir, in the committee or in the Convention during the debate on the article prescribing the duties of State officers. I presume had I been present at that time I should probably have heard the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], recommending the abolition of the office of Secretary of State, as he has very plainly set forth that that office is mainly a sinecure. Whether he failed in carrying any such proposition, or whether in his judgment it was not wise to make it, I do not know; but it seems to be his ntention this morning to revenge himself, either for the loss of opportunity or for the loss of victory by moving the abolition of one of the most fundamentally important offices that can be created in this State or in any other. There is no interest so supreme, there is no interest so fundamental, there is no interest so absolutely essential to the permanence and prosperity of the State of New York and of the United States as the interest of education. This has been a common place from the beginning of our history. Every year in this country, every day in every country in the world, shows the greater and the greater importance of this interest. Already in the State of New York, sir, there are about fifteen thousand free schools. The duties devolving upon the department which has the management of these schools, you may readily imagine. Now, if there be any part of the power of the people of the State in the superintendence of their affairs, which they should erect into a distinct department it is certainly an interest so important and fundamental as this; and that is my objection, the palpable, the obvious, the conclusive objection, to the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga, [Mr. Alvord], that this great interest should be a clerkship in a department which already exists, and exists too, without any special necessity, if I may judge from his remarks. The gentleman in considering this section has forgotten to remark that it is a unit. It is in three paragraphs, or parts, but every part has a strict relation to the other parts. It is proposed that there shall be a superintendent of public education appointed in a certain manner to hold office for a certain time. It is also proposed that this superintendent shall be a member ex officio, of the board of education, to consist of seven members. His position in that board is not defined. He is not made the chairman or president of the board. He is not made the secretary. The determination of his duty is left to the wisdom of the Legislature. The section in itself is indicative. It is indicative of the sense of this Convention upon due deliberation, of what should be the general course of management of the educational interests of the State. Every gentleman familiar with the facts will see, therefore, that the section proposes a certain change, not radical, but involving only a change in the general method of the present care of the interests of education. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that it is with great reluctance, as I look upon the thin attendance in the committee this morning, that I find myself brought, by the necessities of the question, and its interests to the immediate consideration of the scope of the section under consideration. I had hoped that the debate might be deferred until the judgment of the committee could be fairly supposed to stand as the judgment of the Convention, which, by reason of so small an attendance, cannot be presumed. I will, however, endeavor to indicate to the gentlemen who are present, the general grounds which have led the committee to report the present section. But it is with some embarrassment that I proceed to address the committee. The section, should it be adopted, virtually supersedes the present Board of Regents of the University, and I am a regent. I am, therefore, forced into the ungracious position of seeming to aim a blow at my most highly respected and honorable colleagues. And yet, Mr. Chairman, I feel very sure that they would be first to defend me from such an aspersion. Whatever the differences of our opinions as to methods may be, our views as to the objects are the same, for the object is simply the best possible method by which the State of New York shall take care of its interests of education. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing personal in this discussion. Nothing that I shall say can, by the remotest implication, be held to have a personal application. And since, sir, if this section shall be adopted by the Convention, and afterward approved by the people, I shall be deprived of the highest official honor which has ever been conferred upon me—an honor for which no man was ever more truly grateful to truer friends than I for this to those who gave it to me—I am very sure that I shall be heard for the cause simply, and that every other consideration will now wholly disappear from the discussion. Now, sir, what is the present system of education in this State? It is, as you are aware, a system of common schools, of union schools, of academies and of colleges. The two former are intrusted to the care of the superintendent of instruction, the two latter to that of the Board of Regents. The Board of Regents, Mr. Chairman, is, I think, the most ancient institution in the State. The act creating them was drawn, it is supposed, by Alexander Hamilton. The most illustrious names in our history are found upon their records; among them are those of John Schuyler, of George Clinton, of John Jay, of James Kent, of De Witt Clinton, of Washington Irving. These have all been Regents of the University, and altogether there have been of these gentlemen one hundred and five. Their election is by the Legislature, like that of United States Senators; their tenure of office is for life, removable by the Legislature, or at the pleasure of the board, for absence during a year from the meetings of the regents. They serve the State without salary or fees. Their action is noiseless. They make no appearance in the newspapers. So quiet is their action, Mr. Chairman, that at certain times it has been gravely suspected that they had probably ceased to exist at all. Now, sir, it is undeniable, no gentleman will question, that for a long period there has been a feeling upon the part of the people of the State that the regents were a name. They have fallen into disrepute. I will not say, sir, to what this may be attributable. Scholars shrug their shoulders and smile. Intelligent men, familiar with the affairs of the State, ask, "What is the Board of Regents; what are their functions?" There are citizens of the State who have even gone so far as to demand to see the University of the State of New York. There are other citizens who have a vague idea that the University of the State of New York is the institution in the city, which is the university of the city; and so far had this gone, so common and general had this feeling become, that the late poet Halleck, in one of his letters, humorously remarks, "I am becoming as ignorant of books and their authors as a president of a college or a regent of a university." This shows simply the estimation of the state of a body charged officially with the care of what is called the higher education. The institutions devoted to the higher education are academies and colleges. There are in the State, subject to the care of the regents, some two hundred and fifty academies and twenty-three literary and scientific colleges. The Regents are also trustees of the State library. They are also guardians of the State collections; but their relation to the education of the State, which is our practical point, is simply this: they are charged with the power of chartering, visiting and examining the colleges, and reporting upon their condition; of chartering academies, supervising and visiting them, distributing among them the literary funds, and reporting also upon their condition. Now, sir, what is the reality of the service which the Board of Regents in this State perform? And, to begin with the name, what is the university? Why, sir, we have had laid upon our table a communication from the Regents of the University. It appears from that document that because in the city of Oxford, that because in the city of Cambridge, in England, there are certain colleges, buildings and foundations in the same immediate neighborhood within those cities, generally within the same inclosure, of a common sympathy, of a common interest, of a common purpose, of a common faith, all subject to the federal head, called the senate—institutions by which no degree whatever can be conferred, except upon persons belonging to a special Christian denomination; a rule so strenuous and exclusive that within thirty years even the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws was refused to Edward Everett, then American Minister in London, because he did not belong to that special denomination: I say, sir, because these institutions in Oxford and Cambridge, being all blood of the same blood, flesh of the same flesh, energized and organized by the same faith and the same spirit, bound closely together in locality, are justly and properly called the universities of Oxford and of Cambridge, therefore every college in this State, from Niagara to Montauk, every college having a separate denominational foundation, every college having no other possible relation of sympathy or kindred with any other college in the State than the Baptist church in Buffalo has with the Methodist church in Sag Harbor— that therefore, by an unblushing fiction these colleges are to be collectively called the University of the State of New York. Sir, of all practical romances in the State, this is the most prodigious, of all visionary institutions this is the most visionary; nor in all history do I know of any institution with which to compare this except it be that of which Carlyle makes mention in his Sartor Resartus, the celebrated university of Weissnichtwo, which being interpreted means, the university of "I am sure I don't know where." Now, Mr. Chairman, this being the university, what are the relations to it of the Board of Regents? Their first and great function is their visitatorial power. What is that? It is simply a power which practically consists in the reception every year, from these universities, that is from these colleges, each of which, as I said, has a separate foundation, each of which is making its own way, and receiving aid from the State only upon special application and by special law, it is the reception from each of these colleges of a report, which I am very glad to state contains a great deal of the details of educational information. But, sir, for any authority that board has, for any real right of supervision, I think you will look in vain. If any college in this State should decline to send in its annual report to the regents—and you will understand that this visiting power is performed mainly by means of reports made to the regents—if any college should omit to make that report, the result would simply be, I presume, that the regents would remonstrate, possibly, and that would be the end of the matter. Why, sir, during the recess of this Convention, I met a very distinguished professor of the oldest college in this State, which by the theory is subject to the visitation of the Board of Regents, and which, being one of the most important colleges in the State, ought to be subject to their visitation. He said to me "What do you propose to do in the Constitutional Convention about the Board of Regents?" I said "It is impossible to say what we shall do, but we shall endeavor to do the wisest thing for the interests of education in the State." "Well," said he, "You do not mean to abolish the board?" I said "That is for the wisdom of the State to determine." "But," said he, "What shall we do without the Board of Regents?" I replied, "What do you do with the Board of Regents now." Well, sir, the gentleman smiled, knowing that I was myself a regent; and I continued: "Professor, if I take your arm now and go up to Columbia College and knock at the door and ask to be admitted, what will you do?" He answered: "I will beg you to come in, and will show you every thing that you ask to see." "Yes," I said again, "but Professor, if I knock at the door, and claim, as a Regent of the University of the State, under the authority of law, to enter and inspect this college, what will you do?" He said, simply and truly: "I shall deny your authority." "Why, then," said I, "are you anxious to have the Board of Regents continued?" "Simply," said he, "because I do not know what will follow, and King Log is always preferable to King Stork." I mention this anecdote, Mr. Chairman, as an illustration of the general feeling about the Board of Regents, not alone by the people of the State, but of a high officer of one of its chief colleges. If, sir —and I presume I speak to the experience of every gentleman familiar with the fact—if the Board of Regents should go into any college of this State whatever, and assert any kind of authority, in the name of the State, the Board of Regents would be simply laughed at, and shown the door. I am not saying that it is desirable that the State should regulate the colleges, but I ask, is there, in such a relation as this to the higher institutions of learning, any reason for the existence of a separate board? But you will say, perhaps, sir, that if the visitatorial power amounts to so little as this, there is still the power of the charter, and that by having the authority to charter colleges, the board necessarily have them under control. This might be so if it were an exclusive power, but the power of chartering colleges is shared by the Legislature. The result is, that of the twenty-three literary and scientific colleges which I have mentioned, five only are chartered by the regents, seventeen are chartered by the Legislature, and one, which is Columbia College, has a more ancient charter than the Constitution of the State itself. Now, the regents may prescribe what they will. They may, with the best intentions in the world and certainly I am the very last man to question their intentions or their individual ability, or their individual worth—they may with the best intentions in the world prescribe the highest possible standard for the collegiate education of the State; they may, if they choose, provide that there shall be no charter issued to any college which cannot show a clear unincumbered property of a million of dollars. What is the result? The Legislature the next day will charter any college which can show an unincumbered property of a thousand dollars for all that the regents can do, and what is the necessary conclusion from this? Why, sir, the necessary conclusion is this: that the Legislature of the State, holding this real power in their hands, look upon this institution, this Board of Regents, as an extremely ancient and venerable body, not costing the State very much money, and upon the whole not worth rooting out of the corner of the Capitol in which it is to be found. Here we perceive the views which the Legislature of the State also probably entertains of the scope and value of this institution; and, observe, sir, that when there is a real institution in this State, not when half a dozen gentleman get together in a village and agree to subscribe a thousand dollars for a university, but when a truly great institution is about rising, fully armed like Minerva to begin its great career—I do not care what the institution may be, where situated, what its name—what does it do? Why, sir, it passes the venerable body of regents by on its way to the Legislature to obtain its charter; it passes that venerable body by because it feels as earnestly devoted to an earnest purpose, that this venerable body is but a shadow and a name. Now, is this a relation, sir, viewed from the ground of the charter, is this a relation of the State to education for which it is worth while to maintain a separate and distinct organized body? Sir, this is the substance of the actual relation of the Board of Regents, to what is facetiously called the university. In the first place, although a name is of small importance except in a matter of names and shadows, there is no university in the proper sense; there is no university even in the sense contemplated, and undoubtedly sincerely contemplated by the regents in their report. In the next place the visitatorial power is purely ceremonial. The charter which they grant is a charter not granted by their exclusive authority, but by a power shared by the Legislature, and which not being exclusive, practically amounts, in the interest of education, to no authority whatever. The second relation of the Board of Regents to the education of the State is the care of the academies. They are also vested with the authority to charter academies, and visit and inspect them, to distribute among them the literary fund, and to report upon their condition to the Legislature. By a decree of the regents the literary fund is proportioned among these academies at so much for the number of students in all the academies who have pursued a certain course of study for a certain length of time. For instance, you will find by the last report laid upon our table during the summer, that there were forty thousand dollars distributed from the literary fund and other sources during the year 1866, and the number of scholars who were to be benefited by the distribution was something more than thirteen thousand, giving a little more than three dollars to each scholar in every academy where this proper course of instruction had been pursued. Now, the exact performance of a duty like this, which is simply clerical, requires, of course, great care and industry on the part of those charged with it. It is with the highest pleasure that I bear my testimony to the fact that these qualities are never wanting to the secretary of the Board of Regents —a gentleman curiously familiar with all the interests of academic education in the State, on who, substantially, the whole labor of the Board of Regents devolves. We have thus reached, sir, stripping aside the flowing robes and the embarrassing clouds—we have reached the substance of the matter; we have found the actual function which the Board of Regents perform in the economy of education in this State. They distribute to the academies a certain amount of money known as the literary fund, upon certain conditions which they themselves prescribe. This clerical duty, sir, is all performed in the office of the regents by the most capable secretary and his most capable assistants. The secretary and his assistants are substantially the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York. Now, is it desirable that for such a duty we should maintain longer the confusion of a separate board, when, as I think, there is no essential service gained for the cause of education? We are told, that there is no hostility between the board of education and the department of public instruction. I trust so, sir; I certainly hope none such exists. The gentlemen of the Board of Regents, in their report, expressly disclaim the existence of any such hostility. I, as a regent, am eager and forward to bear my testimony to the fact that there is no reason in such hostility, their interests being in their nature essentially the same, being the interests of education, and for this very reason it is that they should be placed all of them under the superintendence of one board. The Board of Regents is also undoubtedly an inexpensive department. It is a service done for the State at very little cost, but however small the expense may be as now administered, it would necessarily become still smaller even if such a proposition as that of my friend from Oncndaga [Mr. Alvord] should be adopted, and this Board of Regents and their functions should be made a clerical or subordinate bureau, in a great department of public education in the State. Why, sir, in the seventy-seventh report, the report for 1864 of the Board of Regents, they themselves speak of the want of thoroughness and exactness in the academic education in this State, and they propose certain methods to the Legislature by which they think the thoroughness and exactness might be attained. At that time we had in this country a most intelligent and competent observer of our system of education—the Rev. James Fraser, a commissioner sent out by the British government for the purpose of examining the common school system of the United States. He made a thorough investigation in the States of New England, New York, Ohio and Illinois, and upon his return he laid before Parliament a blue book which I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Chairman, is the most admirable view of the practical workings of the public school system of the United States which is to be found. He very freely bears his testimony to the worth of the system of education in this State; and what is that testimony? Quoting the very passage of which I speak, that greater exactness and thoroughness are desirable in the academic education, he says: It is absolutely, in my judgment, necessary, if they would secure, as the Regents desire, this greater thoroughness and exactness, that they should bring the whole system into one organic form, that instead of tolerating two systems in the State there should be one system; that as the interest of education in the State of New York, whether in the highest possible range of a university, down to the alphabet learned by a primary scholar, is essentially the same; so all those interests should be unified and placed in the charge of one department. And, sir, that is a view in which I am sure the Rev. Mr. Fraser has the hearty concurrence of all persons in this country who have maturely considered the subject. But, sir, I proceed: If the duty of the Board of Regents is not such as in itself to demand the existence of a separate board, has it exercised such a moral influence upon the education of the State as to justify its longer continuance? If we grant that it has no especial practical power or authority, that the laws of the State in relation to it, and its original law, are so obscure that Columbia College may fold its hands and disdainfully refuse to comply, and so far as appears without any remedy; is there any thing in its moral relations to the great interests of education in the State which calls aloud for its continuance? I spoke on Saturday morning of the unpleasant fact that the State, first in population, first in resources, first in wealth, of all the States of this Union, is yet not the State whose standard of education is the highest. I make no complaint, I state facts. It is surpassed at the east and at the west; and yet those eastern and those western glories are often justly ours. There are fifteen hundred young men every year sent by the State of New York to college. Of those fifteen hundred more than one-third go out of the State. One of the chief institutions in New England, during the student life of a friend of my own, had, I think, more than two-thirds of its students from the State of New York—meanwhile the fostering, elevating moral influence of the Board of Regents of the University, having charge of the high interests of education, continues. Yale College, Harvard College, the University of Michigan—what are they? They are the three great institutions of education in this country. Yale College is distinguished for its scientific rank; and yet four of the men who filled the scientific chairs in Yale and helped to give it that superior rank are New Yorkers—they are sons who went from this State. I remind you, sir, that the Board of Regents is eighty years old. For eighty years it has been fostering the higher education of New York; and now in a State which, at the time of the creation of the Board of Regents was a wild, silent forest, an institution is arising of the broadest and most generous scope, whose chairs are filled by the most able, yes, even by the most famous professors; an institution so thronged in its various halls that Harvard College, the oldest in the country, gladly, by the mouth of one of its most distinguished sons, salutes that young university as the chief and truest university in the land; and the crowds which go to that university, greater than those which attend any other in the land, recall the golden days of Bologna and Padua, of Salerno and Salamanca; yet this great institution which springs from the greatness of the west, which is inspired with all the young life of the west, owes a very large part of its influence and position to the fact that at its head, at the time when it began its great career, was a son of New York, assisted by another son of New York, its professor of history. And I say with pride and pleasure in this Convention that that professor of history, that accomplished scholar, that wise young statesman, that successful administrator, has at last been reclaimed by this State to preside over the true university which that State is helping to create, known as the Cornell University. There is not yet, I say, Mr. President, a single college in the State of New York which holds an equal rank with some of the colleges beyond its borders. No gentleman will misunderstand me; I am not so foolish after what I have already said of the perfect paralysis of the powers of the regents in regard to colleges, of course I am not so foolish as to make the Board of Regents responsible for the condition of these colleges; but this I have a right to say—having shown the real power of the board to be a perfectly unsubstantial thing, I look for a moral influence upon the higher education, and I do not find it. I appeal to any scholar in this State, I appeal to any teacher in this State, I appeal to any man familiar with the course of education in this State, to tell me whether the Board of Regents of the University has been at any time, anywhere, in this State, or is at this time, anywhere felt as a great energizing, elevating, and inspiring force in the higher education. If it can be proved to be otherwise, I will at once so far withdraw what I have said. Why, sir, the academies which are in the special charge of the Board of Regents in this State bear their testimony involuntarily to the condition of collegiate education in the State. There are teachers who fit a certain number of boys for college every year. Some of the best of these teachers tell me that they have more pride over the one boy who is admitted at the Michigan University, at Harvard, or Yale, than of the ten, twelve, or fifteen boys who are admitted at any New York college whatever. And why, sir? Because the boy's success is the teacher's glory. A diligent and devoted teacher in Chautauqua, in the remotest part of this State, a faithful servant teaching young men, knows that when a boy he has fitted is received at Harvard, at Yale, or Michigan, without qualifications, it shows that the man who prepared the boy, the solitary teacher in the remote corner of New York, has measured himself with Exeter, with Williston, with Andover, or with any of the great academies in the land. So it is in this manner, also, that the State of New York is made tributary to the collegiate glory of other States. Now, this condition of the higher education in the State of New York is not certainly to be attributed to any one cause. It is to be referred to several causes; but when there is a board solemnly appointed whose duty it is to take charge of this higher education, and at the end of eighty years with all the resources and the opportunities of the State, this is the truthful story that must be told—I do not make that board individually and solely responsible, but they must surely bear their share of the resposibility, and they must justify their existence by their greater service in other respects. Now, then, sir, what is it that the committee propose? In the article laid before you you will see that, without touching the academy or general school interest of the State, as it at present exists, the committee propose that there shall be a board of education, consisting of seven members, of which board the superintendent of public education—and the word "education" was chosen as the proper word, the word "instruction" having reference to the art of conveying information and the word "education" covering the whole subject—"the Secretary of State, and the Comptroller, ex officio, shall form a part, and the other four members shall be elected or appointed as shall be provided by law." It will be seen, therefore, that if there had been any hostility, which the regents expressly disclaim, between the Board of Regents and the department of public instruction as now organized, this is not a victory of one over the other. This, upon a careful consideration of the whole matter, seemed to the committee to be a remedy of the defects of the present system as they exist under the Board of Regents and as they exist under the department of public instruction. The proposition is to bring the whole subject of State education into one department or board, by which the work now performed by the regents may be discharged in one bureau. I find—and it is since the conclusion of the labors of the committee, since our report was submitted to the Convention—I find that substantially the suggestion which is made in this article was made by Mr. Wetmore, who is, I think, the same who is now, and I think was then a Regent of the University—to the Legislature in 1835, he being then chairman of the literature committee. Mr. Wetmore's proposition was that there should be a department of public instruction, the superintendent of which should be appointed triennially by the Governor and the Legislature, the superintendent to be ex officio chairman or chancellor of the Board of Regents, and to be vested with the power of visiting and inspecting the colleges and academies in the State. That, thirty-two years ago, was the feeling of any man who thought deeply upon the educational interests of the State, and I venture to say that now there is no man who does not start with the false assumption, and who does not stop with the theory that there is a hostility between the academy and the common school, and that there must be a hostility between the academy and the common schools—who does not take the view which Mr. Wetmore took at that time, and which is taken by the committee in their report. You may ask the obvious question: Why not then make the regents this board of education? The reply is plain. In the first place, the tenure of the board, the duration of their trust, is not agreeable to the purpose contemplated by the committee in the article which they have reported. The Board of Regents are now elected for life; and, in the second place, being so elected and being elected with reference to certain duties, of course it would not be fair that a body appointed for a specific duty under one set of circumstances should be continued for the discharge of very different and additional duties both in their scope and range. I think also we shall hear it stated in this debate that this is a proposition to mix up politics with education. I think at least we shall all agree it would be a very good thing if a little more education were mixed up with politics in the previous history of the politics of this country and the State, although that is not precisely the scope of the objection urged. It seems to be supposed by my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that if you give the board of education the duties that are now discharged by the department of public instruction it will bring political influences into education. But at the period to which he refers, when the Secretary of State was ex officio superintendent of public instruction, how was it? Are we to suppose that Mr. Azariah C. Flagg or that Mr. John A. Dix were any less politicians than any person who might possibly be elected to the office of superintendent of public education? Is it possible in a government like ours to keep the interests of education out of politics? If my friend and associate in the committee, Mr. Larremore of New York, who is not here and who is president of the board of education of the city of New York, if he were here at this moment he would justify me in saying that the one great interest in which the people of that city have shown themselves wise is the interest of education. Despite the various representations which gentlemen may see in the Tribune from time to time, the one interest in the city of New York—despite the unfortunate political character, and the unfortunate personal character of many of the population, the one interest on which the people show themselves wisest is the interest of education. I do not care how ignorant a man may be; I do not care what the condition of his life may be, at this time, and in this country, there is one thing that he knows, if he knows nothing else, and that is the value of education; there is one thing that he resolves for his child, even if he cannot give him the value of a mill, and that is that that child shall be educated, even though he has no idea of the value of education but as a stepping stone to power, influence and place. It is folly to say that in creating a board of education you have mixed politics with the cause of education. If you will have your Secretary of State the superintendent, he is still a political officer. If he is swerved politically in the management of any of his public duties, or influenced by any partisan or political feeling, he will undoubtedly be so influenced in the direction of education, as much as in any other; but so far as the general question is concerned, so far as the general subject of mixing politics with education is concerned, it is here precisely one of those risks that every State may take, that a free State must take, and that a free State may wisely take. I can see no force in the objection that this is bringing politics into education. Mr. Chairman, it is with great reluctance, it is with great pain, that I have seemed to speak so strongly of an institution of the State with which I am officially connected. My deep, my profound interest in this matter, the growing conviction that I have from day to day, that not only the prosperity but the permanence of this country depends upon the steady improvements and diffusion of education, has led me to make the remarks which I have submitted. I believe it is the duty of this Convention, having, I will say, more gravely, at greater length, with more calmness, considered this whole subject than it is to be supposed the Legislature at any session, in its hurry, might be supposed to devote to it—I say it is the duty of this Convention, as a body of honest citizens who bear in their hearts the highest welfare of the State, to assist the Legislature by such general suggestions as they have wisely matured. And that was the consideration which concluded the committee in presenting this article. If I am asked, why not leave the whole subject to the Legislature? why "undertake," as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] says, to constitutionalize this subject?—I answer, why "undertake" to constitutionalize any subject whatever? What is the object of constitutionalizing any subject? What is the object of placing any thing deep and firm in the fundamental law? To secure great principles of principle and administration, and fix them fast. That is the very object for which we are assembled here, and therefore it is that if any gentleman asks, why not leave this whole matter to the Legislature, he will reflect that it is, of all subjects, precisely the matter in which the Legislature might wisely take and wisely rest upon the advice of the Constitutional Convention. Sir, in regard to the ancient and venerable body with which I have the honor to be associated, at most, if this section shall be adopted, at most and at worst, my fate is theirs. If they go I go. If the ship is wrecked, I too am left weltering in the water. I honor with every man what is justly ancient. No man more than I perceives its value. If I could consult my personal respect and feeling for my colleagues; if I could for a moment consider my own personal pride; if I could yield to the charm that inheres in long tradition, I should as heartily oppose as I now sincerely approve and commend to the most earnest consideration of the committee the section which the Committee on Education has reported.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I do not wish to participate, at the present time at all events, in the discussion of the question whether the interests of education should be submitted to two boards, one having the care of colleges and academies and the other of common schools. But I wish to confine the few remarks that I have to make at the present time to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], which is to confide the interests of education in this State to the desk of a clerk in a state office. For myself I cannot assent to any such proposition. I believe that the interests of education in the State of New York are great enough to employ the whole mind of the greatest men that can be found in the State. I have another objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. He proposes to allow an officer of the State elected by the people of the State for a great variety of purposes, among which shall be his political standing of necessity, and to discharge a great variety of duties, by his sole individual fiat to select a clerk sitting at a desk, and to have the entire charge of the educational interests of the State. A proposition of that kind will belittle the interests of education and belittle the dignity that such an office should mold in the Empire State. It is for these two reasons that I am opposed entirely to the proposition.

Mr. ALVORD—I do not propose at the present time, with the small number of delegates who are now in attendance at this Convention, for I believe that this matter will have to be very largely gone over again—to enter into any extended remarks in answer to either of the gentlemen who have preceded me. But I will say, in the first place, in answer to some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] who has spoken in rather a humorous strain in reference to the position that I occupy. The difficulty lies here, that the Legislature have gone to work since 1846, and filched and robbed the Secretary of State of the functions of his office, and have transferred them to this so-called superintendent of public instruction. But I propose to restore to him the goods that belonged to him before the Legislature thus robbed him of them, and make his office, as it should be, an office of dignity and responsibilty in the State. I had no feeling or desire, nor any intention at any time to abolish the office of Secretary of State; neither should I object to abolishing the office of Secretary of State, if its duties are to be still merely clerical; but I desire to abolish by the enactment of the Constitution itself the office of superintendent of public instruction, and restore the duties and the responsibilities where they originally belong, to the Secretary of State of the State of New York. Another thing, I charge here, without fear of the contradiction, and I speak of what I know, that the office of superintendent of public instruction in this State, and the office of the superintendent of the banking department in this State, and the office of the superintendent of the insurance department in this State, were created for nothing else under Heaven except political motives, and to give a larger area to political aspirants for office. I hold that there is no doubt in the past history of the State in regard to this matter, and that we here, sitting as a constitutional body, determining the organic law of the State, should look to it and see to it that by no possibility in the future should there be this great error committed from this desire and anxiety upon the part of political parties, each and every one of them, as they come into power in the State, to enlarge the area of office to be given forth to the various political adherents of their party, whether it should be for the purpose of rewarding men, or whether done for the purpose of strengthening the party which was in possession at the time. I ask gentlemen to reflect a moment in regard to this question of education (although I do not desire to go largely into it), and tell me where has come the great incentive to improvement in this regard. Has it ever proceeded—does it proceed even to-day—from the superintendent of public instruction? Has it proceeded from the bureaus of the officers who have had it under their control? No, sir; they have come up from the people themselves, from the people in their primary capacity, who have urged forward from time to time the slow movements of the body of men here at Albany in the direction of still further and greater and higher improvement in the education of the people. And that will bear upon the Legislature in succeeding years as it has in the past. It should be left to the Legislature of this State to have in their hands the means to so mold and arrange the matter of public instruction as, from time to time, it should become necessary, and as the exigencies of education and the people themselves shall demand and desire at the hands of the Legislature. I ask gentlemen to reflect for a single moment in regard to the past history of this State in connection with this matter. Was there, sir, ever in the past any lack of ability in the exercise of the power consequent upon the duties which devolved upon the Secretary of State under the existing laws to carry out the ideas in regard to education? The very first question asked by the people of this State, as they came into the Convention for the purpose of nominating candidates for the office of Secretary of State, was, what are the qualifications of this man to become the great head of the educational interests of the people of this State? It is true, sir, that parties look to the politics of individuals as they nominate them for office; but, sir, I point with pride to the fact that, irrespective of party, before the Secretary of the State of New York was deprived of these great and high duties as superintendent of public instruction, there never was a time when he was not nominated by his party, and elected by the people of the State to the high and commanding position he occupied as an educated and enlightened man upon this subject; and I want to return to those days when, in the operations of our educational system, we can again look as a prerequisite for a person to become Secretary of State, that he shall possess the learning and intelligence and public spirit necessary for an oversight of our educational interests. I undertake to say, sir, that the Secretary of the State of New York, standing as the head in this great position, with the clerical force in his office to perform mere clerical duties, would have an abundance of time an abundance of opportunity to perform the duty to the fullest extent that you can get out of a superintendent of public instruction. Sir, as it is now, the Board of Regents of the State of New York are composed of certain gentlemen who are elected by the Legislature of the State from time to time, and of certain ex officio members, who are State officers. The Secretary of State is an ex officio member to-day of the Board of Regents of the University. We propose to make him one here. The superintendent of public instruction is also an ex officio member of that board, and we propose to make him one here, and the only man who has been added to that board, so far as it regards ex officio members is concerned, is the Comptroller of the State. Now, sir, I, for one believe, and always have believed, that the division of responsibility and of duty in the matter of education in this State, was an unwise division, that it always should devolve upon one board, and that it should have one distinct head. I am, and always have been, in the Legislature and elsewhere, in favor of giving to the present Board of Regents, as they are constituted, so far as it regards the workings of this system as advisers and counselors to the head of the educational interests, the Secretary of State, the power over all institutions, from the lowest and humblest school, up to the highest university within the limits of the State. I do not believe myself, however, in putting that in the Constitution, but I would leave that to the people who have from time to time educated themselves. I desire to leave to the educator of the people, the people themselves, the power from time to time, as they shall be called upon, to exercise it, so to change the manner in which our educational system shall be controlled or carried on, as, in their judgment they shall deem proper, and not to introduce into this Constitution, a method that we cannot depart from, no matter what the exigencies may be, for twenty years to come. I hope and trust, therefore, that so far as this matter is concerned (and I was going to make that motion after the present motion shall be decided), we shall change the first portion of this section, and then strike out the balance. Then the Legislature of the State of New York, so far as this Convention was concerned, seeing that we are against the idea of increasing the public offices, and desire a concentration of the powers and duties pertaining to these branches, under the control of the existing State offices, in order that they may be more economically administered, and better for the interests of the State, will, I think, accept the idea, and our educational interests will be managed as they were in years past. And I can reiterate here that these officers I have named were created in violation of the spirit of the Constitution of 1846, merely to create places for individuals, and for the increase of the power of the party then in existence.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am obliged to the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] for his attempt to illustrate the difference between the mode in which business will be done by the head of a department who has simply charge of one branch of the business, though of great importance, and one in which the business will be done where the head of the department has charge of multifarious duties, and the business is left to a mere clerk having a bureau in his office. I have been in a situation to feel the result of the change of system in this State produced by the creation of the bureau of insurance, that the gentleman takes occasion to bring in here. He says that the bureau of insurance was created for the purpose of making an office for a political favorite, and for the purpose of augmenting the power of the party then having control of the State. Now, sir, in the year of 1854, when the bureau of insurance was intrusted to the old slow-going system under the control of a State officer at the head of one of the departments, we had a fire in my city that destroyed property to the value of about four hundred thousand dollars. Our citizens were insured in New York State insurance companies that had been organized directly by statutes of the State, and whose stocks and organization might have been inquired into by the State officer at the head of the department; but though insured to the extent of about three hundred thousand dollars, our citizens never collected twenty thousand dollars of insurance. The result was an almost total loss. This insurance department was afterward created, if you please, for the purpose of promoting political power, and to make an office for a political favorite. In 1862, on the tenth day of May, we had another fire, and that fire destroyed about two millions of property, on which we had insurance to $1,350,000, and within two months after the occurrence of the fire there had been collected, mainly from New York insurance companies, and paid into the hands of the persons who had sustained the loss thirteen hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and not five thousand dollars of all the insurance that was upon the property destroyed was lost, and not one thousand dollars lost from the weakness of the insurance companies. Now, sir, if a party in creating a department has put a person holding sentiments in consonance with the views of that party into the office, and yet at the same time has wrought an immense public benefit, I would continue the office rather than strike it out of existence. I know of no offices but have been filled by men holding the sentiment of some party. A man who does not have any political sentiments is not fit for any office, whether it be that of superintendent of public instruction or superintendent of the banking or insurance departments. I do not undertake on this occasion to speak of the banking department in this State any further than this, that that gentleman will be a very bold gentleman who will say, at this day, that the banking department in this State has not been a benefit to the State. These departments must necessarily be filled by persons who hold some political sentiments. It is no disparagement to the character of men that they do hold political sentiments; but if the departments are useful to the State the State must have them. We cannot dispense with them.

Mr. ALVORD—I have not undertaken to say that an office in any department of the government, I care not what it is, shall not be held by politicians—that is, men in the enlarged sense of the term, whose feelings on the subject of politics are in unison with the party placing them in power. What I complained of was the creation of offices for the purpose of placing partisans in office, and for the purpose of increasing political power. In answer to the other point, I say that in so far forth as the matter of insurance is concerned, the very fact that he has suggested in reference to the fire in 1855 shows the necessity of the operation of laws in the State giving inquisitional power on the part of the officers having charge of the insurance department, and which power might still as well have been devolved upon the Comptroller as upon the superintendent of the insurance department. So in regard to the banking department. When your banking department was created, laws were enacted along side of it which gave inquisitorial powers to that department, which might as well have been given to the Comptroller. So in regard to education. The progress that has been made during the last ten or twelve years is not in the creation of bureaus, but in the enactment of laws which those bureaus have carried out in good faith but which could have been as well carried out by the Secretary of State or Comptroller. The idea that the production of these different and separate departments is the occasion of this reform and benefit is not a tenable one. It is simply the fact that in the progress of events in this country, the Legislature has seen fit to change the laws upon this subject and to give powers and duties to the heads of these different departments, different from what were possessed by the State officers when these bureaus were under their immediate control; and I do not think any man can reasonably doubt that, when we shall put these same duties under the control of the existing State officers, and we reduce the number of independent bureaus, the duties will be just as well performed as they are performed now. It is not because of the creation of these bureaus for the benefit of a party and for the persons who obtained positions under them, but it is because the laws have been so changed as to give the heads of those bureaus the rights and powers to enforce the laws and make the departments efficient, which powers were not possessed by State officers in the past.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—In regard to the matter of insurance, my friend [Mr. Alvord] will allow me to say that having through my clients and neighbors suffered immensely from the miserable attention which the public officers paid to the organization of insurance companies, previous to the establishment of the present department, that the laws then gave abundant power to the State officer to send down visitors to see whether the stocks of these insurance companies and their securities were or were not valuable. That power given to them was not executed, and yet the companies were got up and organized and suffered to exist and carry on their operations when the slightest examination — an examination which the laws, as they then existed, authorized to be made through clerks and agents—would have shown that these organizations were utterly unprepared to comply with the provisions of the law that gave them their charter to carry on business.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending motion to be on the motion of Mr. Alvord to strike out the first paragraph in the section.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—In the matter immediately at issue between the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], as to the benefits claimed to have arisen by having special officers to attend to different departments, I think the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], is clearly wrong. I claim that the excellence of our banking system, the benefits of which have culminated in the success that has attended us, and which system has been copied both in England and by the United States government, is not due to having a special organization for the system. It arose under the operation of the laws of this State, scarcely changed since 1842, and constitutionalized in 1846, and while these laws were cared for and put into execution and supervised by the Comptroller of the State. I agree with the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], that the services of the superintendent of the banking and insurance departments, although they are very slightly connected with this subject, could be safely dispensed with and devolved upon the Comptroller. I have heard no exception taken to the administration of the insurance department by the Comptroller, except the one which has been referred to by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. I think that if he had looked into the losses at the fires which he spoke of, and which were compensated for by but a very small proportion of the amount insured, he would find that the fire occurred in one of the disastrous years. There is something mysterious in this matter of fires.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If my friend will allow me to say, I will state that by the laws of 1849, insurance companies were allowed to be chartered under the general law. When they got capital of a character provided for by law, that was satisfactory to the Comptroller, they might go into operation. But under that law a set of insurance companies were suffered to grow up that were utterly without foundation; they had a capital nominally representing $500,000, but which was made up largely of the notes of those who had affected insurance; so that the great bulk of the property which they had was not worth one cent, and the loss which the State sustained, was sustained simply because the Comptroller of the State had too much business to do to pay any attention to it whatever.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—The explanation of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] rather goes to confirm the idea that the losses sustained were in consequence of the existing laws not being fully enforced, rather than from the fact that a special officer had not been appointed. In my experience I must say that I have never found the head of the finance department of the State occupied and employed for any continuous time, in the discharge of his duties. Much of the time in which he is actively employed is occupied in making out reports; but I have never found that he was so much occupied as to make it necessary that a special officer should have charge of the banking department. It was while the Comptroller had charge of the banking department, that it rose to that pre-eminence which distinguishes it in this State. I do not know whether the case referred to by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] of the loss by fire in the city of Troy is one that is attributable to any change or not, for I have not examined the data which would throw light upon that point. But I was remarking that there is a mysterious variation in the amount of fires in different years. It will be found in the returns published, that the losses by fire in this country ranged from fifteen millions a year, and sometimes as low as ten millions a year, to near forty millions a year. And this question has been asked me abroad. Whether the causes are atmospheric, or whether it is the fluctuating immorality of our people which induces this, of course it is impossible to say. I, take it that the causes stated by the gentleman would be found in the range of the circumstances I have suggested. As to the duties of the superintendent of public instruction, there has been one gentleman who once filled the office of Secretary of State, whose name has not been mentioned of late, but who pre-eminently carried on the system in a manner that was creditable to himself, and valuable to the interests of the State. I allude to John C. Spencer. There is no man at all familiar with the career of that gentleman but knows of the admirable arrangement of our school system under his management. His instructions were clear, his decisions uniform, and the results successful. To be sure, he managed the system when there were only seven or eight thousand school districts, while now there are eleven or twelve thousand; but that increase is not sufficient, I think, to authorize a change of the duties from the office of Secretary of State, and as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has stated, are not sufficient to occupy a moiety of his time. I believe that to confer these duties upon the Secretary of State would add greater dignity to the office. I shall, therefore, for the present, sustain the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga. I believe also, that there is among the people this desire to lessen the number of public offices, and to lessen the amount of patronage. I think with the statement of the gentleman from Onondaga, that if these offices of superintendent of the insurance department, and the superintendent of public instruction, were made especially to answer to the wants of begging and expectant politicians, the fact clothes them with a stigma and prejudice that would induce us to go a great way in dropping them.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] allow me now to reply briefly to the statement of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that the insurance department of this State was created to give an office to a political favorite. I do not wish that statement to go unchallenged. I undertake to say here upon my own responsibility as a member of this Convention, that that office was created because the necessities of this S ate positively required it, and that the losses which we sustained in our city of the whole of the insurance of which we were robbed through the neglect of the previous "old fogy" system of the State was pressed upon the Legislature, among other considerations, to create the department of insurance, and that the same cry came up from other parts of the State, and it was not merely a political office. And I will state further that the office of the superintendent of the insurance department and the department together have saved this State more than five millions of dollars, and probably more than ten millions.

Mr. ALVORD—I wish to say in connection with that, that the office of superintendent of insurance was created under a know-nothing organization for the purpose of rewarding a favorite of that party, but he having failed to come to time another man got it.

Mr. VAN COTT—I would like to inquire what the insurance department has to do with the question under consideration?

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I was stating when I gave way for my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], that the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], will clothe the office of Secretary of State with greater dignity and power and influence. I fear that these considerations, which undoubtedly swayed the State regardless of whichever party may have been in power in olden times, that the candidates for the position of Secretary of State should be men of eminent literary attainment and education, have been lost sight of. I believe that both parties in olden times—in the days of John A. Dix, and Azariah Flagg even—for I believe he once held that office—certainly John C. Spencer did—consulted these very important requisites, and by so consulting them, the office possessed greater dignity and character than it has since. A gentleman says, that the Secretaries of State were appointed then. Very well, we know the influence that controls appointments, and certainly men would be selected for appointment who possessed the qualifications of education and attainment, fitting them for the responsibilities of the bureau of education and public instruction. These are the brief considerations which induce me to support the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

Mr. HALE—It has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Education [Mr. Curtis] that this section was a unit; that he considered the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] as raising and involving the question as to the whole section. I think in that, the chairman of the Committee on Education is right—and if he was right, I shall be in order in discussing freely the question as to the propriety of abolishing the Board of Regents by this Convention, and substituting in its place a board of education, which is proposed to be created by this section. It is with very great reluctance that I rise to discuss this question, because I have been unable to make any preparation, and feel unable to follow the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] who is so familiar with the duties and constitution of the Board of Regents. Still, from what I am able to gather, both from his remarks, and other sources, I am of the opinion that it is entirely inexpedient for us in this Constitutional Convention, to make this change in the system of education in the State—a change which in the first place proposes to constitutionalize the office of superintendent of public instruction. I do not think that is necessary. I think so far as the qualifications of such an officer for performing the duties of the position are concerned, we have been just as well served since that office was created, as we would have been if it had been created by the Constitution instead of by act of the Legislature. I think, moreover, we were just as well served before that office was created, and when the Secretary of State had charge of the interests of education, and the public schools in this State, as we have been since; and looking upon it as a practical question, I think we are just as likely to be well served in the future as we have been in the past, if these duties are devolved upon the Secretary of State where they originally belonged, and for that reason I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. The theory upon which this section is framed, and upon which I suppose the committee have acted in proposing it, is that the educational interests of the State require that the common schools and the universities of this State should be under the control of a single board. The proposition is that a board of education, to be created under this section, shall have a general supervision of all the institutions of learning in the State. At present, as the members of this Convention are all aware, the public schools, and the union free schools, which last have some of the characteristics of academies, are under the control of the superintendent of public instruction, and the colleges and universities, so far as they are under the control of any authority, are under the supervision of the Board of Regents. I have listened with a great deal of interest, as I always do, to the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], but I have failed to discover, from any thing that he has said, any good reason for our doing away with the distinctions which at present exist between these two classes of educational institutions. I thought the gentleman a little inconsistent in professing the very great respect he did for the Board of Regents, of which he is a distinguished member. There seems to be, in the remarks he subsequently made, something of sarcasm, too much so to be congruous with professions of respect for that board, and self-congratulation that he was a member of it. Among other things, he quoted to us the remarks of the poet Halleck, who expressed an apprehension that he might become as ignorant of books as a president of a college, or a Regent of the University. He also said that the Board of Regents had fallen into disrepute; that intelligent men inquired what the board was; he said that it was a quiet body, and kept out of the newspapers—and so quiet as to lead many to suppose the board had ceased to exist. Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is any force in this citation from the poet Halleck and from "intelligent men" in several parts of the State, I do not see what the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] has to congratulate himself upon in being a member of so obsolete and disreputable a board, a board which seems to be a common subject of ridicule. It seems to me, if I was connected with an organization which I regarded as dead in public repute, and which was so open to the shafts of ridicule that ignorance of books was supposed to be a characteristic of its members, I should try to sever my connection with the body, rather than express regret that the interests of education required me to sacrifice such a position. But, Mr. Chairman, I think we can see, from the statement of the gentleman in regard to the character of the gentlemen in the Board of Regents is held, that these remarks which are aimed at it are rather ill-considered. We have three members of that board in this Convention. I am sure we should, none of us, who modestly regard ourselves as ignorant of books, compare ourselves in that particular at least with any self-depreciatory motive, with either of these members. Certainly, the distinguished gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] himself, and the other gentlemen composing that board who are members of this Convention, are rather remarkable for their knowledge of books than for their ignorance of them; and, so far as I know, the same remarks might well be applied to all the members of that board. It has been remarked by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] that since the organization of that board up to the present time it has been composed of gentlemen, many of whom are as distinguished for learning as are the members of that board who are also members of this Convention. Some names have been mentioned by the gentleman—distinguished names in the literature and scholarship of the country. I think the fact that the board is a quiet body, that it keeps out of the newspapers, although the result may be that the people have but little acquaintance with its labors and know nothing of what the members of that board do, and in their ignorance inquire whether such a board does still exist, is creditable to the board rather than a reason why we should, by constitutional provision, strike it out of existence, and thus verify the mistaken notion as to its want of vitality which these ignorant people may entertain. Now it is said that this board has fallen into disrepute among the people. What evidence have we of that? A memorial, a copy of which has been sent to me, and which I hold in my hand, and which I believe has been sent to every member of the Convention, I understand to have emanated from the office of public instruction, and have been extensively circulated. The communication is signed by several gentlemen from Albany, and it urges upon those to whom the memorial is sent that they should sign it and be sure and send it to the Convention. I think that gentlemen here are aware that great efforts were made by persons connected with the office of public instruction to procure a general subscription to this memorial in order that floods might come in upon this Convention. I am told that the number of petitions which have been sent in here is very small and considerably less than the number of remonstrances against the abolition of the Board of Regents which have come in from officers of institutions who have had the best opportunity to judge of the manner in which the Board of Regents have performed their duties. From academies in all parts of the State remonstrances have come to this Convention against the abolition of the board, and the petitions for its abolition which have come in from private individuals, have been fewer in number than the remonstrances against it. Let us look at some of the reasons that these gentlemen in Albany who signed this communication, state for abolishing this board. They say "The memorial is sent to you in the belief that you fully indorse the free school law of 1867, and desire the complete triumph of the free school system, applied as well to the higher as to the common schools." Now, Mr. Chairman, what has the free school law of 1867 to do with the Board of Regents? The effect of that law, as I understand it, was to abolish the rate bill, which existed in common schools of this State, so as to make them free, and so that parents who were in indigent circumstances, would not be obliged to pay a certain tax proportionate to the number of children they sent to the school, and that thereafter the public schools should be free to all the people of the State. This communication was signed by two of the clerks in the office of the superintendent of public instruction. Why do they desire the abolition of the Board of Regents?—for that is the prayer of the memorial. They say that they desire all to sign it "who desire the complete triumph of the free school system." There is nothing in the free school law of 1867 which renders it necessary to abolish the Board of Regents. If they mean that there is any thing in this section of the proposed article which provides that all the colleges in the State, and all the universities in the State are to be compelled to throw their doors open for pupils without charge, that is one thing; but that does not follow from the abolition of the Board of Regents. I think that the gentlemen of this Convention, however much they may be in favor of the free school system, are hardly prepared to say that there shall be no institutions hereafter higher than the public schools which shall charge tuition for scholars. Now, I am as much in favor of free common schools as any one can be. I believe that the State should provide a common school education for every child throughout this State. I doubt, however, whether it is the duty or the right of the State to tax the inhabitants to give any thing more than a good common school education to the children of this State, and I very much doubt whether such a provision would be a boon to the rising generation of this State. I know that what little education I was fortunate enough to obtain, I obtained only by my own exertions and those of my friends. But I do not think, however defective my education may have been, it is any more defective or any the less thorough than it would have been if the institutions which I attended had been obliged to throw their doors open without charge and I had been relieved of the necessity of obtaining a portion of my education through my own exertions. But unless that is the motive of the paragraph which I have been reading it is entirely delusive and has nothing at all to do with the subject. We have made provision by the laws of this State by which the children of this State can obtain not only a common school education but a good academical education at the expense of the public. The abolition of the Board of Regents will not render the system any more complete or any more effectual; and if the people think, or if any member of this Convention thinks it is desirable to go further to tax the property of the people of this State for the purpose of making eminent scholars of all the children of this State, and giving them opportunities for getting a thorough classical, scientific and collegiate education entirely at public expense, I would ask them whether it is not an experiment, and if so, whether the experiment should not first be tried under an act of the Legislature rather than a constitutional provision. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] argued that the powers and duties of the Regents of the University were small; that colleges were not obliged to apply to the board for their charter and that in many cases they did not apply, and he mentioned the Cornell University, where the application for a charter was not made to the Board of Regents but to the Legislature of the State.

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman will allow me, I made no especial mention of the Cornell University except in connection with the name of its president, Mr. White.

Mr. HALE—I misunderstood the gentleman. I supposed him to refer to the Cornell University, though perhaps he did not mention the name. I understood him to refer to that, because of the views he has expressed in regard to that institution when he has referred to it. At any rate, it is a fact that comes within general observation that that University did not apply to the Board of Regents, but to the Legislature for its charter. I say, if it is desirable that the Board of Regents shall have additional powers, and that the Legislature shall be prohibited from granting charters, that is one thing. The proposition made by the committee does not accomplish this. In addition to that, I would say in regard to the university which I have named—the Cornell University—no matter what powers have been conferred upon the Board of Regents, or the board of education proposed here, there were circumstances which are familiar to all, which would have prevented a charter being granted by any power short of the Legislature. A great portion of the funds of that institution came from the United States, and belonged to the State, and of course an application to the Legislature was necessary in order to get the grant in behalf of the institution. But whatever may be the want of power of that board in relation to chartering colleges, this question is not at all affected thereby. A board of education would be no better than a Board of Regents in this respect, unless a prohibition should be put into the Constitution against the Legislature chartering colleges. The age of the Board of Regents has been referred to—not that of the members of the board, but of the board itself. It has been characterized in the early part of our sessions as an "antiquated body," and the charge of "old fogyism" has been brought against its members. I do not feel called upon to defend the members of the Board of Regents from that charge, but I will admit that this board, as it is at present constituted, has certain "old fogy" attributes, which we do not see now-a-days as often as we would like to, and which I hope we shall not, by constitutional enactment, put out of existence. This board of gentlemen has, without any pay or reward whatever, performed the duties that are imposed upon it, and so far as I have been able to learn, has performed them well. I know it is exceedingly "old fogyish" for men to work in this generation without pay, and I find that the committee have guarded in the section against the continuance of such atrocious "old fogyism," by inserting in the section which they propose here a constitutional provision that "the term of office and compensation of members shall be prescribed by law." Therefore, if this section shall be adopted, we shall have one modern improvement; in place of officers who perform their duties without pay, we shall have a board of gentlemen who, I have no doubt, will stand up and draw handsome salaries without flinching. [Laughter.] I think the gentleman was a little unfortunate in some of the illustrations made use of by him, in arguing in favor of the retention of this article. He made a high and deserved eulogy upon certain colleges in the East and the West, and reflected somewhat (at least so it seemed to me), upon the institutions of learning in this State as compared with those of New England and Michigan. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the position and standing in this land of Harvard University and Yale College, or of the University of Michigan, are due to any system different from that pursued in the State of New York. Those colleges have, from causes which it is not necessary to reiterate, and many of which I should be unable to recite, grown strong. Yale College and Harvard University have the prestige of antiquity. They have been long established, have been liberally endowed, and have been admirably managed; and the consequence is, that they have their present position in the land. In regard to the University of Michigan, I cannot speak with knowledge of the facts except this, and I call the attention of this Convention to the fact that the State of Michigan is the only State in the Union, so far as I can discover, which by expressed constitutional provision, separates the functions of the board of education, which has charge of the common schools of the State, from those of the Regents of the University, who have charge of the higher institutions. Therefore, if there is any thing to be attributed to the State government in promoting the character of the University of Michigan, it is an argument in favor of retaining, by a constitutional provision, the Board of Regents, rather than in giving the whole control of the public schools, and academies and colleges, to one board. I may be mistaken in saying that Michigan is the only State which makes the separation, for I believe that Nevada, and one or two of the new States have a similar provision; but in the State of Michigan the board of education has charge of the public schools, and Normal School, while the Board of Regents have conferred upon it the authority over the University of the State. I have yet to learn, as I stated before, any good reason why, we, in framing a new Constitution for the State of New York, should decide that hereafter all these duties shall be performed by one and the same board. The gentleman spoke of the pride which teachers in this State have in their boys being admitted in the University at Michigan. He argued that this pride was not entirely on account of the happiness that they had in the assurance that the boys were well educated, but also in the still greater happiness they had in thus showing that they were such admirable teachers and educated their boys so well. Now, Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that most of these boys who have been admitted to the University of Michigan from this State have been educated in the academies of this State, in those institutions which are under the control of this "old fogy," unpaid board. So that I think this commendable pride which the teachers of the academies in this State have in their great success in so training children that they could be admitted into the University of Michigan, is an argument which favors the existing arrangement in regard to the academies of this State, and which shows that under the regents they have attained a respectable degree of perfection. So far as the name of this corporation is concerned, I do not think it is a very important question, nor one that should influence the members of this body. A good deal of stress is laid in these memorials upon the asserted fact that we have no university in this State; and the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] has shown clearly, I think, that there is not a university here in the sense in which Oxford and Cambridge are universities; but it is a name applied to all the colleges of this State so far as they are under the supervision of this Board of Regents. They are, indeed, to a small extent, but still they are to some extent, under the supervision of this board, and to that extent I can see no great impropriety in calling this aggregate of colleges a university. Of course they do not constitute a university like that of Oxford or Cambridge. They have not the same unity; they have not the same prestige and connection with each other that the colleges have which constitute the great universities of Cambridge and Oxford in England. But in so far as they are under the supervision of this Board of Regents I cannot perceive any great impropriety in calling this aggregation of the institutions of learning a university. But this is a matter of very little importance. The name was given to it by the Legislature. If the people, through their representatives in the Legislature, are dissatisfied with the name, it is very easy to change it; and if there is any defect in the system as it at present exists, if any amendments are necessary to confer greater powers upon the board, if the board should have greater authority or less authority, the Legislature can make the necessary changes in this regard, and conform it to whatever the people may require. But I do not think the people require that this board shall be abolished. I do not think that the number of petitions which have been brought in here shows any desire of that kind on the part of the people. I do not think that the remonstrances which have been sent in, coming from all the sources whence they do come—from that class of men in the State who are most familiar with the operation of this board—show this, and I think that this Convention should be very careful before it undertakes to strike this board out of existence. I do not advocate the continuance of this board by express provision, but I protest against our undertaking to abolish it. If it is a board which should go out of existence, let the body which created it abrogate it. The Legislature has abstained from the exercise of the power which it has to abolish this board for a period of over seventy years, and I think it has wisely so abstained, and, as a member of this Convention, I am in favor of letting it alone. The gentleman closed his eloquent remarks by a parting word to the distinguished and venerable body of which he so deeply felt the honor of being a member, and of which I may say he is a very distinguished ornament. I have only to say that his address of farewell was rather premature, and to express the hope that he may yet have many years of delight in the convocations of the Regents of the University, and that it may be a long time before he will find it necessary to bid that venerable institution a final farewell.

Mr. KINNEY—I do not rise to discuss this question, but to protest against the idea suggested by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] that a vote upon this amendment to the section is a test vote in regard to the other paragraphs in it.

Mr. HALE—I merely mentioned that as an apology for discussing the whole subject. Of course it does not necessarily involve the whole question.

Mr. KINNEY—While I shall vote for this paragraph as it stands, I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], for if there is any subject in the State of New York which should be put into the Constitution; if there is any thing that should be constitutionalized because of its great importance, it is the all-important, overriding interest of education. Sir, I regard it as being paramount to every other interest in this State. I regard this article as being more important to the people of the State, to every man, woman and child in the State than any other article that has been under consideration in this Convention. Yet, sir, we can constitutionalize the canals, the ditches upon which farmers float their truck to market, but when we talk about constitutionalizing the very basis of the government, the foundation upon which it rests—the education of the people—we find gentlemen who oppose it, and argue in favor of leaving it always in the hands of an ever changing, ever fluctuating Legislature. Now, I am in favor of making the subject of education the subject of a distinct and separate department in our State government; a department having the education of the children of the State under its control and supervision, and having nothing else, but keeping aloof from all the other departments, which are, to a great extent, political in their character, or at least more so than the department of education.

Mr. WAKEMAN—The amendment now under consideration I believe is that of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], to strike out from this section the office of the superintendent of public instruction. Now, Mr. Chairman, as has been well said by the gentleman last on the floor, is there any one subject of more importance than that of education? If the question were to be submitted to the members of this Convention individually, and each one of us called upon to say what subject ranks higher than any other as connected with the welfare of the people, with the welfare of the State, with the welfare of mankind, the answer of each one would be, education. This being so, I ask, sir, if in this great State, if in this Convention, where we have been assembled for months to revise and amend the Constitution, that shall be worthy of our great State, it is not right that we should put into the Constitution a provision for a head of that great department? I ask if it is not due to the interests of education in this State, and also in other States which may hereafter call like Conventions, and which will have our proceedings before them, as we have now the proceedings of other States before us, that we should recognize in the body of this Constitution this chief officer of the department of education, a superintendent of public instruction? But it is said that the duties of this office can be performed by some other department. That may be true, sir, but if we admit that as a reason why this officer should not be created, it is an equally good reason to be applied in other instances, and we might say the same thing in reference to a great many other departments of the government. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is right, and proper, and necessary, that we should here put into the body of this Constitution a provision for the head of this department, a provision that shall show the estimation in which we hold this subject. Now, sir, this section does not go so far as I have indicated here; it only recognizes the fact of a superintendent of public instruction, who is to constitute one of the board of education, leaving it to legislation to prescribe the special duties of the superintendent of education. A few days ago I had the honor to submit some remarks in reference to the appointment of the chief justice of our court of appeals. I insisted then, that in view of our position as a State, we ought to have a chief justice who should be known as such, and that it should be known who he was. So now, sir, I insist that we shall constitutionalize a head of the department of public instruction. I believe that in our part of the State, at least, the people feel that the office of superintendent of public instruction has been beneficial to the common schools of the country, and they believe that education should be made a specialty, and should constitute a department of the government. But how can it be so if you devolve the duties of the superintendent of public instruction upon the Secretary of State? His title of office does not indicate any thing of the kind, nay, the very title of his office and the duties connected with it, preclude the idea that education could be made a specialty with him. It would be simply a bureau in that office. Now, I am not prepared to speak on the subject generally of the change proposed here in regard to the Regents of the University, but it seems to me, that at this age of the world, and at this day, we should have a board of education in this State, and but one board which should have control over the entire matter. Now, sir, it is difficult to define the powers of this ancient institution, at least from what has been said by one of the honorable members of this Convention. It appears that the Board of Regents have not as much power as the trustees of a public school. Now, ought we not to constitute one board of seven members as recommended by this committee, and make it their special duty to take charge of this particular branch of our government, and can we not in that way secure the discharge of those duties with more vigor and power than this Board of Regents can possibly discharge them? It seems to me, from my present light on the subject, we should establish this board of education, in which there should be a superintendent of public instruction known as such, and that we cannot dispense with such an officer—an officer who has performed his duties so well, according to the powers that have been given him in the past. Certainly sir, I have no hostility to the Board of Regents. I respect and revere the names of the men who are members of that institution, but so far as the remonstrances against abolishing that board are concerned I know where they have come from. The academies that have received a share of the school fund, have kindly remonstrated against abolishing the Board of Regents, and they do not know where they will be placed hereafter. But I am satisfied that this board of education which it is proposed to create, will take care of the schools of the State. I am opposed to striking out this section, and with the present light I have upon the subject, I think I shall vote for the proposition substantially as reported to this Convention by the Committee on Education.

Mr. ALVORD—Inasmuch as my proposition has not been acted upon, I desire to withdraw it and to substitute the following:

"The Secretary of State shall be superintendent of public education, and he shall as such have such powers and perform such duties as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I care very little, Mr Chairman, whether this amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] be adopted or rejected. I am one of those that believe that the Secretary of State has ample time for the discharge of these duties. It is notorious that the duties of his office now occupy but very little of his time; that that office is a mere clerkship, the duties of which are discharged by his deputies, except the services that he performs at the canal board and upon other boards, which occupy but very little of his time. I believe the duties of the office of superintendent of common schools were never more faithfully discharged than they were under Mr. Secretary Dix and Mr. Secretary Flagg and Mr. Secretary Randall, and until this day the decisions of General Dix, as superintendent of that department, are quoted with respect everywhere, and as the highest authority in every portion of the State. But I care very little whether this amendment be adopted or not. I think it would be wise to reduce rather than to add to the number of salaried officers of the State, as it is proposed by another part of this section to do. But the discussion has assumed a much wider range. I came in when the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] was making his eloquent remarks in favor of the abolition of the Board of Regents, which is subsequently provided for in the section under discussion. Now, I have known something of that Board of Regents. I served as a member of it for ten years, and I have been pretty well acquainted with its operations since I resigned. I am one of those who believe that the duties of that board have always been most faithfully and most successfully discharged; and I cannot at all concur with the remarks which have been made leading to a different conclusion. The members of that board, chosen as they are from time to time by joint ballot of the Legislature, represent all the changing and varying parties of the State. The action of that board has never been partisan. It has been connected with no rings, no speculations, no attempts to make money out of a public duty. There is not a man living that dares to stand up in this Convention or elsewhere, and charge any thing different upon any member that ever served in that board. Its duties have been most faithfully discharged, and singly with a view to the public good, and they have been discharged without compensation. It is said to be an antiquated institution, and my colleague [Mr. Harris] in one of the first days of our session, spoke of "that antiquated institution, the Board of Regents." Aye, it is antiquated, antiquated in one respect, that it is the only institution left in this State where public duties are discharged from merely patriotic motives, and without compensation. I know it is an antiquated and obsolete idea that a man of this day should think of serving the State, or of serving even the sacred cause of education, without compensation. But, sir, the Board of Regents not only serve without compensation, but many a month is spent by its members in the course of the year in traveling all over this State to visit the colleges and academies, incurring large expenses without drawing one dollar of compensation from the State. I remember that in one single year, when a member of that board. I traveled twelve hundred miles in the discharge of the duties connected with it, and I never charged the expenses to the State. I could have done so, but such is not the practice of the members of the board. They have a higher compensation in the consciousness of doing a public good. But it is said that the institution is not successful. I challenge a full and fair discussion of that proposition. I say, on the contrary, that there is not in this Union a State where the interests of education are so well cared for, and so carefully and successfully fostered as they are in this great State—the Empire State, not only in power and numbers, but in education also. We have at this moment twenty-three colleges in successful operation. We have from two hundred to two hundred and fifty academies also in successful operation. These institutions afford to the rising generation of the State the most ample means for a thorough and complete collegiate or academical education. But it is said by the eloquent gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], that there are two colleges in the Eastern States that eclipse ours, and one in Michigan. Far be it from me to detract at all from the just credit that belongs to these colleges. I have every personal reason to respect and regard them. But is it fair to compare our colleges with Harvard and Yale when we consider the great advantages which they have had over us. Those venerable institutions have been in existence for more than two hundred years, and during all that time have been fostered, aye cherished dearly, by all around them as the favored pets of the rich men of the States in which they are placed, and in that way they have been enriched beyond what gentlemen would believe, if I should state it upon this floor. During the last hundred years the bequests that have been poured into the treasuries of these colleges have been most bountiful, and there is not a year elapses in which you do not hear of large contributions being made to them by wills and gifts. They have become so rich, sir, that they can control advantages which other less favored institutions cannot. But it is said also that the State of Michigan has a university more prosperous than any of our institutions in this State. My friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] should not forget that the University of Michigan was planned and carried out and brought to the height of its glory by a graduate of Union, Dr. Tappan, a classmate that I should not readily forget.

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman will remember, I expressly mentioned that fact.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I did not hear it. Union College in this State lays claim to the credit of having educated the gentleman who organized and gave reputation to Michigan University. But, sir, why is it that the University of Michigan has so far outstripped the colleges of this State? That institution has had most abundant means supplied to it, not of course in that new country from private bequests such as in Massachusetts and Connecticut have enriched Harvard and Yale, but from the bounty of the State in the immense grants of public lands of great value that have been made; grants so bountiful that the institution has been made free; and that is the secret of its vast success. Although its collegiate students do not exceed in number those of some institutions in our own State, yet it has now some four or five hundred medical students and three hundred law students attending its lectures; and my worthy colleague [Mr. Harris] would by no means be willing to admit, nor can I in his behalf admit, that those three hundred law students were attracted to that institution by any greater ability on the part of the instructors there, than is to be found in our own humbler institutions here. It is because education there is free, because students can go and drink at the fountain of knowledge "without money and without price," that the Michigan University is overflowing with numbers. Give the same wealth that Harvard and Yale and Michigan have, give that wealth to any one of our institutions, and I will place it by the side of either one of those, and I will hazard my reputation that soon it will not be far behind them in the glorious race in which they are all engaged. Why does the gentleman from Richmond decry the institution known as the Board of Regents of the University? It is antiquated: so are many other things. The Christian religion itself would fall under that condemnation. Why does he seek to remove gentlemen who are willing to serve without pay, to give their time and talents to the State without compensation, and to appoint a board that shall be political in its character, and that shall be paid out of the treasury of the State? Is it wise to add to the pensioners upon the public treasury, when we have already, and can have the services of those who are willing to discharge the duty without compensation? But it is said that the public call for this change. Now, sir, the history of that call has been given already. It originated with a few very worthy gentlemen in this city. I have before me a copy of their circular, sent out in stereotyped editions. We are told that petitions have been sent in for the abolition of the Board of Regents. How many? I have been at the pains since I come into this room to-day to inquire. Before our adjournment in September, twenty-six petitions were presented in favor of the abolition of the Board of Regents, and fifty remonstrances against it. Up to this moment, more remonstrances have been presented against the abolition of the board, than petitions for its abolition.

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS—I should like to ask him, as the petitions are declared to have proceeded from the department of public instruction, whether the remonstrances did or did not proceed from the Board of Regents.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Very likely; but my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] ought to know better than myself—he is a member of the board. [Laughter.] I am not, and I give him the benefit of any statement he makes on that subject. Now, look at this a little further. Not one college in the State has petitioned for the abolition of the Board of Regents; not one of the two hundred and fifty academies in the State has petitioned for the abolition of the Board of Regents. Ten of these colleges have remonstrated against its abolition, and more than fifty academies have so remonstrated. All these are institutions especially interested in the question, whether they shall be governed and controlled by a Board of Regents, or by a political board authorized by this body. I have a list here which has been handed me, of the colleges that have so remonstrated. It includes the University of the city of New York, the College of St. Francis Xavier, St. John's College, St. Stephen's College, Hamilton College, Hobart College, Genesee College, and Madison University. There lies before me the last annual report of the Board of Regents. It is said that this board has not power nor sufficient control over the colleges and academies to make itself useful, and to build up a good system of education. Look at the report itself—it is its own monument of their labors and their success. It contains the report and annual statement of every college in this State, and of nearly all its academies, just such statements as we want if we are to judge of their progress and success. Why, sir, a few weeks since, a gentleman distinguished in the literary annals of the old world, the proprietor of McMillan's Magazine, so well known everywhere, came to this country, and when in this city asked that he might look at the report of the Board of Regents, as he desired to make himself acquainted with the system of education in this State. That report was handed him. He studied it diligently and faithfully, and he afterward said that he had looked upon it with amazement, and that there was not another country upon the earth where such a duty was discharged so faithfully, and that nowhere else was a system of education so successful as this had been here. Pray, why is it not a success, when the means of education are brought to all in the State in the common schools (not of course under this department), the colleges and the academies? Ah! but says my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], we find a great many young gentlemen belonging to the State of New York being educated at other institutions, at Yale and Harvard. Yes, sir, we do. The gentleman must consider that there are a great number to be educated in this State with its four millions of people. Let him go to the colleges in this State, and he will find young men there to be educated who have come from the South and the West, aye, and sometimes from the East. I refer him to a single institution in this city, with which my distinguished associate, Judge Harris, is connected, where he will find that out of a list of perhaps one hundred students, three-quarters of them are from other States of this Union, and some from right alongside of Harvard University. It furnishes no argument, therefore, against us, that our young men, for some good reason, or some accidental reason, perhaps occasionally seek education elsewhere. It has been said, sir, and I return to it, that this Board of Regents has not power enough for the successful discharge of the duties devolved upon them. Then give them more power; and that duty belongs to the Legislature. The Legislature created the board, it controls it, and it can abolish it if it will. But what power would you give them? An absolute despotic power, as in a military government? That they do not desire, they do not need. They cannot accomplish the desired results with any such power as that. Have they not all the power they want? They have the power of visitation. They visit the colleges and the academies when they please. They call for reports, and do they not get them? They do, sir, with but very few exceptions. Their report of last year shows how general and almost universal has been the response. But if they want more power, give it to them. Thus far it has not been a despotic power that that board has exercised. Its power has been exercised in kindness, and in that very kindness we see the secret of its success. It has the distribution annually of forty thousand dollars to the academies; it distributes twelve thousand dollars for the education of teachers, and three thousand for the purchase of books and apparatus, and the very expectation on the part of each academy that it will receive its share of this literature fund, is a stimulus to induce it not only to come clear up to the standard and requirements of the board, but to endeavor to surpass them. The board had power enough, sir, to bring these educational institutions of ours up to their present high condition of efficiency. Why, there is one single institution, if I may call it such, connected with this board which has accomplished wonders here. I refer to what is called the University Convocation. Every year learned men from the colleges and academies in this State, assemble here at Albany to discuss together the best means of instruction; and the most gratifying results have already been found to flow from this meeting. That institution is not a very antiquated one. It has only existed for a few years, but it has proved such a complete success that I have no doubt that hereafter it will be permanently established. For myself, sir, I believe it is our true policy to leave this subject entirely alone. I believe that the Legislature have ample power, supreme power over the whole subject of education. They have always exercised that power without any interference or control on the part of the Constitution, and I prefer to leave the power with them still. I do not know why this body should be called upon to abolish the Board of Regents; which was not created by the Constitution. Created as it was by the Legislature, if the public shall call for a change, the Legislature can make it, and then if it is found to be a mistake, it will not be out of their power to correct the mistake. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the public will sanction the change which is here proposed. I do not believe that they have called for it. I think it unwise in us to meddle with it; and when my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] concluded his eloquent remarks, he could not refrain from singing in solemn and beautiful notes his own death song, in view of his approaching official dissolution as a member of this board. He spoke in tones also solemn of the wreck which was about to be made; the ship that was to be stranded, in which he was a passenger with the rest. He saw around him the raging billows, and the scattered spars, and the regents (of whom he was one) struggling in the briny deep, rari nantes in gurgite vasto. I trust, sir, that this is only a picture of the imagination, and that it will pass by as an idle dream, but if this wreck should happen, and he makes this great sacrifice for the public good, or rather for the good of gentlemen who are to be appointed to office on good salaries he must not forget that he was the pilot that directed the ship upon that treacherous shore; he will not be able to excuse himself as did Palinurus of old, that he fell into slumber, for he has steered the ship upon the rocks with his eyes wide open; and I can tell him that if there should be a wreck he may well hang up his dripping garments in the temple of Neptune as a votive offering for his escape, for the people will hold him responsible for the great wrong that he has done.

Mr. GOULD—I desire to ask the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] in what section of this article he finds any abolition of the Board of Regents of the University?

Mr. ALVORD—All the way through.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—My friend sitting back of me says all the way through, and he knows better than I do, for I have only just come in.

Mr. ALVORD—If the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] will allow me, I will read the last paragraph. It is that, "Such board shall have general supervision of all the institutions of learning in this State," and the chairman of the committee also says so.

Mr. GOULD—Suppose, for instance, this whole article is adopted by the people and goes into operation as a part of the Constitution, I want to know if under existing laws the Board of Regents of the University will not still have the custody of the geological collection, whether they will not still have control of the State library?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I do not think they will have control even of the mastodon. [Laughter.]

Mr M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope it is the sentiment of this Convention that it is expedient to hold sessions in the afternoon, and for the purpose of moving a session at four o'clock, or at some earlier hour this afternoon, I move that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I do not propose to go into the discussion which was entered upon by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], because that subject is not now properly before the committee. I rise only to say a word with reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. That is, to abolish the office of superintendent of schools, and transfer the duties of that officer to the Secretary of State. I hope, sir, that this amendment will not prevail. It is said that the Secretary of State has not sufficient occupation. We know that he is a member of several State boards, in addition to the ordinary duties pertaining to his office. The superintendent of schools of this State should have no other duty to perform except his duty as such superintendent. He should go from county to county, from town to town, from school district to school district, entering the various schools in the State, and seeing with his own eyes the practical working of our common school system; and when that officer shall have done this, he will have performed the duty which the people expect of him, and he will not have been idle. There is not a member of this Convention who does not know that the Secretary of State never would perform this duty of visitation which I regard as the most important duty of the superintendent of schools. If that system of visitation and inspection of the practical workings of our system is to be abandoned, restore this power to the office of Secretary of State; but if it is not to be abandoned, retain the superintendent of common schools, and give him no other duties than those which belong to that office, and secure his whole time and attention for the visitation, and care, and custody of the schools.

The question was put on the substitute of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared lost.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I move to strike out from the section commencing at line seven with the word "the," down to and including the word "law" in the seventeenth line. I do not intend or hope, Mr. Chairman, to interest this committee as they have been interested by the very scholarly and eloquent address of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], or of the other eloquent gentlemen who have addressed the committee upon this subject. But, it is perhaps well that some common mind should call attention to the remarks that have fallen from those gentlemen for the purpose of ascertaining what the trouble is, where the difficulty is, that is to be remedied by the action of this committee. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], first complains of the name of this corporation or board. With due deference to the great learning of that gentleman, I suggest that the name is strictly a proper one. I know sir, that the term "University" in its generally received sense, means a collection of colleges in one place, or it means a single institution in which all the various branches of learning are taught. But if you will consider this State as a place, the various educational institutions of the State, the colleges and academies where the various branches of learning are taught, make up the University of the State. The Legislature more than eighty years ago at the suggestion of Alexander Hamilton, adopted this term, and it has never been criticised until now, and I think the gentleman should have hesitated with such high authority, acquiesced in for so many years, before pronouncing the name as meaningless. The board is charged with the incorporation of colleges and academies, and other institutions of learning under such general regulations as they may from time to time establish. They are charged with the visitation and general supervision of the colleges and academies, with the preparation of suitable forms for the use of such institutions, and with the reception and examination of reports of the colleges and academies and with the equitable distribution of the general appropriations for the benefit of incorporated academies, and the preparation of an annual report to the Legislature of the condition of the various institutions subject to their visitation. They have had charge of the State library since 1846, and during that time the number of volumes has been increased from ten thousand to seventy-four thousand. They are also made the trustees of the cabinet of natural history, and they have the supervision of the State Normal school. Here are powers enough, properly exercised, and duties enough, to occupy the attention of this board for a great portion of the year. This care and supervision is exercised not simply at the annual meeting of the board, but at the meeting of the committees of the board and through their officers; and the gentleman did not state the whole truth when he said that in the exercise of their powers they simply sit still and receive the reports of the colleges and academies. Sir, in this report of last year for which I suppose the gentleman is in part responsible, it is stated that more than sixty institutions of learning were personally visited by some of the members of this board, and various other things are stated to have been done by the members of the board, which I shall not now enumerate—all going to show that the board not only have these extensive powers, but that they exercise them and exercise them well. If they have not sufficient power, if there is any thing remaining to be done that should be done for these institutions of learning and that this board might do if it had increased powers, let the Legislature give the board additional powers, and if it should do so I have no doubt that those powers will be exercised by the Board of Regents and their duties will be discharged in the future as ably, as faithfully and as well as the powers that they have had in the past have been exercised. But what is the difficulty that the gentleman complains of? The fault, and if there is any other, I ask to have it stated—the fault is, that other colleges outside of our State are superior to any institution within our State. This, I understand to be the sole fault found, the sole complaint made by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] in his very learned and eloquent speech. That there are three institutions, two in New England and one in Michigan which are better and more prosperous than any institution in the State of New York. Now, sir, that is probably the fact, but is it the fault of the Board of Regents? They have exercised the powers conferred upon them by the Legislature to the fullest extent. If any new impetus is to be given to our institutions of learning in this State, give the board additional powers, and I have no doubt that they will be properly exercised, and that the colleges and academies will get the full benefit of them. In the board there are some members who have occupied that position for more than thirty years, men elected in 1833. The board is made up of men elected by different Legislatures of different political views, and most of them are learned and scholarly men, not entering actively into the political feelings of the day, and I have have no doubt that these learned and wise men will exercise any new powers that may be given them as well and faithfully as they have used their present powers, and quite as beneficially for our institutions of learning as any new board appointed by the Legislature. Does the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], hope that in the selection of this new board, the appointments would be controlled by the influences he has spoken of to-day? Is the millenium at hand? Will a political Legislature appoint this board of education without regard to politics? Why, sir, the very provision that the members of this new board are to have compensation, determines the matter and answers the question. However much members of the Legislature might desire to bring about such a result, however much the majority of the Legislature might desire to do so, we know that when a party claims the offices which pay, the Legislature cannot and do not refuse to hear them, but are compelled to make appointments upon considerations very different from those which have been suggested by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. It has been said here, sir, that the opposition to this section has grown out of the efforts of the superintendent of schools in this city. Now, I want to tell the gentleman from Richmond, if he has not heard it before, that there is a suspicion abroad in regard to the object of this section, which I very much regret. I rejoice with the gentleman that the Legislature in its wisdom has determined to keep this congressional fund in a single place, and to build an institution which shall be worthy of the State, and which I trust and hope will be not only the equal of the New England colleges, and of the College of Michigan, but will be superior to either of them. But, sir, there is a suspicion abroad that the motive of this article comes, not from the office of the superintendent of schools, but that learned and scholarly men having a great interest in the Cornell University, fear something from the Regents of the University, or hope for something from a new board and that this is the motive which actuates them inside and outside the Convention in their attempts to destroy the Board of Regents.

Digitized by Google

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman will allow me. I wish to say that I hear this now for the first time.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I hope that suspicion is baseless, I trust it is baseless; but when it is remembered that this Board of Regents has performed its duties for more than eighty years in this State without incurring even criticism until the present time, and when it is remembered what a deep interest is felt by many gentlemen, and properly felt in this new university, this suspicion has perhaps not unnaturally arisen.

Mr. GOULD—I am authorized to say, sir, that the Cornell University has not the slightest jealousy whatever of the Board of Regents, and that for anything that the Cornell University desire, they would just as soon that the Board of Regents should be continued forever as not.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I am very glad to hear that statement, because I am a friend of the Cornell University. I voted last week to devote the congressional fund to that institution, and I am very glad to hear that there is no hostility, on the part of those interested, to the Board of Regents.

Mr. GOULD—It is utterly baseless.

Mr. CURTIS—And I would add, sir, to what my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould] has said, that from my personal knowledge of the feeling of the president of the Cornell University, this suspicion is entirely baseless, entirely so.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I rejoice that it is so. But, sir, let me ask again, what is to be gained by the establishment of this new board? The present board has done the work of incorporating the academies and colleges, and has had the general supervision of those institutions, and has had charge of various other matters pertaining to education in this State for eighty years. It is now proposed to abolish this board, and to establish a new one to be composed of seven officers, to be appointed next week or next year by the Legislature of this State. This new board, however, even if made up of gentlemen appointed for their learning and ability, and not for political reasons, will be entirely inexperienced in the matter of the practical working of our educational institutions throughout the State. They will not have the practical knowledge or wisdom on that subject that the men composing the present Board of Regents have; and if the gentleman was called upon to make a list of those best qualified to fill the office, he would find it hard to go outside the present board to get the seven members of the new one. As a member of the Legislature of this State (if he were one) acting upon the responsibility of his oath of office, if he had to select the members of this board which is proposed by this article to be created, I think he would hesitate long before he would go outside of these nineteen men to find every member of the new board. For these reasons, sir, I hope the motion I have had the honor to make will be successful, and that we will retain the superintendent of public schools, whose duty it shall be to visit the schools and inspect their practical working. I trust that this Board of Regents existing now for more than eighty years, and which up to this time has performed its duties so as not even to provoke a criticism, and which has performed them without compensation, will not be superseded by this provision of a new board composed of members who are to be paid for the work which they shall do.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock and again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Education, Mr. PROSSER, of Erie, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on the motion of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] to strike out of the fourth section all after the sixth line.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I simply wish to add to what I was saying when the hour of recess arrived, that this is hardly the time, with our present indebtedness and consequent taxation, to establish a new board, consisting of seven members, whose services and time should be devoted to the cause, and must be paid for, and thus incur a large indebtedness for what now costs the State little or nothing. The Regents of the University have the care of these colleges and academies; they charter them, care for them, visit them, receive their reports, and do all the other work which it is proposed that this new board shall do, except the charge of the common schools, at an expense of not more than fifteen hundred dollars a year to the State. This new board would cost the State thousands of dollars, because men competent to this position, devoting their time to this work, could not be obtained without adequate compensation, adding to their compensation the other expenses, the expense of clerks and the expenses that grow up in and around such a board, the sum of thirty to fifty thousand dollars a year, instead of fifteen hundred dollars, will be the consequence. Now, I say that this Convention should hesitate before introducing this class of officers into the Constitution, at such a great increase of expense to the State.

Mr. SMITH—I regret, sir, very much that through the neglect of a public carrier, I was prevented from arriving in the city this morning in season to listen to the discussion of this question, a discussion which I am told was very interesting. I regret it because it deprived me of the pleasure and information which I should have derived from listening to that discussion. I regret it also because in submitting a few suggestions on this question very briefly, I may be in danger of traveling over ground which has been better occupied by other persons before me. Since this report has come in I have been looking for some reason why that ancient and honorable corporation known as the Regents of the University should be at once and forever annihilated; but I have looked in vain. It has been said, in substance, by those who favor the abolition of that board, that it is but slightly connected with education in the State, and that it is of but very little service to the cause of education. It may be that some members of this Convention have not given particular attention to the history, organization and functions of that corporation, and it may not be improper, therefore, for me briefly to glance at them. By so doing we shall better understand the question and be better able to decide whether we ought to adopt this article which abolishes that board. It is known to many, and should be known to all, that it is not a constitutional corporation; it is the creature of statute. It was organized originally by an act of the Legislature of the State, which was passed at its session in 1784. It is entitled "An act for granting certain privileges to the college heretofore called King's College and altering the name and the charter thereof, and erecting a university within this State." This act was amended in November of the same year, and was followed and superseded by another act, passed April 13th, 1787, which was entitled, "An act to institute a university in this State, and for other purposes therein mentioned." I may remark here that the draft of that act, it is supposed was prepared by that wise and profound statesman Alexander Hamilton, whose life and services form a part of the historic glory of our State and of the nation. This board, as now constituted, is composed of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, and Superintendent of Public Instruction, as ex officio members, and nineteen other members chosen by the Legislature. It is provided by law that they may be removed by a concurrent resolution of the Senate and the Assembly. No compensation is allowed them for services, but their actual and necessary expenses while engaged in the performance of official duties are paid them by an appropriation made by the Legislature. The officers of the board are a chancellor, a vice-chancellor, a treasurer, a secretary, and assistant secretary, who are appointed by, and hold their office at the pleasure of the regents. It should be remembered, however, that the secretary and assistant secretary receive salaries for the payment of which annual appropriations are made by the Legislature. The regents are required by law to hold annual meetings at the Senate Chamber in Albany, and they may also hold other meetings during the year as their business shall require. This, in brief, then, is the history and the organization of the board. Now let us inquire what are its duties and functions, to some of which I will call the attention of the committee, for the purpose of seeing whether its connection with the subject of education is slight, as has been said by the memorialists who ask for its abolition. In the first place, Mr. Chairmain, the board is charged with the duty of incorporating colleges, academies, and other institutions of learning in the State, and exercising over them a general supervision. I should suppose, sir, that this was not a very slight connection with education, and the interests of education in the great State of New York. These institutions, these academies and colleges, are responsible to this board for the fulfillment of the conditions of their charters, and they are required to make annual reports of their financial and educational condition to the regents. All who are familiar with the subject understand that these reports are required to be very minute, and very comprehensive, embracing the entire condition of the institution, represented financially and educationally, its books, its apparatus, its course of studies, its membership, and every thing which pertains to the interest of the institution; and it is required to be verified by the oath of the president of the board of trustees. There are in the State of New York under the supervision, and subject to the visitation of the regents, two hundred and twenty academies, and I think about thirty colleges, literary and medical; and yet it is said that their connection with education is very slight. These institutions have a capital of many millions of dollars, and over this the regents exercise a supervision. Moreover, the members of the board visit these colleges at commencement seasons, and the academies at their examination periods, encourage them by their presence, and report to the board, so that the regents are kept advised in regard to the state of education, and the condition of all the institutions under their care throughout the State. The regents in turn make their report every year to the Legislature so that the people, through the legislative body, are thus made acquainted with the condition and circumstances of all these institutions of learning in the State. In addition to this, the regents are required to, and do, apportion among the academies of the State annually, forty thousand dollars, from the income of the literature fund, and about eighteen thousand dollars more to academies appointed by them to instruct classes in the science of common school teaching; and yet it is said that their connection with education, and the interests of education in the State is very slight! So says the heading of the petitions that have poured in upon us in floods since we have been in session, praying for the abolition of the board. The distribution of the literature fund is made in pursuance of the provisions of law which require that it shall be proportioned "to the number of pupils in each seminary, who for four months during the preceding year, shall have pursued their classical studies or the higher branches of English education, or both." Within the last few years the regents have instituted a new and rigid system of examinations for the purpose of determining the number of pupils entitled to the distribution. These examinations are conducted in writing, and are very rigid, comprehensive and searching. I will venture to say that it would trouble many of the learned men in this body to answer some of the questions that are submitted in writing, and to which the pupils are required to furnish written answers in a given number of minutes. There are three examinations each year of this character, conducted by a committee of learned and competent men, appointed by the trustees of the institution. They are required to make their reports to the regents, who are thus enabled to distribute the fund in accordance with the spirit of the law. The system, also, stimulates exertion on the part of pupils, and tends to elevate the standard of scholarship in our academies. To show further that the regents have something to do, and do something, it may be remarked that they have eight standing committees, some of which have frequent sessions, and the committee on the State Library, I am told, meets every Monday morning; and yet it is said they do nothing. They also have the right of conferring degrees above that of master of arts, upon such persons as in their opinion, are entitled to them by their attainments in science or literature, degrees similar to those conferred by the universities in Europe. I understand, however, that they have been very careful and reserved in the exercise of this prerogative. They have not in this respect followed the example of some of our colleges, whose honors are dispensed so liberally and indiscriminately, as to render them exceedingly cheap. I am informed that the degree of doctor of laws has been conferred upon eleven persons only, that of doctor of philosophy upon three, and doctor of literature upon three only, since their organization. This certainly speaks well for their wisdom and prudence. In addition to these duties imposed by the law which created the body, the Legislature has from time to time devolved other duties upon them. In 1844 they were constituted trustees of the State Library. At that time the State Library contained about ten thousand volumes, which were stowed away in a couple of rooms in the upper part of the Capitol, out of sight and out of the reach pretty much, I believe, of the community, so that it could not be found without the aid of an experienced guide. But that library now numbers over seventy-four thousand volumes; and it includes a law department which, I am informed is not exceeded by any law library in the country, so far as American law is concerned. It also contains standard works in almost all departments of science and literature. It has, as every one knows who has visited it, maps, charts, manuscripts, medals and coins, of great value and interest; and I believe that it has nearly outgrown the building that was erected in 1852 for its accommodation. In 1845 the regents were constituted trustees of the State Cabinet of Natural History and the historical and antiquarian collection connected with it; and this, I am told, has greatly increased in extent, interest and value, since it came under their supervision and management. The State Normal School, too, which is regarded by many as a very important institution, is under the joint management of the regents and the superintendent of public instruction. And these "old fogies" were the first to inaugurate the system of normal instruction in the State. In 1835 they established departments for the instruction of teachers of common schools, in one academy in each of the eight senatorial districts of the State. This was done, I believe, in pursuance of the recommendation of General John A. Dix, who was then superintendent of common schools. The system thus inaugurated has grown until there are in the neighborhood of ninety academies in the State, where students are educated in the science of common-school teaching. The regents annually appropriate to the various normal schools, teachers' departments in these ninety academies, and to teachers' institutes over one hundred thousand dollars; and yet it is said they have but very slight connection with public education! They have also, Mr. Chairman, been charged with the management, on behalf of the State, of a system of international and State exchanges, by which official publications of other States and countries, and of learned societies, are made available to us and placed in our State Library; and in return our official documents and law reports are sent abroad. Within the last five years they have established what is termed a "University Convocation." It is a convocation composed of the officers of colleges, principals of academies, learned men in our own State, and savans from other States, who come together annually at the city of Albany, and there discuss questions of science, literature, of the philosophy of education, and the art of teaching. The reports of some of these discussions are worth their weight in gold, and an examination of them will satisfy any reasonable person that the connection of the regents with the subject of education is not very slight. But as there seems to be some jealousy, on the part of those who claim to be the special friends of common schools, against the regents, it may be proper to suggest, in this connection, what I understand to be the truth—that they were the first in the State to inaugrate the system of common schools, or to suggest the idea of common school education. In their annual report in 1792, they recommended the adoption of a system of common school education. The recommendation was renewed by Governor Clinton, in his annual message, and followed, in 1795, by the passage of an "act for the encouragement of schools." Following this, and suggested by it, in 1812 the law was passed which forms the basis of our present common school system. One of the honored members of the Board of Regents who, I understand, served for twenty-five years as its secretary, was the first superintendent of common schools in the State, and it has been said that to him the friends of common schools are more indebted for the success of the system than to any other man in the State of New York. I refer to Gideon Hawley. Now, Mr. Chairman, having thus briefly glanced at the history, organization, and the duties and functions of the regents, I pause to inquire what is the character of the board that it should be thus bowed off the stage—dismissed to oblivion, without reason, apology, or explanation? I will answer the question by reading, with the permission of the committee, the names of the present members. Passing over the ex officio members, consisting of the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, and Superintendent of Public Instruction, we have on the list Gulian C. Verplanck, Erastus Corning, Prosper M. Wetmore, Gideon Hawley, John V. L. Pruyn, Robert Campbell, Samuel Luckey, Robert G. Rankin, Erastus C. Benedict, George W. Clinton, Isaac Parks, Lorenzo Burrows, Robert S. Hale, Elias W. Leavenworth, J. Carson Brevoort, George R. Perkins, Alexander S. Johnson, George W. Curtis, and Wm. H. Goodwin. These honored names compose the present Board of Regents. Now, I desire to inquire, what does the committee that made this report propose to substitute for this board—this ancient and honorable board—composed of names such as I have just read in your hearing? If I understand their report correctly, they propose to substitute a board consisting of seven members, with the superintendent of public instruction standing at the head. The Secretary of State and Comptroller are added, making three ex officio members; and then there are to be added four others elected by the Legislature, to hold their office for a term of years, and to receive a salary from the State for their services. That is what they propose to substitute for this body, this body of able men, of high-toned men, men of broad views, men of ripe scholarship, men who have been willing to devote their time and talents to the service of the State, and the interests of education, without any compensation whatever. They propose to substitute a board of hirelings! And what kind of hirelings will they be? You know, sir, I know and every man knows, what kind of a body we shall have when we bring it down into party politics. These men that I have named would not—one of them—appear before the Legislature and ask for an appointment to office. They would scorn it; they are above it. Much less would they pull the political wires and resort to that low cunning which marks the course of slippery politicians. But make it a salaried office, and for a term of years, a partisan office as it would necessarily be, and you would have six-by-nine politicians, brawling, ignorant, low, cunning men, who understand political jugglery, besieging the Legislature for the appointment. In a little while, instead of the class of men that we now have, and have always had under the present system, we should see the sacred interests of education committed to the care of men wholly unfitted, in every respect, for the important trust. This would be the inevitable result. The history of the past in relation to every office that is brought down to the political arena points unerringly to this result, and I am surpised that men should be willing thus to hazard the interests of education. I have said that the present board serves without pay. From year to year they devote their time and attention to the interest of the State; they have no motive to actuate them but the highest and the purest, the welfare of the State which they serve, and in whose honor and welfare their own is bound up. But how would it be with your body of politicians, your hireling body? In the next place this article proposes a body that shall hold for a term of years, instead of holding during the pleasure of the Legislature. By the tenure of the regents they are enabled to become familiar with the workings of the various institutions of learning, the wants of the people, and the general interests of education throughout the State. But under the proposed change, with a short term, and a partisan, hireling board, at every turn of the political wheel there would be a change; new men would take the office, men not only unfitted by character and education for the position, but entirely unfamiliar with the duties of the office, and unacquainted with the educational wants of the State. By such a change the State would inevitably suffer an irreparable loss. I ask, again, why is this change proposed? I venture to say that until the sitting of this Convention there had never been any public clamor against this board. I never heard a complaint in regard to the action or the non-action of the regents I had never heard a lisp uttered against them, or any doubt expressed of their usefulness and efficiency. But all at once, and most unexpectedly, when this body commenced its sessions, we were flooded with petitions from all parts of the State praying for the abolition of the Board of Regents. There is something very remarkable about this. Why this sudden zeal for abolishing the board? Whence did all these petitions originate? I have no positive knowledge upon the subject; but being somewhat of a Yankee, I may venture a guess, I suppose, without impropriety. They are all stereotyped—they bear the same impress; they all come from one center. I have no doubt they came from some persons connected with common schools, and who regard themselves as the special champions of common school education. I learned recently, with much regret, that, on the part of some, there is a jealousy against our higher institutions of learning. I suppose these petitions were gotten up at some central office, sent out over all the State to the teachers of the common schools, with the request that they would circulate them for signatures, and send them to this Convention. I have received them from teachers who had procured the signatures, and have presented them to the Convention, as, doubtless, have other delegates. I have no doubt that most, if not all of these petitions were procured in this manner. Had it not been for these manufactured petitions, gotten up at some central point, and sent out all over the State to these agents, you would not have heard a voice uttered against this board; not a petition would have been sent in—not a solitary petition from any part of the State. Is that the proper way to influence public opinion, and to carry a measure through this Convention? Does that seem to be high-toned, straightforward, and honest? I confess I do not think so. I do not like the manner or spirit of it. At an earlier stage of our deliberations, I had the misfortune to fall under the disapprobation of the gentleman from Richmond, the chairman of this committee [Mr. Curtis], for whose character and learning I have the highest respect. Some remarks which I made were the subject of a severe criticism by him. My position, to which he took exception, was, that upon questions of mere policy or expediency that do not involve moral right or wrong, we ought to regard, in our action here, the wishes of the people—we should consult public opinion. But my friend said: "No, that is all wrong. We must act from a high sense of duty. We must not inquire what the people think, or what they want." Well, I have never been quite able to see my error, although I have reviewed the matter with some care, and distrust of the soundness of a position that did not command the approbation of my friend, for whose judgment I have so much respect. I must now be permitted to say to that gentleman [Mr. Curtis], that I had reference then to an honest and legitimate public opinion, an opinion founded on the convictions of the people, with some show of reason for its basis; and not to a spurious, a manufacturerd public opinion, gotten up by such machinery as seems to have been employed in this case. And the rule of action which he pressed upon me with so much force and eloquence, I now commend to his serious and careful consideration. I have been unable to see any good reason that can be offered for abolishing the Board of Regents. On the other hand, I can see many and weighty reasons why we should not interfere with it. Let it still exist and serve the State in the interests of education, as it has done for more than eighty years. It is increasing its activity, and extending its usefulness more and more every year. It is faithfully serving the State without any compensation. And now it is proposed to strike it out of existence—to bury it in oblivion; and to introduce a new board of very doubtful expediency, at a great cost to the State, and without any corresponding advantages. I trust that this Convention will pause long before they constitutionalize a board like the one proposed, and blot out forever from the activities and future records of the State, that ancient, useful and honorable body, the Regents of the University.

Mr. ALVORD—The proposition is now, as I understand it, to strike out the remaining portion of this section, commencing at the seventh line, down to and including the seventeenth line. Before that is done I believe it is the right and privilege of the committee to perfect the section; and in order to test the sincerity of the gentleman who made the motion for this radical change in the management and control of the educational interests of the State in the future, I propose and offer as an amendment, to insert after line twelve "who shall serve without salary or compensation of any kind;" and strike out so much of lines fifteen, sixteen and seventeen as reads, "The term of office and the compensation of the members shall be prescribed by law," so that this board, to be constituted for the purpose of taking care of the educational interests of the State, shall serve in the same way that the present Board of Regents do, without compensation, fee, or reward. For I undertake to say that as a matter of necessity these parties must be merely a consulting board. The authority and the power in their actions must, as a matter of necessity, by way of execution, be put into the hands of the superintendent of public education or whatever other name you may call it; and these parties will meet together from time to time as a consulting board, and only in that capacity. I have no authority to speak for the Board of Regents of the University, but I venture to say that I speak what they will carry out and fulfill; that if, by the law of the Legislature, they shall be asked to take the position which this board of education will occupy, and act as counselors to the head of the department having charge of the common schools of this State, they will add it to the other duties which they perform, and do it cheerfully, and give so much in addition of their valuable time as may be necessary for the purpose of acting in that capacity as a consulting board. I believe that we can leave this whole matter with the Legislature; and if it becomes necessary to make this change, and concentrate the entire of the educational interests of the State in one body, that we may try the experiment and see if the present Board of Regents will not perform that portion of this work upon the same terms and with the same efficiency in regard to this matter, as they have in reference to the higher institutions of education in the State. But if gentlemen insist upon these changes, insist on wiping out this time-honored institution of the past, let them take from among its numbers, or take from the best scholars in the land who have so much of philanthropy in their hearts, so much of the desire to elevate the people by way of education in the State, they will find them readily enough — men competent to perform all the duties necessary, by way of consultation, and who will willingly and cheerfully serve the State in this regard, without any compensation whatever. What I fear in this regard is this: that if you pass this section as it is, leaving it to the Legislature to make it an office, short in its term of duration, a compensation to be affixed to it, commensurate with the idea that men may have of the public importance of the position, you will make it doubly sought for; first, upon the part of the officials who may desire the position in consequence of the salary which they will have growing out of their occupation of the office; second, because of the political influence that they can bring to bear in favor of their peculiar views, and of their party in the administration of the affairs of the commission. There is the difficulty; there is the danger, in my view of this case. I tell you, if you undertake to make an office in this State out of which grows compensation, and which is shortened by a term of time, whether you commence with the highest motives in regard to it or not, in the first instance, asking for purity of administration in regard to all the duties that they have to perform, I care not which party is in power, the moment they find that it is a lever to move vast political results they will look, not at the primary idea that they have, to the capacity and fitness of the party to fill the position, but they will look to the political capacity and fitness of the person upon whom they seek to impose the office to take care of the political interests of the party, before nominating him to the position. Then, if we are—I repeat it again—to change the present method, let us try the experiment through the Legislature to see whether the Board of Regents will not take upon themselves this additional burden, as well as that which they have now. If you determine to create a new board upon the ground of the inferiority of the present one, let us leave it to the high-minded patriotism, if I may use the expression in this connection, and I think I am right—to the benevolent, and high-minded and enlightened patriotism of the State, to find four men—I hope and trust they can find in this State a hundred men—who will come forward to perform all the duties of the position you undertake by this article to give them and let them receive as their only reward the approbation of their own conscience, and the "well done, good and faithful servants," of the people who have placed them in the position.

Mr. GOULD—I am not authorized to speak on behalf of the Committee on Education, but I can say with the utmost sincerity, as one of that committee, that I most heartily approve and accept the proposal of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. I think it is entirely proper that that amendment should be made; and it will suit me as an individual very much better than the original draft. While I am on my feet I desire to say that the theory of the committee which induces them to offer this article has not been met by a single speaker upon this floor. The ideas of the committee were twofold: first, that education was a unit; that the training up of the youthful mind of this State for the purposes of usefulness in life was a unit, that it was one act; and that it should be performed by one body having definite aims and objects in view. The other was that the body intrusted with this great and all important work should be one which comprehended fully all that was required of them; that they should be men who were trained for their work by special studies and by special occupations, so that they might comprehend precisely what was needed in this great matter. And now I ask if the common sense of mankind does not ratify that idea? Here is my friend from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] behind me, known throughout the whole State as a most eminent lawyer. There are few who would fear to intrust their lives and their properties in his hands as an advocate; nobody doubts his power as a lawyer, but what sort of a figure would he cut as a commissioner to regulate the public clocks of the city of New York or the city of Albany? With all his knowledge of law, I think it is exceedingly doubtful whether he knows the crown wheel from a center wheel, or the arbor from the pallet. I doubt whether he knows any thing whatever about clocks. Would not the common sense of the whole State or city repudiate his appointment to such a position? Is not this precisely what we do in the present position of the Board of Regents of the University? Is there a single one of them who was elected for that position in consequence of his known skill as an educator, in consequence of the attention which he had paid to the different systems of education which had been propounded by learned men? Has any one of them been distinguished, especially for his studies, in relation to the character of the human mind and the processes best fitted to carry forward the faculties from the period of youth to the period of useful age? I say there is not one of them who was so selected. These gentlemen have all been selected for their political acceptability, for their political character, as a reward for successful political action. There, sir, is the portrait of Martin Van Buren. We all know who he was, we are entirely familiar with his history. He was one of the Regents of the University; but who ever heard of him as an educator? Can you look to the records of the Board of Regents of the University, and show that he ever proposed a single measure having for its object the improvement of the system of education in the State or that he did any act whatever for its promotion? And is it not so with nearly all of them? If this theory is a good one, that education should be committed to one body, that it should not be confided to two discordant and very possibly belligerent bodies, then the proposition of the Committee on Education is a correct one. If it is desirable that the men who shall administer our educational interests shall be men who have studied the whole question and who shall be prepared to do their work in the best possible manner, then, the theory of the Committee on Education is a correct one. They propose to refer it to a superintendent who shall be at the head of the whole educational interests of the State, who shall superintend the elementary education, and the completed education of the people also. It is proposed that he shall be aided and advised by a board of men who have devoted their whole lives to the subject of education, to the presidents and professors of our colleges, and the most able and eminent writers upon the subject; those who have given perfect evidence of their ability to be useful. Is not this the common sense of the matter? Does not this idea commend itself to the common sense of the farmers, the mechanics, the merchants, the laboring men of the State of New York? We are told by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] that the expense of this board will be very great. If the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is adopted, as I most sincerely hope it will be, that argument falls to the ground. But suppose it was a greater expense—can the State of New York pay its money for any better purpose than preparing the minds of its youth in such a way as to enable them to become useful and ornamental members of society? We are engaged in a mighty struggle here in the State of New York. There is wealth in the bowels of the earth beyond all calculation. There are thousands of horse powers running down our rivers to waste. There are the elements of wealth strewn along over the whole surface of the State, and the reason why that wealth cannot be made available for the purposes of the people of this State is, that there is not a sufficient amount of human physical force in the State to do it. We are lacking labor. Now, what is the great problem that the people of this State have to solve? It is to substitute mind and intellect for muscular labor. It is, by the force of genius, to bring the great forces of nature into the service of man; to command the wind, the water, and the steam, and every other available force of nature, to do the work which we are not strong-handed enough to perform, so that we may avail ourselves of these great sources of wealth. Let me give a single illustration of what it is in the power of genius to do toward making this substitution. In 1852 I was one of the board of judges of the State Agricultural Society who were required to investigate the qualities and capacities of mowing machines, at Geneva. We spent a whole fortnight in the investigation of those machines, and applied all the tests that it was in our power to apply, in order to ascertain which of them was the best for the farmers of the State of New York to adopt. The prize which we offered was $500; and there was a little man there from Illinois who I believe had never before seen $500 together in his life. He was sickly, but yet his mind was full of genius, and at the conclusion of our experiments we found that his machine was the very best one of them all, and the prize was awarded to him, for this machine would do the work of ten men with ease. Six years after that I was appointed a member of the board of judges of the National Agricultural Society, which convened at Syracuse for a similar purpose; and while there I was, of course, surrounded by all the inventors of this kind of machinery in the United States. One day at the dinner table, a gentleman near me, who was a manufacturer of mowing machines, remarked to me, "I have paid this year $120,000 to the widow of this man who obtained a premium"—a man who at that time had never seen $500 in his life, and now, six years afterward, his widow was paid by one man $120,000 in a single year, simply for the right of manufacturing that machine, as a royalty fee. Another gentleman sitting within the hearing of his voice, said, "You have exceeded me, for I have paid her $75,000 this year." Another said that he had paid her $60,000, another $40,000, another $20,000, and four or five said they had paid her from $10,000 to $15,000 in that one year. This vast sum of money which was paid to the widow of this inventor in one year is simply an indication of the wants of the people of this State—they want something which shall substitute genius for labor. There are a thousand instances that might be mentioned in the State, where the brains of men have been absolutely coined into gold, because they have been enabled to meet the wants of the people of this State. The great problem before us is to spread this information broadcast, to enable all the pupils of our common schools to become thoroughly familiar with the fundamental laws of mechanics, of chemistry, of physiology and of all those sciences which will enable them thus to subjugate the great forces of nature to the service of man, and which will enable us to reap the vast harvests of wealth which lie in the bosom of our country ready for the first ingenious person who shall come to evoke them. If by the substitution of a better system of education, we are enabled to perform all this, if we are enabled to multiply these miracles, surely no price which would be paid, even if the price were greater, would be begrudged by the people of this State, when it was repaid in such an enormous proportion as that which I have stated. In that invention men were released from the odious drudgery of swinging the scythe. From that time, after that discovery, men were able, instead of by painful labor, mowing one acre a day—a single man, or, as was the case during the war, a single daughter of a family, would sit on an easy chair upon a mowing machine and perform more labor by the aid of a pair of horses than ten men could have done without it. This argument of expense is one that should be entirely ignored, in regard to this matter. If we can really get a valuable consideration, if we can have a real service performed for the people of this State, the question of expense amounts to nothing whatever. It has been said, and said very truly, by the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith], that the Board of Regents have performed some very valuable services to the State. It is no part of the intention of the Committee on Education in the report which they have made, to undervalue the services of those distinguished gentlemen. The gentleman has very truly said that they are the guardians of the Geological Hall; that they have built up that institution; that it is now exceedingly honorable to the State, exceedingly useful to all its citizens; that it is frequently visited not only by strangers from abroad but by our fellow-citizens from the different States of this country and that it has elicited the admiration of them all. This is undoubtedly a very glorious jewel in the diadem of the regents. And do the Committee on Education propose to withdraw that jewel from their crown?

Digitized by Google

They have no such intention. This article which has been proposed does not touch their functions in the slightest degree in relation to the Geological Hall. We have been told, too, and told with the most perfect truth, that the State is greatly indebted to the Regents of the University for the growth and for the real excellence of our State library. I have, as an individual, been greatly benefited by that library. I can testify that I have rarely engaged in the study of any topic of inquiry without I have found a most valuable assistance from the volumes that have been collected there. I feel personally thankful for the pains and the effort which the regents have made in that direction. Do we ask the people—do we ask the Legislature representing their authority to take away any of the power of the regents in relation to the State Library? Not in the slightest degree. They leave all the powers they have now intact in their hands. We are told that they have been made the medium of scientific exchanges between this country and Europe. The article proposed does not interfere with their functions in that respect at all. What then does the committee propose to do? The article in question simply proposes to relieve them of their functions in relation to education, and that is all. Now, sir, when it is alleged that the Board of Regents have really contributed to increase the value of education of the children of this State, it is simply asserting what has no foundation in fact.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Will the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] allow me to ask him a question? The gentleman says that if the management of academies and colleges was taken away from the Board of Regents of the University, they would still have a right to be called the Board of Regents of the University. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether, if the powers proposed were conferred upon this new board, the Regents of the University would consent to hold their office merely for the purpose of taking charge of the State Library and the museum?

Mr. GOULD—Why should they not? Would it be any greater misnomer to call them the Regents of the University, when they have the care and custody of the museum and State library, than it is to call them so now, when they have not the custody of a single college or university in the State of New York? I, for my part, fail to see it. The gentleman asked me the question whether they might not still go on with their functions in relation to those matters, if this article should pass. I say, most certainly. I believe it. I have no shadow of doubt of it. The statutes which confer this power upon them would remain intact, and would not be altered by the slightest fraction, if the article in question were adopted. I was speaking in regard to the function of the Regents of the University, in relation to education. We are told that they have the right of visitation of colleges, and they visit them in their examinations, and that they encourage them. Well, sir, so do I visit colleges at their commencements, and, sir, I do just as much good to the colleges as the Regents of the University do. I go there and hear the exercises, and the Regents of the University go there and do no more. They do not offer a single suggestion; they do not exercise authority in the slightest degree. I have frequently asked the presidents of colleges if the Regents of the University were accustomed to visit their institutions, and I have always been told that they hardly knew there was such a body as Regents of the University in existence, and that they rarely visit them. The gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] who is on the executive committee of two colleges, when I asked him if the Regents of the University had ever visited his colleges, said that he never recollected to have seen one of them there during the whole course of his life. The Board of Regents, with reference to education, is simply a farce, nothing else, and a broad farce at that. It is said that they get together the University Convocation. Really is that a matter of such great importance? Is it so exceedingly difficult to write a short circular inviting the friends of education to meet in the city of Albany? I do not know that the Board of Regents have ever done any thing beyond this. The convocation is accommodated in the Agricultural Hall and its members get together every year and discuss the interest of education in the State of New York: but does the gentleman seriously mean to contend that it would not be precisely as easy for the board that is created by this article of the report of the Committee on Education to issue a circular of that kind? If they are men specially adapted to the work is it not reasonable to suppose that they might draw a better circular than the one that is drawn by gentlemen who have never given any attention to the subject at all? The fact is that all the educational functions of the Regents of the University are performed by the secretary alone. I trust, sir, I have not the slightest doubt that that most estimable gentleman connected with the Board of Regents as its secretary, whose face is known in all the academies of New York, would still be continued in the service of the State; and I presume, without a shadow of doubt, he will be incorporated as one of the members of the new board, and be continued in that position during the period of his usefulness in life. It has been urged by the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] that if the article proposed is adopted, it will necessarily become in the end a political board. For my part, I do not see how it will be so any more than the Board of Regents is a political board. There is not one of these gentlemen, as I before stated, who has been elected because he is an educator — because he has studied this matter of education — but simply because he is a successful politician, because he is a man whom the party in power delights to honor. Sir, even my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] with his eminent worth and capacity for that position, is no exception to the rule. Does any man suppose that the Legislature that elected him elected him merely because he was a literary man and had made himself a distinguished light in the firmament of literature? If he had been a democrat all that would have gone for nothing. It was because he was a politician that he was elected a Regent of the University, and not because he was a literary man. I recollect when the Board of Regents was made up wholly of one political party. Until 1847 I believe there was not a single member of the Board of Regents who did not belong to one political party, but in that year when Robert G. Rankin and Dr. Luckey were elected they were the only whig members of the whole board; and the time has been and the time may come again when the Board of Regents will be an active political organization. There is nothing whatever to forbid it. I am happy to say that for the last few years there has been an entire absence of any thing like political action on the part of this board, but it is quite possible that the seven men whom this article proposes to invest with the powers of education in the State of New York will become partisan. For my part, I have very little fear that the board thus proposed will be liable to the criticism that the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] makes upon this score. If they are really selected because their hearts are fired with a glow of interest for the cause of education in this State, they will not be likely to be very much infused with political feeling.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I infer from the remarks of the gentleman that he would have persons appointed to this board selected from educators.

Mr. GOULD—Certainly I would.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Does the gentleman believe that the great educational interest of the State and the moneyed interests connected therewith would be safely intrusted to such a board?

Mr. GOULD—Unquestionably they would.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Then I beg to differ entirely with the gentleman in his views upon that point.

Mr. GOULD—What have they to do with the moneyed interests? Is it possible that the great educators of New York will not be able to distribute forty thousand dollars without cheating? That is all that the Regents of the University have had to do. Suppose that men like Doctor Anderson, or like President White, or Doctor Woolworth, the present secretary of the Board of Regents, and men of that character, were placed in a board of education, does the gentleman from Erie suppose that that forty thousand dollars would be in danger—that they would put it in their pockets and leave the State, or that they would be so utterly ignorant of keeping accounts that it would not be properly taken care of?

Mr. VERPLANCK—The gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] misunderstands me. The board have the care of the interest of the State in an educational point of view, and I say that men who are mere educators have not the practical knowledge of affairs of the world to manage properly the business of our institutions of learning.

Mr. GOULD—How much practical judgment does it require? Here are a certain number of pupils and a certain amount of income. Certainly could not practical educators divide the amount and distribute it among a number of persons to whom it was to be distributed. And would they not be able to find a true divisor? I have a better opinion of the educators of the State of New York than to believe that they would fail in a simple matter like this. When they have accomplished that great feat of arithmetic, all they have to do is to count up the money and make it a present to those who are to receive it. I cannot have the slightest fear but that these forty thousand dollars will be honestly distributed. There is a single other topic which has been suggested and which I desire to refer to, and that is the statement that there is a jealousy of the common schools against the academies. I cannot for myself understand why this should be alleged. Is it intended to be insinuated that the Committee on Education have a jealousy of academies and colleges, that they desire to sacrifice the higher interests of learning in behalf of common schools.

Mr. SMITH—In my remarks upon that point I had no allusion whatever to the Committee on Education, and I do not suppose, for a moment, that they have any such desire. I had reference to this flood of petitions which has come in upon us, and which, I suppose, had their origin in a feeling of that kind.

Mr. GOULD—If that were the case I cannot tell what the secret motives of the petitioners were. In reading through these petitions, it did seem to me, and my common sense told me so, that the petitioners had got hold of the root of this matter, and that there really was a desire to have the children of the State educated in accordance with some uniform and definite plan. That is all that I saw in the petitions. I do not know who were the secret movers of that petition. I saw it was signed by gentlemen every one of whom I know, and every one of whom has the confidence of the people of this State. As they were all gentlemen who are well qualified to speak with authority, I did not question its character.

Mr. SMITH—There has this moment been placed in my hands a memorial, signed by A. G. Johnson, and others, in favor of abolishing the Board of Regents. In this memorial I find this statement:

"There is an antagonism between private and public schools. In all the villages in which academies have been incorporated and established, it has been difficult, and, for the most part, impossible to get a vote in the district school meetings to raise the money necessary to build sufficient and decent school-houses for the accommodation of children whose parents are not able to pay their tuition in the academy."

This indicates the jealousy against academies to which I alluded, and which I suppose originated these numerous petitions.

Mr. GOULD—Very well. The gentleman has read an extract from a document which I have not seen; but it says not that the friends of common schools are jealous of academies, but that academies are jealous of common schools.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman is mistaken. This is a document which emanates from professed friends of the common schools.

Mr. GOULD—I understood the contrary.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman is mistaken. He had better begin his work over.

Mr. GOULD—No, I do not want to begin it over. I say that all this jealousy between academies and common schools is because they are not sufficiently acquainted with each other. If you put both under a single head, where they will be compelled to sleep in the same bed, I have no doubt that that will be likely to take away the antagonism which it is said exists. And that is what we propose by this report of the Committee on Education. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to amend the clause by striking out the words "and the compensation," in the sixteenth line, and inserting after the word "members." in the same line, the words, "who shall serve without salary or compensation of any kind," so that the clause shall read, "the term of office of the members, who shall serve without salary or compensation of any kind, shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. GOULD—Does the gentleman propose to strike out the compensation of the superintendent of common schools?

Mr. ALVORD—No, sir; the tenth line proposes that four members of the board of education shall be elected or appointed as shall be provided by law, and that their term of office and compensation shall be prescribed by law. We have already prescribed the term of office of the superintendent, and therefore this amendment can have no relation to him.

Mr. GOULD—I have no objection whatever to the proposed amendment.

Mr. ALVORD—We have prohibited the Comptroller and the Secretary of State from taking any fee or reward, except their salaries.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—It has not been my purpose, and is not my purpose now, to discuss to any considerable extent, the subject under consideration in any of its bearings. I have never been able fully to understand, during the sessions of this Convention, why it was that these petitions were sent in here from time to time, asking this body to abolish the Board of Regents of the University—a board which, I believe, has existed about as long as the State government has existed and during nearly the whole existence of every Constitution of this State. It has, however, from time to time, leaked out that some influence, somewhere, as I have understood, having its locality about the city of Albany, has reached forth in various ways to every part of the State, —has sent out these printed petitions which have been signed and sent in here asking for the abolition of this board. The only petition of the kind that has come from my county, has come from a town situated apart, mainly, from the rest of the county, where I suppose a commissioner of common schools has visited, and perhaps been requested to secure the names to that petition, and then send it here. Now, sir, when this report was made, it seemed to be the object to get rid of this Board of Regents. We are told that the purpose of getting rid of the board is, that, there may be a unity in the system of education in this State. I suppose it means that the same board, which has charge of the common schools of this State shall also have charge of the academies of the State, and the colleges and the universities of the State—that there shall be that unity of purpose and consistency of action pervading the whole system of education in the State, from the lowest to the highest, which shall eventuate in the greatest good to the people and to the cause of education everywhere. Now, sir, it has leaked out, it seems to me, in the course of this discussion that there is a certain antagonism between the authority which it deemed prudent and proper to exercise influence and control over the common schools of the State, and the authority which shall have influence and control over the academies, colleges and universities of the State; and the document which has been referred to by the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] and the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] and which I hold in my hand, has these words to which I specially call the attention of the Convention.

Mr. ALVORD—Where does the gentleman read from?

Mr. E. A. BROWN—From the ninth page.

Mr. ALVORD—I trust the gentleman will read the whole of it.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—"The colleges and academies are generally and almost exclusively denominational schools, patronized and supported as well as founded, by the various religious denominations. The public money appropriated to them is, therefore, indirectly used in propagating religious tenets, or, at any rate, in aid of competing sects.

"2. All the colleges and academies are essentially private schools. They are, indeed, incorporations, and are in one sense public; but they are as completely private as would be a school set up and supported by a single person. There is an antagonism between private and public schools. In all the villages in which academies have been incorporated and established, it has been difficult and for the most part impossible, to get a vote in the district school meetings to raise the money necessary to build sufficient and decent school-houses, for the accommodation of children whose parents were not able to pay their tuition in the academy."

I will not take up the time of this Convention in reading further. I do not know how much more there may be of this character. I do not know how much more rich and deep this document may be in the explanation of the purposes which are sought to be accomplished by adopting the report of the Committee on Education now under consideration; but, sir, if this sets forth faithfully and truly the purposes in view, it is sought to place under the control of a single individual, or a single authority, the public schools, all the common schools of the State, and also the academies and colleges of the State; that the common schools may be encouraged and supported at the expense of the State, and for the purpose of limiting the distribution of funds to the academies and colleges and universities of the State. Is it true, sir, that in the village neighborhood where there is an academy, it follows that the people are not disposed to sustain their common schools? There may be such instances; there may be such localities; but, sir, it is not generally true and it is not necessarily true, by any means, but on the contrary, I believe the contrary to be the fact. Many times this state of facts exists in villages or localities where academies are located, graduated schools and union schools are established and carried forward and supported largely by the public in those same localities. Now, sir, I do not know but the argument is good, that all these schools of every character, common schools, academies, colleges and universities, should be under the control of a State board of seven persons, or some other number of persons, but it strikes me, sir, that the individual who is placed at the head of the common schools of the State, if he will devote himself to the business of his office, and the discharge of its great and important duties which he will be called upon to discharge in that responsible position, he will have as much to do, and sufficient labor for his hands and head as any one man in the State of New York may reasonably be called upon to perform. And, sir, when he has discharged these duties, it will be well for the people in this State that another board, having no antagonistic feelings in regard to common schools, having no interest hostile to them, should be organized to carry forward the system that takes up the scholar when he leaves the common school, and leads him on to the academy, and takes up the other scholar when he leaves the academy and puts him through the college and university, so that the general interest of the State, as connected with the education of the people, may be largely promoted by having another and higher and more enlarged board to take charge of the higher educational system instead of having them under one individual, who has control simply of the common schools of the State; and it is to the end that our higher institutions of learning in the State shall never be deprived of the benefit of the existing board which has to some extent control over them, and which is proposed by the article reported by the committee to be done away with, that I shall vote against the article.

Mr. ALVORD—I am very glad that the attention of the committee has been called to this document, and I desire to call its attention to it still further, and read extracts from it in connection with the remarks I shall make, because I believe that these extracts will be more powerful in their influence than any thing I could say in that direction. Gentlemen have the document before them and it will be seen, in the first place, that an attempt has been made to put upon it the brand of a Convention document, although the document has not been printed by the Convention. In the usual form, on the first page, it has the words, "State of New York, No. ——, in Convention, December 18, 1867. Reply to the communication of the Regents of the University, in answer to petition, etc., presented to this Convention." The fact in reference to this document is this, that the communication was introduced in Convention, and it was moved that it be printed. The motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing, and the committee reported adversely to printing the document. Still it has been printed and brought in here and put on our files. I think that the Committee on Printing made a mistake in not recommending the printing of that document; for I think it sufficiently answered in the document itself to see where all the controversy in regard to this matter has originated. In the first place, without undertaking to enter into a criticism with reference to the signers of the communication, I will simply allude to the fact that the first two gentlemen whose names are signed to it are clerks in the office of the superintendent of public instruction in this State. In their opening they use these words. "The undersigned who signed and circulated the memorial and petitions, asking your honorable body to devise some mode by which the corporation known as the Regents of the University should cease to exist," etc., acknowledging that the paternity of the original memorial which was sent throughout this State was stereotyped here at Albany under their auspices for the purpose of getting up facts upon which to found the action of this Convention upon the abrogation of the Board of Regents. Here is the hostility. The gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] read a portion of the second paragraph down to the word "academy." I propose to read further:

"Possessing wealth and influence enough to control the action of a majority of the voters, the patrons of the academies have opposed any liberal provision for the education of their less favored neighbors. Thousands and thousands of the children of the poor have thus been deprived of proper school facilities; a poor school-house and cheap teacher have been good enough for them. We do not believe in the propriety of encouraging, by the distribution of the public money, the continued existence of such academies as directly or indirectly obstruct the free school system. We do not believe in the policy or justice of granting more public money to an academic pupil than to a pupil in the common schools, when we know that the academic pupils are generally those whose parents are able to pay tuition. We object to discrimination against the poor, and in favor of the rich. We hold that a Christian State should make ample provision for the many before it is lavish in its provisions for the few.

"The attendance at the two hundred and more academies is about thirty-five thousand, while the public schools are attended by nearly a million. A reference to the reports of the regents will show that less than one-half of the pupils in the academies are in a true sense academic scholars, and we do not doubt that two-thirds of them are really scholars who ought to be classed as primary pupils. It is, therefore, unequal and unjust to pay more public money for educating 'primary pupils' in the academies than in the common schools.

"If the trustees and patrons of academies desire to have schools in which their children may be educated separately from the children who attend common schools, let them do so at their own expense."

And they follow all the way through with a direct argument against the higher classes of education in this State and in favor of the common school system, and endeavor to destroy at once by one fell blow, the academies and universities, which whole argument from the beginning to the end of the document puts it as an acknowledged fact that it has undertaken to create a public opinion on this subject unblushingly, and avowedly in favor of destroying the Board of Regents of the University, and, in their downfall, to pull down all the remaining institutions of learning of a higher character within the limits of this State. Now, sir, are we to lend ourselves to this controversy? Was there any necessity of it? or has there been any necessity for it in the past so far as it regards our academies and universities? So far as it regards our academies and universities they have gone on in their paths toward educating the people. They have received a very small pittance at the hands of the people of this State in the way of bounty or endowment—a very small one indeed—and they probably will not receive more than that small measure in the future of this State. Sir, there is an anxiety in our State in relation to our academical institutions. There is no greater libel than the one contained in this statement which says that our academies are "denominational." You can hardly go to an academy in any portion of this State, but what you find men of all denominations and all religions among its trustees, and they are not used for denominational purposes or for proselyting institutions for any particular form of religion. They are in that regard, as free as any institution of any name or kind within the limits of the State of New York. They are founded, protected and officered without any regard whatever to class religion, and I trust that this attempt upon the part of these men, that is avowed in this Convention, to place in the organic law of the State an inflexible, crystalized system never to be changed, will be frowned down by this committee. Leave this to the Legislature of the State, as it has been in the past, to determine as the exigencies shall from time to time require. Leave it where it can be molded from time to time at the hands of the representatives of the great body of the people who make the laws; but do not place it in here merely to secure a petty victory—a petty triumph of these parties against the interests of the State and under the law, and let that victory be crystalized in this Constitution through our mistaken views.

Mr. HALE—I wish to call the attention of the Convention to the law which regulates the corporation known as the Board of Regents. I think my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] made a mistake in what he said in reference to the powers of the board. He remarked that in a conversation with the president of Columbia College—

Mr. CURTIS—The gentleman [Mr. Hale] is mistaken. I said a gentleman occupying a high position in Columbia College.

Mr. HALE—I beg the gentleman's pardon. I misunderstood him. He stated that in a conversation with a gentleman high in position in Columbia College, when he asked that gentleman whether if he should call there as a member of the Board of Regents of the University, claiming his right as a regent to enter that college he would be admitted, and that the gentleman replied, substantially, that he would not, that he would be glad to receive the gentleman from Richmond as a matter of courtesy, but would not receive him under a claim of right to visit as a member of the Board of Regents. Now, I wish to call the attention of the members of this committee to the law under which the Board of Regents are authorized to act. By the law

"The regents are authorized and required, by themselves or their committees, to visit and inspect all the colleges and academies in this State, examine into the condition and system of education and discipline therein, and make an annual report of the same to the Legislature."

The board is "authorized and required" to visit Columbia amongst other colleges. If this gentleman, therefore, high in position in Columbia College, should refuse to admit the gentleman from Richmond as a member of the Board of Regents, he would show that he was eminently unfit for the high position he occupied, by taking the attitude of a violator of the law of the State. Again, the law provides that

"The Regents of the University of the State of New York, and any committee thereof, in the discharge of any duty required by law, or by resolution of the Senate or Assembly, may require any proof or information relating thereto to be verified by oath, and shall for such purposes (and no other) have the powers now by law vested in any committee of either house authorized to send for persons and papers."

These two sections do give the Board of Regents something more than a mere theoretical and nominal right of visitation. They have the law of the State to back them, and they have the power to put that law in force. The first memorials which were circulated through the State and sent in here in the form of a petition speak of the reports of academies and colleges to the Board of Regents as "voluntary reports," as if it were a mere matter of kindness on their part to send in their reports to the Board of Regents. But what does the law say in that regard?

"Every college and academy that shall become subject to the visitation of the regents shall make such returns and reports to the regents in relation to the state and disposition of its property and funds, the number and ages of its pupils, and its system of instruction and discipline, as the regents shall from time to time require.

"The regents shall prescribe the forms of all returns which they shall require from colleges and other seminaries of learning, subject to their visitation, and may direct such forms and such instructions as from time to time shall be given by them as visitors to be printed by the State printer.

"Every academy shall make up its annual report for said academic year and transmit the same to the regents on or before the first day of November in each year."

Still, according to these memorials, this is a mere voluntary matter on the part of the officers of academies and colleges to send in their reports although the law strictly requires it, and they fix a day by which the report shall be made. And, again, to show that these trustees have more power than that, the law further provides that, "In case the trustees of any college shall leave the office of president of the college, or the trustees of any academy shall leave the office of principal of the academy vacant, for the space of one year, the regents shall fill up such vacancy, unless a reasonable cause shall be assigned for such delay to their satisfaction," so that they have the power, in case there may be neglect on the part of the trustees of an academy or college to fill a vacancy of the president of an institution, to fill it themselves. This is in addition to the other duties that devolve upon them. I merely refer to this provision of the law to show that the duties of these regents are not entirely nominal, and that the reports made to them by the trustees of academies are not entirely voluntary. It is true that the only action that the regents can take upon these reports is to make their own report to the Legislature, based upon the reports made to them. It is so in regard to a committee appointed by the Legislature, with power to send for persons and papers. They take the testimony and ascertain the facts, but when the facts are ascertained they must report to the Legislature for their action.

Mr. KRUM—I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether this law applies to all the colleges and academies in the State, or only those which are chartered by the Regents of the University?

Mr. HALE—I think it applies to all. The language is, "the regents are authorized and required, by themselves or their committees, to visit and inspect all the colleges and academies in this State, examine into the condition and state of education and discipline therein, and make annual report of the same to the Legislature."

Mr. KRUM—Does not that refer only to those colleges which participate in the funds, that these only are to be subject to this law?

Mr. HALE—I can only refer to the statute, which says, "all colleges and academies in this State." The gentleman can put his own construction upon it. I think it means what it says.

Mr. CURTIS—The discussion which has arisen upon this section of the report of the Committee on Education, except that part which I had the honor to contribute to it, seems to me to be of that character known as able and adroit. It seems to me that it might properly be described as "cuttle-fish" discussion. The gentlemen who have opposed the section which the committee have reported, have very sedulously and harmoniously sought to confuse the essential point of discussion. As for the document to which the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] refers, I have myself now seen it for the first time. It was laid on my table this evening. It is a document of which the Committee on Education have no knowledge whatever—a document of which this committee and this Convention have no knowledge whatever. It may contain, so far as I am aware, the most venomous hostility to the various institutions of the State of New York. But it does not seem to me to be now before this Convention. My object, and the object of the committee which was appointed by this Convention to take the subject of education into consideration, was the very simple and single object which, in my remarks of this morning, I attributed, and I believe with perfect truth and propriety, to the gentlemen who compose the Board of Regents; that object was simply to devise the best practical system of education for the State of New York. That was all. The attempt ingeniously made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], and repeated by the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], who spoke before we adjourned this morning, seems to me ingenious, but I trust will prove to be abortive. The question remains. The question is still unchanged—what is the best system of educational management for the State of New York? Now, sir, in the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the committee this morning, I stated, as frankly and as fully and as truly as I could, the duties of the Board of Regents of the University. I said that it was the most ancient institution in the State; that its roll of membership comprised a list of the most illustrious names known to our history. I mentioned Governor Clinton, General Schuyler, John Jay, James Kent, Washington Irving among other names which had adorned that board. I said that these gentlemen served the State without salary; that their services were noiseless, that their duties, such as they were, had, so far as I knew, been faithfully performed. There was not a word, sir, except possibly the manner in which I represented the undoubted public sentiment in regard to the regents—a public sentiment which neither the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] nor from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] nor from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] will deny to exist. Except that part of my speech there was nothing that by the remotest implication might be supposed to suggest so much as a smile in the direction of the Board of Regents. But I said I thought the duties of the board might be better performed in another way. And, sir, what has been the reply? Why, Mr. Chairman, the reply is to be summed up in two propositions. The first is that this is an old institution; and so far as the character of the members is concerned, it is a spotless institution; and the second is that they have performed the duties, such as they were, to the acceptance of the people. Mr. Chairman, I believe that there is no man on this floor who is more sensible than I am to the charm of venerable tradition. If this, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] would seem to intimate, were a poetic body, if our business were to prostrate ourselves at the shrine of ancient romance, to drape ourselves in mourning robes and abandon ourselves to the pensive images of the past, I trust, sir, that I could then, but surely not otherwise, aspire to be a leader in this Convention and to hasten in the very fore front of my colleagues to profess my interest and my sympathy in whatever is romantic and old. But, sir, the gentleman from Onondaga will admit that age is not always desirable. It depends upon the circumstances whether it is or not. In wine, I have heard, that age is good. In bread and eggs, I suppose, it may be doubtful whether it be so desirable a quality. [Laughter]. Sir, age is venerable. When it is venerable, age, we are told, gives wisdom; but age, whether we are told so or not, does not give vigor. Now, Mr. Chairman, the point which my friend from Essex [Mr. Hale], the point which the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], and the point which the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], should have made in this discussion was this, that, because of the age of the Board of Regents, therefore the duties which devolve upon it, in the economy of the education of this State, could be more adequately and faithfully performed as a separate board than in the manner which we have recommended to the Convention. On this point I have yet heard nothing urged, and yet, until this point is sustained, until the relation between the antiquity of this board and the discharge of its duties is clearly indicated, I submit to you that the argument of age is necessarily inapplicable. Now, then, we confront squarely the question. I have not denied, so far as the second point I have mentioned is concerned, that the Board of Regents, laboring under the paralysis growing out of the conflict of laws imposed upon them, have done such duties as they have had to do, well. Sir, there is no man in this State who will go before me in paying the homage of respect to the services of the secretary of the Board of Regents, and his assistant. What I say now is what I said this morning, that all the Board of Regents does through its officers—the secretary and his assistant—could be better done for the interests of education by one board which was charged with a general care of all educational matters which are under the State control; and I beg gentlemen of this committee not to be diverted any further from the question, which is this: Shall there be in the State of New York two boards of education? Is there any good reason why this State should have two boards of education, one having charge of what is called the higher education of the State, and the other of what is supposed, by implication, and the circumcumstances must therefore be supposed to be, in the views of gentlemen who oppose us, the lower education? Sir, I do not see it. I do not believe that any gentleman, who has spoken on this floor has shown us the necessity for two boards; nor do I believe that any man in this State can show it. The cause of education is a unit. Any system of education that can be devised—what is it? It is Jacob's ladder. It is a constantly ascending grade of celestial steps. There is no middle point on that ladder, above which all is higher, and below all is lower; for he who plants his foot upon the first round is already in the heavenly way. The gentlemen who oppose this section deny that there is any essential hostility between the two systems of education. I deny it also. I deny it from the nature of the case, as I have already done. I deny it further, upon the authority of the Board of Regents in the rejoinder which they have already laid upon our tables. They did not acknowledge, and I do not acknowledge, and no reflecting man in this State acknowledges that there is any essential hostility between the system of common schools and the system of colleges and academies; and because they are essentially one—the committee have charged me to report that, henceforth the State of New York shall care for this interest in a single department. Mr. Chairman, the constitution of that department is a matter of debate. For my part, I am very sure of this, that, if we are to have a department of education in this State that shall be adequate to its duty, we must not compose it of gentlemen elected for life, and removable only by the vote of the Legislature, if we would have the authorities of this State which have charge of the interests of education a vast, and energizing influence, it must come fresh from the people; it must come with all the lights which the constant advance of the science of education developes, and no science is so progressive as this. I have no object, and I am sure that the committee have had no object to create a new board of officers in order to bleed the treasury of the State. But I am sure that every dollar this State, or any State spends in education saves fifty or a hundred dollars spent in the punishment of crime. Therefore, I propose and the committee authorized me to propose no unnecessary or unwise expense to the State.

Mr. ALVORD—The gentleman makes use of the word "unit"; do I understand him to go to the length that the State ought to make education of all kinds free?

Mr. CURTIS—Certainly not.

Mr. ALVORD—Then I cannot understand how they are to be a unit.

Mr. CURTIS—It is a unit in so far as the subject itself is concerned.

Mr. ALVORD—My idea is that the State should take care of the education of the State in a double view, one as a free institution and the other, as being the higher sphere of education, to be remunerated by the patrons, and that these two systems should be under separate and distinct laws.

Mr. CURTIS—The essential thing is the same. The essential cause of education is always the same, that is the important point we are to bear in mind. I am not now expressing all the views I entertain as an individual in regard to this matter. I do not, for instance, as an individual, see any necessity for such a relation to the State as the colleges now have. Admitting the system to be desirable, all I wish to do is to create a single board of education, and the care which the State now exercises over these academies and colleges can be as well exercised in a single bureau, desk or department in that board as it is now in another department, which by the necessity of the existing system, and from the spirit which gentlemen have evinced in their remarks, would necessarily aggravate and exasperate each side into a hostility which the whole State would deplore. That, sir, is the simple proposition of the Committee on Education. A simple question whether we will have one board of education or two boards. Mr. Chairman, in concluding the remarks, which I had the honor to submit this morning, perhaps with an over anxiety to screen myself from any thought of personal feeling, or at least to win for my remarks the sympathy of the committee, I ventured to state that if a wreck should take place I should share the fate of my companions and go down. Sir, I could not be sorry that I made use of that expression. I am sure the Convention are very grateful to me for having used it, since it secured for us the extremely felicitous peroration of the speech of my friend from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker]. But, sir, the wreck of which I spoke was not of the great cause of education in this State. No, sir, it was only of individual official relations to that cause. The responsibility which, with solemn impressiveness he charged upon me, should this section of the committee's report chance to prevail, is a responsibility which I willingly assume, for in any such wreck as that, Mr. Chairman, I should not be seen, surely, in the position which he has so graphically described; I should not be seen hastening to hang up my dripping garments, if happily I had escaped, in the temple of saving Neptune. No, sir, in the sacrifice of individual importance to a great public cause, the garments of no man seem to gods or men dripping rags, but rather shining robes, and I reply to the gentleman in the words of a later poet than him he quoted; in such a wreck:

"——if my barque sinks,
'Tis to a deeper sea."

Mr. ALVORD—I admire very much indeed, sir, the world of fancy and of theory in which the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] sails his barque, and in which the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] also disports himself; but we are practical men in this Convention, and I trust that we look at these things in a practical way.

Mr. CURTIS—If the gentleman will allow me one remark, I would like to ask him whether he is aware that they were "practical men" who built the Great Eastern?

Mr. ALVORD—I think they were not. I think they made a mistake.

Mr. CURTIS—They called themselves so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ALVORD—I think the probabilities are that the men who built the Great Eastern were educated in the same school as my friend from Richmond and my friend from Columbia, and they made a failure of that enterprise, as these gentlemen will make a failure of this scheme even if they succeed in passing it. Now if there had been no petitions upon this subject brought before this Convention there would not have been any necessity for this discussion, and although the members of this committee may have acted in good faith, and may have recommended what they deemed for the best interests of the State, yet we have a right, in judging what the result of the adoption of this scheme would be, to take into consideration the motive which lies at the bottom, in the minds of those who have undertaken to create public opinion on the subject, and that motive is a deadly hostility against the academies and colleges of this State, and nothing else. These petitions show the animus at the bottom of the whole movement and what these men intend to do in this particular if they succeed here. I will now read a little further from this document, to show what these men say in this regard.

Mr. MERRITT—If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to ask him whether the proposed appropriation by the State is not already contained in the first section, and whether the communication referred to is not aimed at the State allowance of the literature fund for the benefit of the academies, and if so whether it is pertinent to the point under consideration? We have already passed the section providing that this literature fund should be set apart for the benefit of academies as heretofore.

Mr. ALVORD—I should like to know where?

Mr. MERRITT—In the first section.

Mr. ALVORD—I should like to see it. It only says: "The capital of the common school fund the capital of the literature fund, the capital of the college land scrip fund, and the capital of the Cornell endowment fund, as it shall be paid into the treasury, shall be, respectively, preserved inviolate." I understand all that, sir, but I wish to go on a little further, and I think I am in the right direction.

"In our opinion, there is not an academy in the State, situated in a village capable of supporting it, which would not be more useful, as well as more prosperous as a high school, belonging to and controlled by the public authorities. The policy of keeping up two competing sets of schools may be questioned. There is, on the other hand, hardly a question that the trustees of nearly all the academies, and their patrons, would have sustained better schools, and at less expense, if they had contributed their money, their labor, and their intelligence, to the improvement of the public schools. It cannot be doubted that a high school, the property of the district in which it is situated, relying upon the property of the district for its support, is more likely to be prosperous, useful, and permanent, than a private institution, dependent for its existence upon the contributions of its owners and the tuition of its pupils."

Now, sir, what is the whole tendency of that matter? It is to do what the gentleman from Richmond says he does not desire to do. That gentleman says he does not desire to make it a fundamental law of this State, that there shall be no institution having a patronage outside of the State, but he is in favor of it by advocating these two classes of educational institutions, the one supported by the State free, and the other supported by private contributions; whereas these gentlemen upon whose petitions is undertaken to be based the action of this Convention, avow their intention to do away with any such distinction, and to compel every academy of this State to bow down to the position of a free institution, and then to compel every one of the patrons to patronise such institutions, or else go out of the State for the education of their children. That is the result undertaken to be brought about here on the part of these men who have got the common school system so strongly upon their brains—a system well enough in itself, sir, always having my support in the Legislature, for whenever any locality desired that they should have a free school and do away with the rate bill, my voice, both in response to my name, when it was called, and upon the floor of the house, was always heard in favor of it, and I had the honor many years ago to introduce into the Legislature of this State, prematurely as it seemed, the idea of having all our common schools free. I have always favored the system and I would willingly tax myself in the matter of education deeper and longer than in any other direction, and I believe that the people of the State generally would submit to taxation in that direction far more cheerfully than in any other. I believe that education should be free as the air we breathe or the water we drink, but sir, I do not believe in compelling every institution of learning in this State to bow down to this one idea, by putting it under the operation of the one board of control in this State. The result if we do this will necessarily be that very many of those who should be educated within the limits of this State will be driven to other States for the purpose of getting an education. Now, in reference to the question of these institutions being all under one supreme control, I ask the gentleman [Mr. Curtis], to look around and tell me where, with a single exception of the State of Michigan, there are any institutions of a high order, that are under the domination of the State. It is true that as far as regards Yale College the Governor of the State is ex officio, one of the trustees of the corporation, but no other or further influence over that institution is given to the State.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman give way while I remind him just here that in the State of Michigan to which he refers, the common schools are not under control of the same board with the university. There is a Board of Regents there, and also a board of education.

Mr. ALVORD—I was aware of that fact, sir, and I was about to state it. They have two separate boards in the State of Michigan as well as in this State. Harvard University has recently divested itself of all connection with the State of Massachusetts, and stands now upon its own foundation. These two institutions, Yale and Harvard, have been brought up here as institutions, glorious, far beyond any of the institutions of this State; but gentlemen have failed to remember that long before this State began to be cleared at all, while it was still a howling wilderness, the people who planted themselves upon the New England shore brought with them education and the idea of its importance. They believed that education lay at the foundation of a republican government, and they went early to work for the purpose of founding institutions of learning. Yale College was founded in 1701 and Harvard forty or fifty years before that time; and ever since there has been thrown into the coffers of those institutions, the redundant property of the men of New England, who have looked to the furtherance of the cause of education as the best means of benefiting their country. And let me tell the gentleman from Richmond in this connection, that if those institutions of the east had originated in more modern times, in the feeble way that our institutions of this State have originated, and have undertaken to get along, they would not yet have reached the high and prosperous positions that they now occupy. It is their antiquity that has given them this high position, this pre-eminence among the educational institutions of this country. Now, so far forth as regards the question of antiquity, in connection with this Board of Regents, the only thing we have to say is, that they had their origin over eighty years ago, and that the gentleman from Richmond, while he stands up here unblushingly as the murderer of the institution, cannot find one single iota of evidence of complaint against them for any act that they have ever done, or any duty that they have omitted to do under the laws and government of this State. They have done their duty ably and well, sir, to the extent of the power that has been given them in the past and therefore I say that they are a useful institution and the laws that established them and the laws which from time to time have been passed for the purpose of giving them other powers and duties, and I think we should hesitate long before we undertake to eradicate them forever from out the government of the State. If in the judgment of the Legislature —that Legislature which created them, and as it were breathed into them the breath of life—if in the judgment of the Legislature it seems wise to continue them longer I say let them be continued, or if the Legislature think it best to abolish them, let them be abolished, but let us not here, in this Convention, in view of these petitions and the manner in which they have been gotten up, and the revelations we have here of their underlying motives, let us not undertake here to do this wicked and murderous deed.

Mr. CURTIS—At worst it is hari-kari, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRITT—On general principles I would be opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. I believe the duties which were devolved upon this board, demand, and they should have the best ability of the State, and that the State should pay for services rendered in the cause of education. But as this seems to be a compromise proposition, I hope it may be adopted.

Mr. ALVORD—I wish to say that I shall certainly vote for it, in hopes that it may be amended in that regard; but I shall vote for it even if it be not amended at all, so that it is no compromise on my part.

Mr. MERRITT—There has been a great deal said aside from the real question before us, and I believe that the essential question presented by the report of the committee has not yet been controverted. The question whether the educational interests of the State shall be committed to a single board, or whether that board shall be divided, is, I believe, the only question upon which we are now to pass. Nothing that pertains to the individual character of the regents, what they have done or what they propose to do, has any thing to do with it. So far as these petitions are concerned, they will have such weight as they may have upon the minds of delegates here. I assume that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has not been very much influenced by them or by the remonstrances that have been presented. He, like other delegates, will decide this question as, in his judgment, may be for the best interests of the State. With regard to this memorial that has been presented in favor of doing away with the allowance heretofore made to the academies, it has nothing to do with the present question, and all that has been said in regard to that matter I regard as the merest pettifogging; it is mere sophistry. I imagine that there is no one here who has any feeling against any individual member of the Board of Regents, or against any person connected with the department of public instruction. None here should have any such feeling. It has nothing to do with the question. Let us decide the question simply upon the merits. It is, in my judgment, best to put all these interests under the control of one department. I believe we ought to do so; I believe it would be for the best interests of the State, and for the best interests of the cause of education, and I therefore hope, sir, that this amendment will prevail, and that the motion to strike out will not prevail.

Mr. SMITH—I desire to say a few words upon the question. It seems to me that the statement of the question by the chairman of the Committee on Education involves a fallacy which is well calculated to mislead, and which it seems has produced its effect upon my friend from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] who has just taken his seat. I understand the position of the question to be this: In the first place we have now a certain system which has existed in this State for eighty years. It is a creature of the Legislature. It has worked well; no complaint has been made against it. Now, the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] proposes to change this system and constitutionalize a new one. I submit sir, that in such a case the burden of proof is on those who seek to change the system, and they are bound to show that there is a necessity for the change, and further that the system which they propose is better than the present one. The burden of proof is upon them, and not upon those who favor the present system. Now, sir, have these gentlemen shown this Convention any such thing? Have they shown that the people demand a change? Have they shown that there is any necessity for a change? Have they shown that the present system does not work well? If they have, I have not heard the arguments nor the reasons by which they have shown it. It seems to me that there is a fallacy in using the expression "two boards." In reality there are not two boards under our present system. There is but one—the Board of Regents. That board is charged generally with the interests of education in the State. It is true there is an officer called the superintendent of public instruction, who has certain duties to do, and to whose office certain functions pertain; but he really constitutes a part of the Board of Regents, being a member thereof ex officio. So far as the interests of education are concerned, the interests of colleges, of academies, and of common schools, in that board they act as a unit; and therefore it is wrong and mischievous to speak of them as two antagonistic boards. There is really but one board now; and the change proposed as I understand it is, to take the power over this matter entirely away from the Legislature, and constitutionalize a new board, with the superintendent of public instruction at its head. Now, says my friend from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] it is all wrong to refer to this feeling on the part of the petitioners for the abolition of the Board of Regents; it is mere pettifogging. I was sorry to hear that remark; sorry because it was not very complimentary, nor very respectful to gentlemen who had taken the opposite side of the question. That is a matter of taste, however, in regard to which I will have no controversy with the gentleman; but I submit that it is legitimate to refer to that feeling in this discussion when we are called upon to make such a sweeping change in our law upon this subject. There is great wisdom in the famous remark of John Randolph of Roanoke that "change is not reform." When we are asked to make such a radical change as this, some necessity for it should be shown. It should be shown that the change is demanded by the people of the State, and that it would be an improvement upon the present system. I insist that there is force and propriety in the argument made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] notwithstanding the criticism by the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt]. It is becoming perfectly evident that this raid upon the Board of Regents was originated and is urged upon this Convention in a spirit of hostility to the colleges and academies of our State; a spirit which ought not to be fostered or countenanced; and if we act in this Convention in obedience to that spirit we shall commit a grave error and be guilty of a great folly. Instead of promoting unity throughout the State in educational matters, as gentlemen say they desire to do, if we act in accordance with this feeling we shall promote discord and stimulate a feeling of antagonism between the various institutions of learning. There is no such feeling now, except on the part of those who are making war upon the academies and colleges in this attack upon the Board of Regents. Certainly there is no such feeling on the part of the Board of Regents or of the friends of colleges and academies. In the report of the board for 1867 the regents urged upon the Legislature the propriety of inaugurating a system of normal instruction in our colleges, for the purpose of educating teachers for academies, who would be qualified to educate teachers for common schools; thus making the whole system a unit, and seeking to promote the interests of common school education. Yet these memorialists come here and represent that there is an antagonistic feeling on the part of the friends of colleges and academies against the common school system. If we sanction or encourage that idea in this Convention, we help to create a most unpleasant and disastrous feeling throughout the State between different kinds of educational institutions which should be a unit. When I had the floor at the commencement of the discussion this evening, I stated that one of the Board of Regents, who has been an honored member for twenty-five years, was the first superintendent of common schools, and that the common school system was more indebted to him for its success than to any other man in the State of New York. It is for the reason, among others, that we do not wish to foster this feeling of antagonism and jealousy on the part of some who profess to be friends of the common schools, that we resist this movement to overturn the system that now exists and to inaugurate a new one. I ask the friends of this report why they seek to create a new system? Why would a board of seven, who are to be paid a salary and elected by a partisan Legislature, be more likely to foster and advance the interests of education in this State than the present Board of Regents who serve without pay? So far, in this discussion, I have failed to hear any reason given. Gentlemen say that education is a unit. So it is, sir. It is a unit now, and the Regents of the University are seeking to maintain it as a unit, and to foster it as a unit. Desiring to maintain its unity, we who oppose this scheme feel bound to resist the spirit of antagonism which has been developed against colleges and academies, and which seeks to overthrow them and build up common schools upon their ruins. I insist that the friends of the regents are the true friends of common schools. I repeat that the burden of proof is upon those who seek to make the change, to show some good reason for it. Why not leave this subject with the Legislature, where it has been for the last eighty years? Dare we not trust the people? If the regents have not possessed the confidence of the people, why has not the Legislature been asked to abolish the board? Who has ever heard of any complaint on the subject? I never dreamed that there was any opposition or hostility to the Board of Regents until I came here and saw these memorials, all bearing the same stamp, and emanating from the same source. If there is to be any change, let it be left to the Legislature. Let us not put the matter into the Constitution, but leave it flexible and plastic in the hands of the Legislature, to be molded and shaped in the future as the wishes of the people and the interests of education may demand.

Mr. MERRITT—I wish to state that, in using the word "pettifogging," a while ago, I did not intend it in an offensive sense. I merely intended to characterize the line of argument to which I applied it as a piece of special pleading having nothing to do with the question at issue.

Mr. GOULD—I rise merely to make a single statement which it seems to me ought to be made before this discussion closes. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] has very felicitously remarked that this has been on one side a "cuttle-fish argument," and it seems to me that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has, in all his remarks, endeavored to confuse the real issues, and to prevent them from being clearly intelligible to the Convention. His argument is this: Thomas W. Olcott, Dr. Armsby, and Dr. March have said, in a pamphlet which has been laid upon our tables for the first time this evening, several naughty things, and therefore, because these gentlemen have said these naughty things, the proposition of the Committee on Education should be thrown aside by this Convention! Sir, I do not see the logic of this kind of argument at all, and I simply wish to say that the petitions which have been introduced here, and the influences of these gentlemen have not been brought to bear on the Committee on Education at all. Every one of the propositions submitted to the Convention were agreed to substantially by the committee before they had any knowledge whatever of these attempts having been made by the gentlemen whose names are signed here, to procure petitions from the people of the State adverse to the Regents of the University. Therefore, sir, whatever these gentlemen say on the subject amounts to nothing here Their statements do not need any attention on the part of this Convention. The question is whether the Convention will adopt the theory and plan which has been proposed by the members of the committee, or whether they will adopt something else. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] says that he is a practical man, and he prides himself upon being such. Now, sir, it seems to me that it is a practical idea when a single thing is to be done, that it should be done by a single power, It seems to me that if a painter wished to ascend to the top of a house, it would not be a practical way if he should go up to the second story on one ladder, and then jump sideways from that on to another ladder depending from the eaves, and go up the rest of the way on that. A practical man? Why, sir, the gentleman has accused me of something that I never was accused of before, that is, of being poetical in my remarks. I never wrote a line of poetry in my life. I would almost say that I never made a line of poetry. I do remember, sir, my mother telling me that when I was very small, and taking my noon-tide nap, on one occasion, she came into the room and found me laughing in my sleep, she woke me and asked me what I was laughing at, she said, I told her I had been dreaming poetry. She asked me what the poetry was, and I told her it was this:

"The apostle Paul in his epistles, Advises all to wet their whistles."

[Laughter.] That poetry exhausted my talent in that direction, and I have never been guilty of any more poetry since.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I wish to call attention to the first section of this report which I think is misunderstood by this Convention. It is supposed that that section provides for continuing the bounties to the academies which have been heretofore dispensed to them, but an examination of it will show that such is not the case. It provides as follows:

"The revenues of said common school fund shall be applied to the support of common schools; the revenues of said literature fund shall be applied to the support of academies, and the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars of the revenue of the United States deposit fund shall each year be appropriated to and made a part of the capital of the said common school fund."

Now the revenue of the literature fund is to continue to be applied to the support of the academies. How much is that? Only $15,000 a year. Yet the sum that has been distributed yearly to academies is $40,000 and the balance has been made up from a portion of the United States deposit fund which has heretofore, by a provision made by the Legislature, been added to the revenue of the literature fund to make up the $40,000 distributed. That is not secured to the academies in the future. There is nothing secured to them except the $15,000 the small income from what is known as the literature fund. It is an entire mistake, therefore, to suppose that this article, if adopted, will protect the academies in the bounty that has heretofore been given them, or will protect them against the hostility so plainly manifested toward them by those who are seeking to push through this article. There can be no doubt upon the subject that there is a deep-seated hostility against the colleges and academies of the State which is at the bottom of this entire movement. Portions have been read from the pamphlet that has been laid upon our tables under the semblance of a regular document of the Convention. It is not such, but it is a communication sent to this Convention, drawn by the same hand and signed by the same persons who presented the original memorial upon which this committee has acted, which memorial is just the same that has been sent in from different parts of the State.

Mr. CURTIS—Will my friend from Albany allow me one moment? He speaks of "the memorial upon which this committee has acted." I inform him and gentlemen of this committee that those memorials were first presented to the Convention and first came to the knowledge of the Committee on Education after they had given their fullest attention to the whole subject committed to them, and had in general agreed upon the sketch they would present to the Convention. Therefore it can in no sense be said that those memorials influenced the action of the committee.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I will do the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] the justice to say that I do not believe that he participates at all in the feeling of hostility that prompted that memorial. I am not surprised that he should attempt to get rid of its effect here; but, Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible for him to do so. The gentlemen who presented the original memorial—the only memorial that has been presented to this Convention, different copies of it coming from different parts of the State, but all having been issued by them—these are precisely the same gentlemen who now come in with this vindication which has been laid upon our desks. Now, in this attempted vindication there is a clause which has not been read by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] and to which I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Convention. It is upon the tenth page, and it is this: "Again if the trustees of an academy will raise two, three or five hundred dollars to buy apparatus, the regents are authorized to appropriate to their use an equal sum from the income of the literature fund." That is true; it has always been so. For twenty-five years that has been so. Some twelve thousand dollars or more are appropriated from the United States deposit fund, and wherever an academy raises a certain amount of money to buy books or apparatus, an equal amount is given from that fund, and a most salutary effect the provision has had. After having said that these public academies are "denominational," these gentlemen object to this, and they say "on what principle are fifteen or twenty thousand primary scholars, in so-called academies, selected for this peculiar favor? Why are not the million primary scholars in the public schools entitled to similar liberality?" Sir, there is no protection in this article of the Constitution to secure that bounty hereafter to the academies, and you see it is proposed here to take it away. It is a part of this proposed system; it is at the bottom of this whole enterprise to take from the academies all except what is secured by this first section, which is but twelve or fifteen thousand dollars a year, the simple interest from the literature fund—to take away all the rest and give it to the common schools. Are we not right, therefore, in saying that this attack on the Regents of the University originates in hostility to academic education? Have we not the right to say, when they avow it themselves, that their object is to strip these academies of the funds that have made them prosperous in the past, that have given them libraries, furnished them teachers, and made them exceedingly valuable institutions of education throughout the State. I repeat, sir, that those who stand up here to defend the Board of Regents, stand upon the defensive against this aggression.

Mr. GOULD—Will the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Certainly.

Mr. GOULD—I wish to ask him if the article of the Constitution already adopted does not absolutely protect the academies from any hostilities whatever?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I will answer my friend. It certainly does not It protects them simply in the enjoyment of the literature fund, and no further. My friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould] who dreamed poetry many years ago, has not done dreaming it yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS—May I ask my friend from Albany [Mr. Parker] whether this provision does not do precisely what the provision in the Constitution of 1846 does?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I have nothing to say upon that subject now. I have not the Constitution of 1846 by me. Most fortunately for us, Mr. Chairman, the object of this attack is now avowed. After having proposed a constitutional provision which gives to the academies but $15,000 income annually, instead of $40,000, they propose now by the paper they lay upon our tables, and by means of which they seek to control our action, to take away that which has been given; and it is this attack in this form that I stand up here to resist.

Mr. CURTIS—May I ask the gentleman whether he means to say that the present Constitution gives $40,000 a year to the academies?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—No, sir; nothing of the kind.

Mr. CURTIS—Where is the difference then?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I mean to say that the law gives it, the statute gives it; and they now avow the determination to take it away.

Mr. CURTIS—Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if when he says "they," he refers to the Committee on Education, or to their report?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Oh! if it is any satisfaction to my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] for whom I entertain a profound respect, I will relieve him from the weight of that statement.

Mr. CURTIS—And the committee?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I cannot speak for the rest, sir. My friend who dreamed poetry may, perhaps, entertain different sentiments.

Mr. GOULD—Well, sir, then for myself I will state that I have no hostility toward the colleges and the academies of the State.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I am glad to hear that there are two members of the committee who have no hostility to the academies.

Mr. ARCHER—As a member of the Committee on Education, sir, I disclaim utterly, now, and at all times, any kind of hostility to the academies or colleges of this State. I will state further for the information of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], that the leading idea of the Committee on Education put forth in their report, was substantially agreed upon before a single memorial had reached our hands from the clerk's desk: to wit, the unification of the system of education in this State.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Are there any other gentlemen that are about to approach the confessional? [Laughter.] If there are I will wait for them before I proceed. I am glad to see them assuming that position at last. But, after all, Mr. Chairman, what is to be the result of all this, suppose you do not protect us in the Constitution, and suppose you establish the board that they wish to establish under such influences as exist here, and give them the power to strip these academies of these funds except the pittance arising from the literary fund, what will become of the colleges and academies of the State? I appeal to this document upon our tables to show the animus that prompts this attack, and it is by no means necessary to show, or to say that the members of the Committee on Education believe in the justice or propriety of what is said here. It is enough for us that the attack comes from that quarter, that this is its object, and that it can readily be accomplished if this article in this form is adopted. I call attention to these portions of this document which purports to come from at least two gentlemen connected with the office of superintendent of common schools, to show that in that quarter there is a hostility to academical education, and to the protection of the academies of the State, which ought not to be encouraged by this Convention. Sir, the colleges and academies are powerful institutions in this State. Twenty-three colleges and two hundred academies scattered broadcast throughout the land justly enjoy an influence among the people, and I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, what possibility there will be of receiving the favorable vote of the people upon this Constitution, if it be sent down to them in this form, and with this open and avowed hostility of the gentlemen who have inaugurated this movement? I admit that there is a difference of opinion among the gentlemen who are pressing this article. While those that got up this movement would strip the academies of the public bounty entirely, the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] has shown plainly by what he has said that endowments are indispensable to success, and when he brings before us Harvard College, and Yale College, and the University of Michigan as institutions which we may well emulate in this State he brings before us institutions largely and liberally endowed, and which owe their success chiefly or entirely to that endowment; and yet those who are with him in this matter would strip our academies of the miserable pittance of forty thousand dollars that is annually divided among them, and the twelve thousand dollars that are given them for maps and apparatus. But it is said we do not want two boards of education; that there are now two boards of education and they wish to have but one. Two boards of education; how can it be said that they exist now? We have a Board of Regents, who have charge of the colleges and academies; and more than that, they establish academies for the education of common school teachers, and do a vast deal of good in educating teachers for the common schools throughout the State. So far from having two separate boards now, the superintendent of public instruction is ex officio a Regent of the University, and they all sit together and deliberate in regard to every important matter that concerns the educational interests of the State. They are now, therefore, virtually one board so far as any public benefit can be derived from their joint action. The gentleman from Richmond places us who oppose this article in a wrong position when he says that we rely upon the age, the "antiquity" of this board, and upon that solely for its defense. We have no such reliance, we make no such claim. They attack the institution for its age. It is too much the fashion in these days, Mr. Chairman, to attack things because of their age. They attack this as an ancient and "antiquated" institution. That was the language first used in this body last summer in regard to this Board of Regents, and it has been attacked here because it was "antiquated." We defend it against that attack. I know it is very much the fashion of late to condemn what is antiquated. Magna Charta is condemned because it is antiquated, and even the Constitution itself seems to have fallen into disfavor for the same reason. There is a growing disposition to condemn what is antiquated and to propose change though it be not reform; and I think that the spirit of change has led on the gentlemen who are engaged in this crusade against our academies, and led them on blindly, so that they have not looked fairly at the existing institutions, and the great and beneficent results that they have accomplished. But I do not intend to occupy too much of the time of the Convention upon this subject. I should regard it as exceedingly unfortunate if we should meddle with this subject at all in the Constitution. We should leave the Constitution as it is in this respect. The Legislature created the Board of Regents, and they have it entirely in their control, and can abolish it entirely if they will, and there is no necessity for any action by this Constitutional Convention on that subject. I think, too, that we shall create hostility to what we do here if we attempt to make any of the changes that are proposed in this respect. Sir, it is certain that during the time that these Regents have had charge of the colleges and academies, not one instance has ever occurred in which the charge has been made against them of partisanship. The board is made up of gentlemen of different political parties, the majority of them now belonging to that party to which I am opposed, but that is no reason for disturbing them. They do not meddle with the politics of the institutions under their charge. Not a living man will dare to charge that they have ever abused their trust in that respect, or in any other. Now, sir, what may be expected from this commission that is proposed? It is proposed that the new board of education shall serve without pay. If they did, so far they would do what the regents have done. And if they are to serve at all, I trust it is to be so. But depend upon it it will not be so. It is not the fashion of this day. The gentlemen at the bottom of this movement desire to create offices, and to fill them, not for the honor merely, not merely for the chance of doing good, but to enjoy among other things, a good fat salary connected with the office. Depend upon it, if this board is created, it will be with liberal salaries. Depend, too, upon another thing, if the institutions are taken from the Board of Regents, and put in charge of a body of this small number created as the Legislature may direct, those will be political offices, and it will not be long before the charge will be heard in different parts of the State, that in controlling your academies and colleges, and in visiting them, they are exerting a partisan influence upon the one side or the other; and the very moment that idea is suggested and believed, their usefulness is gone. Sir, this had better be avoided. It has been avoided in the past, by the system we have now, and we had better continue to avoid it in the same way. My friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], in closing his last speech, has changed the figure that he presented to us so beautifully. It is no longer a wrecked vessel that he prides himself upon steering against the rocks, but it is the self-sacrifice that he makes of which he now speaks, and it is true that he does offer to sacrifice his honors as a member of this board by the article that he presents. I admire the patriotic and self-sacrificing spirit of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. The ancient Curtius cast himself into the yawning gulf to save his country. His modern namesake would emulate his patriotism and imitate his example. [Laughter.] I admit that the gentleman from Richmond always acts most disinterestedly. I admire his singleness of purpose—the honesty with which he treats a question, as well as the eloquence with which he presents and advocates it. And although I almost always find myself obliged to differ from him in results, I do it always with regret; and I have only to say now, that if he persists in attempting this personal sacrifice, I trust this Convention by its vote will rescue him, if possible.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Verplanck to strike out all of the fourth section after the sixth line.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GRAVES—I hope that the committee will now rise and report for this reason.

The PRESIDENT—The question is not debatable.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. A. Brown, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Verplanck to strike out, and upon a division there were ayes 23, noes 23, no quorum voting.

Mr. MERRITT—I move that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. PROSSER from the Committee of the Whole, reported they had had under consideration the report of the Standing Committee on Education, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave to sit again, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CASE—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Case, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 21, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. KANEY.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I ask leave to make a report on the relations of the State to the Indians therein. I would state that the members of the committee whose names are not signed to this report dissent from it.

ARTICLE —.

§ 2. The Legislature shall have power to provide for an equitable subdivision of a necessary and sufficient portion of the several Indian reservations for the use and occupation in severalty of the several Indian tribes holding the same, and for the leasing any parts unapportioned; and any such subdivision and occupancy in severalty shall be deemed and taken to be the possession and occupancy of such tribe or nation, and the joint interest of any such Indian tribe shall not be dissolved except by their consent.

§ 3. The Legislature shall have power to confer citizenship on any of the Indians of this State, under such conditions and qualifications as shall be deemed wise and expedient.

I concur in the report except that part which permits the lands of the Indians to be taken for "manufacturing or other purposes."

N. G. AXTELL.

The Convention then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Standing Committee on Education, Mr. PROSSER, of Erie, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Verplanck, to strike out all of the fourth section after the sixth line.

Mr. McDONALD—I offer the following substitute:

SEC. 4. There shall be a superintendent of public instruction who shall hold his office for four years. He shall be elected by the electors of the State, and shall have such powers and perform duties, and receive such compensation as may be prescribed by law. There shall be a board of education of which the superintendent of public instruction shall be a member. Such board shall have exclusive administrative jurisdiction of all the educational interests of the State, subject to such laws regulating the same as the Legislature may from time to time enact. The Legislature at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the organization of said board of education, the number of its members, terms of office, election, appointment of other mode of choice or designation. But no person thus chosen or designated shall receive any pay or emolument for his services as a member of said board except his personal expenses necessary to the discharge of his duties as a member thereof.

I have listened to the eloquent discussion on this article, and it has convinced me that there should be only one board of education in this State, and I think the same conviction must have come to every hearer of the debate. As has been stated, the academies, colleges and common schools should be mutual aids to one another. The one should be a higher grade than the other of the same system, and all should be under the charge of the same board of education. I think, also, that the discussion has convinced us all that there should be a board of public instruction for this State. As to the mode in which the members of that board should be elected, appointed or designated, is the question about which there has not been so much said, and which is properly but incidentally in the discussion. As to the Board of Regents, on the one side, it has been claimed that the Board of Regents should be abolished. On the other side it has been claimed that it should not be; that whatever duties that board have had have been well done, and that if there is any fault in their administration, it arises from their want of sufficient power. The proposition I now offer is simply a declaration that there shall be one board, with exclusive administrative jurisdiction of the educational institutions of the State, and it leaves to the next Legislature after the adoption of this Constitution, if it shall be adopted, the organization of the board as to its term of office, and the designation of it. If the friends of the Board of Regents are right in their position here, the Legislature will simply designate the present Board of Regents to be this board, and thus give them the jurisdiction and powers that the Board of Regents has hitherto lacked, in order to make them an effective and working board; or if the Legislature think that a part of the Board of Regents should be retained, and a part of this new board made up of other members, they will do that. This proposition does exactly what the friends of the Board of Regents claim to desire It leaves to the Legislature the entire organization of the board, simply declaring as a principle that there shall be but one board. I ask to have the proposition divided. The first part, as will be seen, provides in the very terms of the section itself, only it provides that the superintendent shall be elected instead of being appointed; and the second proposition provides for a board of education. I ask, therefore, that the vote be taken separately upon the different parts of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN—The division will be made as the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] suggests.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move to amend the portion of the substitute intended to apply to the first portion of the section, by striking out the word "elected," and inserting "who shall be appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not now in order, there being already two pending.

Mr. KINNEY—I call for a division of the question, that a separate vote may be had upon that part of the substitute referring to the superintendent of public instruction. I desire that we shall vote upon that first. I think the provision recommended by the committee preferable to that of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald]; and by voting down that clause of his amendment, it will leave the balance of his substitute to apply to this subject now under consideration, and we can vote upon that as we please, untrammeled by the preceding clause.

Mr. LARREMORE—I do not quite understand, Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman means by the term "jurisdiction." If the proposed board is to exercise visitorial powers only, then the phraseology of the fourth section is too comprehensive, and to some extent, suspicious. Why ingraft upon an article conferring powers intended to be thus restricted, an implied constitutional right of legislation, by authority subsequently acquired. It is true, that the Legislature can confer such powers now, without the sanction of the organic law of the State, but would not such an act (however objectionable) derive additional importance from the fact, that a Convention called to revise such organic law, had anticipated the necessity and provided for its constitutional recognition. A bill introduced in the Legislature from the creation of such a board of education as is contemplated by this report would necessarily invite public scrutiny and criticism; but an act of that same Legislature, conferring like powers upon such a board already in existence by constitutional enactment, might and undoubtedly would, fail to awaken that corresponding attention and interest which a subject of such grave importance should demand. Let us examine the section which a majority of the committee have offered for adoption, and we will soon ascertain its fair interpretation and meaning. This State board of education is to have supervision of all the educational institutions of the State," and perform such other duties as the Legislature shall by law prescribe." Suppose the Legislature should authorize such board to make such laws, rules and regulations as the educational interests of the State should require. That board acting under such authority, and planting itself on the constitutional provisions of this section, could virtually absorb and exercise the entire legislation of every college, academy and school in the State. If judged to be expedient, that board might ordain that no person should be licensed to teach, unless professing a particular religious belief, or possessing certain qualifications as to nationality. If thought best, certain text books might be prescribed for the general use of the schools throughout the State, thus creating a vast monopoly, and excluding books of equal or of superior claim and merit. In the city of Boston (if I am correctly advised) but one set of text books is allowed in the public schools, and all these are of Boston publication. While, in the city of New York (under our present system) all books of merit find a ready market and due appreciation. Would the same liberality be assured by centralizing all the school legislation of the State in a board of seven men? I do not propose to enter upon a protracted discussion of all the objections that arise in the consideration of this subject. I desire briefly to present some of the suggestions urged in the deliberations of the committee, and which have influenced me in arriving at conclusions somewhat different from those entertained by a majority of my associates. I do not believe, sir, that it is possible to select any seven or twelve men—

Mr. McDONALD—I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it says administrative jurisdiction, not legislative jurisdiction.

Mr. LARREMORE—I was about to say, sir, that I do not believe that any seven or twelve men, whatever may be their ability or experience, can successfully legislate for the entire educational interests of this State. The wants of the people in this respect differ as much as the various localities in which they live. In the city of New York the system of education is somewhat different from the neighboring city of Brooklyn. The same may be said of the neighboring county of Westchester. Yet it is a difference in details and not one of general results. The school laws that we now have are especially adapted to the localities for which they were enacted. The people asked for them, and the Legislature, the representatives of the people, sanctioned that request and embodied it in our statute books. Now, it is proposed, virtually (for that is the manifest intention of this section), to take that privilege from the people and confer it upon a State board of general supervision, which will place all the institutions of learning upon the Procrustean bed of educational uniformity. Colleges, academies and common schools are all to be ground up together in order to effect the contemplated reform. And what should we gain by it? Is it pretended by the advocates of this measure that one set of rules and regulations would be alike applicable to college and school? If not, then how is this much desired uniformity to be brought about? Are the founders and trustees of endowed institutions to be brought in subjection to this board of general control? If its duties are to be supervisory, merely, then why not insert a constitutional restriction to that effect, and prohibit the exercise of legislative powers. The more I reflect upon the provisions of this section, the clearer it appears that the term "general supervision" means in reality nothing less than absolute control. With such impressions of its general scope and intent, it was but natural that I should dissent from the report of the majority upon this subject. Nor does there appear to be any necessity for the creation of such a board as is recommended by this report. If its duties are to be of a supervisory character only, such duties now are and for a long time have been intrusted to the Regents of the University, and it would be impracticable to have two boards invested with and exercising the same powers. One more suggestion, and I am ready to submit the whole question to the judgment of the Convention. Our common schools are the nurseries of the State. From them are derived the only educational advantages which the greater portion of the community enjoy. The nearer we can keep them to the people, the greater will be their efficiency and influence. Build up this wall of separation in the shape of a State board, and you shut out the sympathies and active participation of those for whom this great benefit was designed. But if, on the contrary, you assure them that the trust is theirs—that they are responsible for its faithful administration, a growing interest will always be perceptible in the popular mind, that will ultimately accomplish the great work of popular education.

Mr. CURTIS—I would remind the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Larremore] my associate on the committee, and who speaks with a great deal of weight upon this floor as the president of the board of education of that city, that the section, as reported by the committee, and as it now stands, attains precisely the objects which he states to be desirable. According to that section as reported, the State board shall have general supervision. That is the word of the article, that is the word of the gentleman—that this board shall have general supervision of the institutions of learning in the State. Then, sir, the gentlemen expresses a fear that this board may receive from the Legislature certain dangerous powers in the management and regulation of the schools. If he will look at the matter a little more closely he will see that beyond this supervisory power which he himself is willing to intrust to a supreme board, this board proposed by the committee shall perform such other duties as the Legislature may direct — only such other duties as the Legislature may direct; so that what he fears the Legislature might in some contingency do for the board here proposed to be created, the Legislature may to-day or any moment in the present, do for the present superintendent of education.

Mr. LARREMORE—May I ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] a question?

Mr. CURTIS—Certainly.

Mr. LARREMORE—Does not the Board of Regents have the general supervison of all the institutions of learning in this State?

Mr. CURTIS—Yes, a general supervision; but its special relations are to the colleges and academies. What I wished to say to my friend was, that substantially the objects which he has in view, the objects which he eloquently advocated in the committee, are, it seems to me, provided for in the section now under the consideration of this committee.

Mr. LARREMORE—If it be proposed to give nothing more than a mere general supervision, that object is already accomplished by the existing law.

Mr. CURTIS—That, sir, is unquestionably all that we ought to give.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I do not rise, sir, to make any extended remarks after this subject has already undergone such full discussion. I regret very much that I was not here a part of the day yesterday that I might have heard what arguments were advanced by gentlemen in favor of the abolition of the Board of Regents of this State. But I was present in the evening and heard the discussion which then took place, but failed to be convinced of the propriety of the fourth section of this article virtually abolishing that board. I do not mean to recapitulate the arguments in favor of continuing the Board of Regents of this State. I only rise now for the purpose of correcting one or two errors that I have discovered in the manuscript which has been laid upon our tables, and which purports to be one of the documents belonging to this Convention, although it has not been ordered to be printed by this body. Now, one single suggestion made here, I rise to protest against. I speak for my own county, I speak for the village in which I live, and in which one of the oldest academies in this State is situated. It is stated here as one reason why this board should be virtually abolished, that the colleges and academies are almost exclusively denominational schools, patronized and founded by the various religious denominations. Public money appropriated to them, is therefore indirectly used in propagating religious tenets, or, at any rate, in aid of competing sects. Now, where the information was obtained, or where it purports to have been obtained by those gentlemen who drew up this article, I am at a loss to determine. I can speak so far as my experience extends for the academies within my own neighborhood. There are four or five of them in the county of Washington, and among those is one at Salem, one of the earliest incorporated in the State, and one at Cambridge, twelve or fifteen miles south. Now, as regards these two academies, they have always enjoyed the reputation of being among the foremost in the State, and their reports to the Board of Regents of the University from year to year, show this to be so. They have always met with the approval of that board, and those two academies, so far from being denominational or sectarian, have always had their boards of trustees composed of men of the different denominations that are prevalent in that county—Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, and other denominations. Our board of trustees is composed of members of every one of those sects, all combined and united together to attain the one great object of educating and benefiting the young who come within their province. But there is another matter here which gives a flavor to this whole matter. On the tenth page of this document, there is a short paragraph in these words showing the spirit in which this project is gotten up and the feeling of hostility that is endeavored to be created between academies and common schools. The paragraph is this: "If the trustees and patrons desire to have schools in which their children may be educated separately from the children who attend common schools, let them do so at their own expense," in other words, let the whole of the money of the State be appropriated for the benefit of the common schools, and after children have arrived at an age when they need further and higher education, let them do without it, or let their parents furnish it to them at their own expense; but let all the appropriations of aid by the State, be confined to the A, B, C institutions, the common schools. Now sir, in the academy in my own town, so far from there being any rivalry between it and the common schools, the schools and the academy are both in the same building, and the pupils go from grade to grade, and from floor to floor, until they arrive at the highest grade in the academy.

Mr. RUMSEY—I desire to ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] whether in the academy that he speaks of in Salem, there is a primary department?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—There is sir.

Mr. RUMSEY—Belonging to the academy or subject to the control of the common school?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—Subject to the trustees of the academy, and under the immediate supervision of the board of education. They are all together, sir, and the institution has flourished and is flourishing, and as shown by the yearly reports, is continually increasing the number of its pupils, and if gentlemen will have the goodness to look at our reports for the last ten years, they will see the benefits that have been derived from this harmonious action. Therefore I protest against the assertion that this rivalry exists generally between the academies and common schools of the State; and I do certainly deny that it exists in my own village or neighborhood. The object of this communication is evident; it is to create a feeling against the academies and colleges, whereas, it is as much the duty of the State to foster those higher institutions as it is to foster the common schools. One needs the other, is dependent upon the other, and it is because our higher institutions have not been so generally fostered by the State, as those of other States have been fostered, that their reputation is not so good as that of some of the institutions of some of the other States. Now, sir, I am just informed that in another county there are nine academies, and that there is not the least hostility between them and the common schools. A single word, sir, in regard to the manner in which these petitions were obtained. Why, I have seen in my own county, a secret circular signed by certain gentlemen, chiefly residents of the city of Albany, requesting that this petition might be circulated as far as possible among the inhabitants of our county, and returned as speedily as possible to this city, the headquarters of this movement, and the point at which the war commenced. Is this attack upon the Board of Regents, and upon the academies and colleges of the State called for? Have we any evidence of any wish on the part of the people, or of the educational institutions of the State for the abolition of the Board of Regents? Why, sir, let gentlemen look at their files, and they will find, I think, not a single petition signed by the board of trustees of an academy in favor of the abolition of the Board of Regents, but on the contrary, they will find remonstrances from all of them. The trustees of our academy had a meeting on this subject, and they unanimously determined to remonstrate against the abolition of the board. Sir, if I do nothing else here, I must raise my voice and my hand in protest against this proposed abolition. Having done this, I have fulfilled the instructions given me by the board of trustees of our academy, and I repeat, that, in my judgment, there is not a single academy in the State from which a petition can be found in favor of this abolition.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I desire to ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] if the academy of which he speaks, is not a part of the common school system of the village, made so by special act of the Legislature?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—We had a special act creating a board of education in our village, and authorizing the academy to unite with them.

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether the school or the academy of which he speaks, is not what is known in this State as a union school?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—No, sir; there are several union schools in our county.

Mr. CURTIS—But is not the one at Salem a union school?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—No, sir, not in the sense of the word in which the gentleman uses it; although we have all become united in the great object we have in view. These schools are in the lower part of our academy, and they are all united together under the charge of the board of trustees.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—Is it not under the supervision of the superintendent of public instruction?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—No, sir; not particularly.

Mr. ARCHER—Does not the school of which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] speaks, participate also in the common school fund?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I do not say that it does not participate in the common school fund. Perhaps it does receive such share, as it may be entitled to under the common school laws.

Mr. ARCHER—In what respect then does that school differ from our union schools?

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—It differs in this particular, that it is united in one common effort with the academy for the advancement of education from the lowest to the highest branches. I repeat, there is no hostility between the academies and common schools of the State, so far as my experience extends, and so far as institutions in my own village and neighborhood are concerned, I utterly deny that there is any such feeling. On the contrary, they work harmoniously with each other for the attainment of the great object which they all have in view, and there is a unity and efficiency of co-operation between the board of education which has charge of our common schools and the trustees of our academy, all being under the general supervision of the trustees of the academy. I hope that the motion to strike out the fourth section will prevail.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—The statement of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] goes to show the wisdom of what the Committee on Education design to do, to make to the extent that it is possible a unit of our system of education. The institution in the village of which he speaks is now existing under a special act of the Legislature, by which the common schools of that village are combined with the academy. The same institution is subject to the visitation of the Board of Regents, and it is also subject to examination by, and liable to make its reports to the superintendent of public instruction, and therefore it forms in itself a combination of both systems. Now, the object of the committee, as I understand it, is to organize in the Constitution a single system for the educational institutions of this State. I have no design to participate generally in this discussion, preferring to leave it to abler delegates than myself. But I desire to say one thing here, that I disclaim entirely any feeling of hostility against the higher institutions of learning in this State. And on the part of gentlemen who vote with the committee, I affirm that they entertain no such feeling. They justly attach to the common school system, being that department which lays the foundation for all future education, and in which all the children of the State have an opportunity to be educated, a greater importance than they do to the other departments; but far be it from any one of them to be opposed to the higher branches of learning, or to the institutions which teach them. Far rather would they foster the building up of those institutions, and elevate the standard of education generally; and it is for the reason that they may be successfully elevated, that they want to make the system a unit, harmonious and complete from the primary department up to the highest. Is there any impropriety in that? Look at the history of the educational interests of this State from the beginning, and you will find that this proposed measure is a necessity growing out of our present condition, and every year will demonstrate more and more clearly the necessity of making our system of education a unit. This important discussion has disclosed a fact of which I was not aware before, that there is a growing jealousy between the common schools and the institutions for teaching the higher branches of learning; and if no other reason existed that would be a sufficient reason for providing an educational system out of which no such jealousies could arise. I am therefore in favor of the report of the committee, so far as it proposes a single system for the whole State.

Mr. CURTIS—Do I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. McDonald] to be a substitute for the fourth section?

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair so understands it.

Mr. McDONALD—It is so intended.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I hope the amendment will not prevail. I moved to strike out the proposition of the Committee on Education to establish a new board having entire control of the educational interests of the State. The proposition of the committee was only another way of saying that this Convention should abolish the Board of Regents of the University. Now, sir, the good ship "Regents of the University" has been several times carried among the breakers by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] and it is perhaps proper this morning that we should examine her condition and see whether we shall take to the boats and leave her to her fate, or like gallant sailors stand by and try to bring her safe into port. The argument of the gentleman from Richmond stripped of its glittering generalities and the ornaments with which he has so profusely decorated it, is simply this, that there should be a board of education in this State and that the superintendent of schools should be associated with other persons to make up this new board, and that the powers conferred upon the Board of Regents should be taken away from them and given to this new board, and that there should not be two boards of education. That, as far as I understand it, is the whole of the argument of the gentleman from Richmond, from the time he commenced this discussion until, to the delight of the auditory, he arrayed himself in shining garments at the close. I will content myself with replying to some of the arguments of the gentleman, and leave the rest of what he has been pleased to say to abler gentlemen of this Convention. By adopting the article contained in this report we have provided that the superintendent of public instruction shall be a constitutional officer. Not satisfied with this, it is proposed that he shall be one of a new board to which the interests of common schools shall be referred. In reply to that proposition, I say that no such board is necessary, because that interest has been well cared for in the past, either by the Secretary of State or in the superintendent of public instruction, and the common schools have been well and successfully carried on under the present system, and that no complaint has at any time been made to the public or the Legislature of any want of care of the interests of the common schools. If we establish this new board, the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], claims that as there should not be two boards, we must do another thing. What is that? Why it is to take from the Board of Regents all the powers they now have except the charge of the State library and of this museum collection. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it would not be quite as proper, if it is necessary to commit the care of common schools to a board to give it to the Board of Regents, and if necessary associate with them the superintendent of public instruction, so far as concerns the common schools? The gentleman has conceded that this Board of Regents is composed of some of the ablest men in the State, men who are not active politicians, and that their duties have always been ably performed. If that is the case, how can you get a better board, and what becomes of the argument, the sole argument, of the gentleman which he has reiterated so often here, that we must adopt this proposition because there should not be two boards of education. But there are objections to this Board of Regents and one of them is, that it is not a new board. It cannot be said of it that it is without experience or that it does not enjoy the entire confidence of the institutions of learning of this State of which it has had the care for more than eighty years. We have had an annual Legislature, and several conventions, since its creation, but the proposition has never before this time been made to abrogate or abolish it; and it has been left for this Convention to strike the first blow at that venerable and useful institution. That no attempt has been made to abolish it or reduce its powers is the best eulogy that can be pronounced upon it, the best evidence that it has performed its duties well. Instead of taking away any of its powers, the Legislature within the last ten years have greatly added to those powers. I beg this committee to leave the matter where it is now, with the Legislature which has entire control of the subject and will take care of the educational interests of the State as it has done heretofore. I ask this Convention not to meddle with the subject, but if they do meddle with it, I beg them not to try the rash experiment of a new board which will result in dragging our educational institutions into the all absorbing vortex of politics.

Mr. SMITH—I beg pardon for rising again, as I have already occupied some time upon this question. I rise to make a single remark in regard to a point to which I wish to call the attention of the committee before they vote upon this question. It impresses me as a matter of so much importance that I do not feel at liberty to allow the vote to be taken without calling the attention of the committee to it. It will be perceived that by the scheme of this article, the superintendent of public instruction is to be the head and front of the new board. I fear—

Mr. ARCHER—In what part of the proposed article does the gentleman find that?

Mr. SMITH—I fear, sir—and it is to this point that I ask attention—that this scheme will create a political machine of a very dangerous character. Now, I will answer the gentleman. It is found in this portion, which reads, "The Legislature at the same session shall create a State board of education, to consist of seven members; of which board the superintendent of public education, the Secretary of State, and the Comptroller, ex officio, shall form a part." This places him at the head of the new board, which, undoubtedly, is the programme. Now, as we have seen, the superintendent of public instruction can sit in his office in the city of Albany, send out his petitions all over the State, into every school district, to teachers, county commissioners, and others intimately connected with the common school system, and make them his agents to procure signatures to petitions with which this Convention has been flooded, for the overthrow of the present Board of Regents. This fact shows the power which he possesses: and if the colleges and academies are also to be placed under his control, and he is to sit here as an autocrat over all, he can exert a power for political purposes such as no other officer under our republican form of government can exercise, and none ought to possess. I therefore invite the serious attention of the committee to this scheme, which constitutionalizes a political machine of such vast power and dangerous tendency.

Mr. CURTIS—I certainly cannot permit so important a proposition in regard to the intention and effect of this provision made in the presence of so many gentlemen who were not present during the debate yesterday, to pass, without saying a word in defense of this report, and, indeed, in defense of the personal honor of the committee themselves. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith], I have only to say that they are a sufficient answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], who preceded him. The gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] says that the superintendent of education as a member of this proposed new board, will have a vast political power in the State, in the way he has described. I will remind the gentleman that the difference between the recommendation which the Committee on Education made to the Convention, and the present system which the gentleman wishes to maintain is that at present all the power which he speaks of as inhering in that officer now to be made a member of the board of education, is within the sole discretion of the superintendent of public instruction; whereas in the system provided by the committee, there is to be a board of education, of which the superintendent is himself only a member, and to the supervision and control of which all of his acts are to be subjected. Therefore, sir, the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] who has already voted that there shall be a superintendent of public instruction, and who fears the introduction of political elements into the educational system of this State by the proposition of the committee, has voted for an officer who now exists and who, if he chooses to be a political officer, is uncontrolled, and absolute, and he votes against the proposition of the committee that the action of this officer shall be supervised and controlled by the board of education. I say, therefore, that the remarks of the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] are a complete answer to those of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] upon that subject; but to say this was not my object in rising. I had the honor of calling the attention of the committee yesterday to the extraordinary course pursued by the opponents of the article submitted by the Committee on Education. I said that it appeared to be the intention of those gentlemen to avoid the issue that was raised, and had I been in any doubt upon that point during the morning session, my previous impression was confirmed by what occurred in the evening. I propose to recur for a moment, not having had the opportunity last evening, to the extraordinary course of remark pursued by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. After this proposition had been under discussion in this committee for some time the gentleman from Onondaga, as if the Committee on Education had been engaged in a conspiracy or plot, or were urged by some private motive or passion, rises in his place, and says that in order to test the sincerity of the committee in their recommendations he will propose an amendment. Sir, I am far from charging the gentleman with having fully considered the extent of meaning which may fairly be applied to his words. The sincerity of the committee—in order to test that he proposes an amendment. Well, sir, what was the amendment? Assuming that the Committee on Education wished to create, either for themselves or in obedience to some secret influence behind them, a vast array of new political officers to be paid by the State, he proposes as a test that the officers so created shall not be paid. The committee, having no such intention as that which he ascribes to them, and being under no such influences as he suspects, at once accepts the proposition that these four persons to be appointed or elected to these offices shall be unpaid. The sincerity of the committee having survived this test, what is the next movement of the gentleman? He takes up a document laid on our table last evening—so far as appears here a purely individual and unauthorized document, unknown certainly to every member of the Committee on Education, and unknown I presume to every member of this Convention—

Mr. RUMSEY—May I call the attention of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] to the fact that he is doing injustice to the persons who have signed this document. It is a communication that was sent to the President of this Convention, a communication which is upon our files and is a part of the record of the proceedings of the Convention.

Mr. CURTIS—So far, sir, I am corrected, but has it been officially brought to the knowledge of the Convention?

Mr. RUMSEY—It is a communication sent to our President of the Convention and by him submitted to the Convention.

Mr. CURTIS—Was it read when submitted?

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir; it was referred to the Committee on Printing, to see whether it should be printed or not, and they have not yet reported.

Mr. CURTIS—Then I am correct in saying that it had not come to the knowledge of the members of this committee or of the Convention until it was laid on our tables last evening. But my object in referring to this document, is to show the course of the gentlemen who have conducted the argument here in opposition to the recommendations of the Committee on Education. Their whole argument, substantially, has been based upon and sustained by the statements made by this (so far as the Convention is concerned) hitherto unknown document. Now, having tested the sincerity of the Committee on Education, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] betakes himself to what? Why, sir, to endeavoring to sustain the very theory upon which he proposed to test their sincerity, that there was some sort of plot or conspiracy, some personal passion or prejudice of which the committee, unknowingly to themselves, had been made the tool on the floor of this Convention. Now, sir, I will characterize the argument of the gentleman. In the course of our deliberations here we have perfected an article on the judiciary. In that article we have extended the term of office of a judge of the court of appeals to fourteen years. I will suppose that during the discussions upon that point, it had come to the knowledge of the gentleman from Onondaga that Mr. John Jones or Mr. John Smith, of this city, or of some other city in the State, was opposed to the present system of the judiciary, and was in favor of a fourteen years term for judges of the court of appeals; that having been brought to the knowledge of this fact, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] should rise upon the floor of the Convention and open an attack upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, recommending the extension of the term to fourteen years and should flourish a paper in the faces of the committee, and say that he had discovered the secret of this recommendation, and it was this, that Mr. John Jones, of Cattaraugus, or Suffolk, or Albany, or some other county, was very sure that he could be elected a judge of the court of appeals and wished to sit for a term of fourteen years. Now, sir, I have no doubt that if the gentleman should urge any such argument as that, this committee would judge his conduct precisely as I am sure upon reflection, they must have judged his conduct last evening. Well, sir, I listened with eagerness to the remarks of the gentleman to discover why this recommendation of a general board of education was not agreeable to the interests of education in this State, and I am obliged to say that I failed to see it. He declared that in some way or other the propositition was a war upon the academies of the State. He declared that our academies were to be deprived of that bounty which they now receive, and that this was a part of this vast conspiracy, this enormous mare's nest, which is even larger than those which usually reward the researches of that gentleman—this great conspiracy to put certain persons in power who would thereupon proceed to wreak their vengeance upon the academies and to sacrifice them to the common schools. Now, what was the authority for all this? Why, sir, it was the opinion of the half-dozen gentlemen whose names are signed to this argument. That was his only authority. There was nothing in the report of this committee to warrant his statements, no authority whatever except the opinions and statements of these half-dozen gentlemen upon which to base this theory of an enormous conspiracy against the academies for the benefit of the public school system, and to create several political officers for the benefit of favorites. I can find nothing further in the speech of the gentleman from Onondaga. But

> Soon as the shades o'er Syracuse prevail,
> 'Tis Albany takes up the wondrous tale:

and no sooner had the argument and the citations of the gentleman from Onondaga ceased, than the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] arose. What did the gentleman from Albany tell us? Repeating the argument of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], he told us that this was an assault upon the academies; and in the impressive manner in which he always utters his sentiments on the floor of this house, he called our attention to the fact that in some manner the revenues of the State now devoted to the interests of the academies were to be diverted. His attention was instantly drawn to the statement in the first section of the article reported by the committee (which repeats the provision of the ninth section of the present Constitution, so far as this is concerned) that "the revenues of said common school fund shall be applied to the support of common schools, the revenues of said literature fund shall be applied to the support of academies." Sir, that had been already constitutionally agreed upon, and being brought to the attention of the gentleman from Albany, he tells us that the present revenue of the literary fund is very small, that it is only twelve or fifteen thousand dollars a year, and that the sum annually divided, under the present system, among the academies for various purposes, amounts to about forty thousand dollars; the difference between the small revenue of the fund and the amount distributed being made up by the Legislature. Well, sir, our duty is with the Constitution, and I ask the gentleman, and I ask the committee so far as academies are concerned in the Constitution, what is the difference of the basis? The Constitution at present declares that the revenue of the literature fund shall be applied to the academies; the article under the Constitution which we propose restates exactly the provision of the present Constitution. The gentleman says it is raised to forty thousand dollars by act of the Legislature. Is there any thing in this section—is there anything in the action of the Convention which, in that respect, binds the action of the Legislature? Has any body proposed to forbid the Legislature to increase the sum? For what purpose is the sum of the revenue of the literature fund for the benefit of academies raised to forty thousand dollars? Plainly that the objects which are supposed to be sought by the academic institutions and which have approved themselves to the judgment of the Legislature, may be attained, and I look in vain in the article reported by the committee, as I look in vain in the intentions of the committee in reporting the article to find any reason why, if the Legislature next year or twenty years thereafter, should choose to devote enough to make that sum forty thousand dollars, they should not do it! Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly plain that there is nothing, so far as the suggestions of the committee are concerned, which affects the relations of the academies to the State, and then, what is the retreat of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker]? He says and it is the same doctrine that has been suggested by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], that if the committee shall have their way, then, somehow or other the Legislature is to be put under the influence of this vast conspiracy, and that they will be cajoled into reducing this appropriation possibly to the bare ten or fifteen thousand dollars. This may be, in the opinion of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], and in the opinion of some subsequent Legislature, a wise disposition of the funds at its disposal. But I deny entirely, in the name of the committee, any such intention on their part in the section they have submitted to this Convention, and I repel the imputations the gentleman means to convey by the course of remark in which he indulges. Then, pushed to the wall by the denial of the chairman of the Committee on Education that there was any such conspiracy or intention, being told on the authority of the Committee of Education that the whole system reported by them was framed with grave deliberation, after a survey of the whole educational interests of this State, and before a single petition was laid upon the table of this Convention, and before it was known to that committee that there was any more than a general feeling in regard to the management of the educational affairs of this State, I say that the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], receiving this denial of the chairman of the Committee on Education, does what? He waits, and another member of the committee rises and excuses himself in person; he waits, and another member of the committee excuses himself in person. Then, after it is shown that the academies are not to be defrauded, and that the document hostile to the academy interest had no influence whatever upon the conclusions of the committee, the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] can find no other resource, and says he is willing to hear any other gentleman "who comes to the confessional." He calls the action of the committee in utterly repudiating baseless insinuations, coming to the confessional. I say, sir, that, in my judgment, the result did not leave the committee kneeling at the confessional but it left the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] and his friends at the bar of the candor and intelligent judgment of this Convention. In regard to the general project, Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee. The proposition is simply this, that the interest of education in this State, which is one, which consists of the common school system and the union schools as a part of it, and the academies and colleges, toward which the State has borne certain relations, and all constituting the highest interest of the State—an interest far greater than any interest which it possesses at this moment—that this vast and comprehensive interest be placed under the charge of one department. My friend from Fulton [Mr. Smith] asked with eagerness what is the reason? Why not permit the present state of things to continue? The reason is plain, that the duties of one board which now exists as I have shown are duties that could be easily and more wisely discharged without the existence of a separate board. Having shown that, we say there is a necessity for a unification. By the unification of this system the government is simplified, and our duty as a Constitutional Convention with reference to the government of the State is, so far as we can, to simplify it in every direction. Having shown that the great object was not hostility to the Regents of the University, that it was not hostility to the academies, and not for the arrangement of the manner in which the regents had discharged their duty, but that it was regard for the great interests of the State, and a desire that they might be simple, and not complicated as they now are, which induced the committee to report the section—having shown all these things, the gentleman still professes to see no reason why this change should take place! I repeat for the information of the gentleman, that this change is not sought because it is supposed that the Board of Regents have in the past, or will hereafter fall short of their duty. It is because the method which the committee propose is simpler, less cumbrous, and more attractive to the whole spirit of our system than the state of things which now exists. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] has told us of the condition of the academy in his town, and that seems to be an illustration of the very difficulty in which this State is placed, and which we wish to avoid. He says that there is a certain feeling of hostility somewhere. The academies are of opinion that, if the present state of things is changed, they are to be exposed to some undue wrong. Sir, the academies will find that they have precisely the same constitutional protection under the care of this Board as they have under the present Constitution. In citing the case of the academy in his county, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] probably cited the case of one of these schools which are subject in one department to a committee of visitation from the Board of Regents, and in the other to the care of the superintendent of public instruction. That is an illustration of the whole system. It has been found that the union schools in this State are peculiarly vigorous. Is there any reason why so vigorous a system of schools should not maintain the position under a single system which they have always maintained under a double system of supervision? I repeat that none of the gentlemen who have conducted the opposition upon this floor have yet shown a solitary reason why that single system should not prevail. I trust, therefore, that upon reflection, the gentlemen of the Convention, after having fully ascertained, and being sure, so far as it is possible for them to receive assurance from "purely impracticable" and "purely poetic" gentlemen, who it seems—and I hope not to the serious injury of the State—are gathered upon this floor by the side of "practical" gentlemen speaking through the lips of the gentlemen from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], will still find sufficient reason in the great and simple facts of the case, (which the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] complains we reiterate, and reiterate and reiterate as if, sir, in defending a particular point which was attacked on various sides, it was not necessary always to stand in the same position, and always to maintain precisely the point occupied) I hope, I say, sir, this committee will find in these facts that there is no great conspiracy against the academies of this State, that the proposition of the committee preserves intact all the rights of the academies, and that their proposed substitute, for the present arrangement for the care of the educational interests of the State, has been prepared in the highest interest of that great subject. The committee come to this subject with minds as unprejudiced as to any subject which has been submitted to any committee, or adopted by the Convention; they come to it. feeling, with all men, that this interest, which is the corner-stone of the safety, prosperity and permanence of republican institutions, should have no divided or uncertain care. After all I have said in this debate, sir, I heartily beg pardon for having again detained the committee so long.

Mr. ALVORD—In rising to answer the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] in the remarks which he has undertaken to make particularly complimentary to myself, I am sorry to learn now that the equanimity of the gentleman has been so much disturbed by the argument I made last evening, as to cause this apparent personal attack upon myself. I had supposed, sir, that during the entire of this Convention the gentleman and myself, with the exception of his hobby in reference to women and this question, acting cordially together, that there was no necessity of ascribing to me any personal motives against the committee, of which he has the honor to be the chairman, in the remarks I made. I believe I understand enough of parliamentary law and parliamentary courtesy to know that outside of the way in which I personally ought to treat gentlemen as a committee, it was not my province and privilege, and I did not intend in any terms or any words to allude to the Committee on Education. We were in Committee of the Whole here, and I alluded only, or I thought I alluded, in the usual strict words in the matter, to the Committee of the Whole, in the remarks that I made in reference to the compensation of these individuals. I had not the slightest idea of alluding to the Committee on Education, and I trust that the gentleman will take this statement not by way of apology, but by way of putting myself rectus in curia. Sir, I undertake to say to the Committee of the Whole who had this matter in charge (it having been taken away from the Committee on Education, and become the property of another committee of this Convention), in so far forth as it regarded themselves, as there seemed to be an apparent majority in favor of the proposition which was then under consideration, that I would test the sincerity of that Committee of the Whole here upon the subject, whether or not this board should be elected with or without compensation, or whether it should be created under the same laws under which the regents exist. Now, again, in the further portion of my remarks, I am inclined to think that in the repetition of them they will gain still greater force, for I have not seen upon the floor of this house, from the beginning to the end, a gentleman under any circumstances get up and appear to be so completely overwhelmed by argument as the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. He has the power by legitimate and straightforward argument, without any necessity whatever to refer to persons, or undertake to throw by mere sneer or sarcasm upon the argument of men—I say he has the power, and enough argument upon which he can stand, outside of a resort to personal attacks of this kind, to stand against the strongest man in this Convention, when soundness of views are his, and I am afraid that his whole armory of legitimate argument has been lost again by the argument made upon the other side, and he has been compelled to resort to the argument of personal attack, the last I supposed he would undertake to use in a matter of this kind. Sir, in reference to this subject, I had supposed that the remarks which I had made had carried with themselves, so far as they were concerned, the conclusion that we looked not to the Committee on Education, but we looked to that which was behind, the Committee on Education talking to us as a part of the public of this State in reference to the question. I take it, sir, that wherever may have come the animus of the Committee on Education in making up this report, when we find those who are ostensibly from among the people, presenting themselves before us upon a platform distinct and marked, we have a right legitimately to use as an argument the position taken from these supporters of the Committee on Education among the body of the people. We have a right to argue and to deduce from what they say in reference to the matter, what will be the result if the scheme of the committee shall be carried out. It is not because the Committee on Education desire it—it is not because their idea is that this will be the result; but it is because these men who stand behind, who are sending up petitions clearly, plainly and indisputably marking the course they are to take, that we have a right to argue that this will be the conclusion of the matter. I think, sir, that I have said sufficient on this point. I will come now legitimately to the matter under discussion. Now, sir, the Committee of the Whole (not the Committee on Education, which I shall specify by name hereafter when I mean that committee), have concluded to insert the amendment which I offered here in reference to this matter, that the board shall serve without salary or compensation of any kind. I am of the opinion, sir, that that renders doubly sure, and beyond all controversy and doubt, that this board of education, if put into the Constitution, and made a part of the fundamental law of the land, erects an autocrat in the person of the superintendent of public education, over the educational institutions of this State. These men, acting as his advisers, come up here as a board from time to time to consult with him, and they will be completely and wholly under his control —he standing in his position here as the head of the educational interests of the people of the State of New York, dictating and controlling in all matters connected with the interests of the State. Now, sir, I undertake to say that there is not, and that there cannot be, any sort of office created in this State, that will begin to have the political power, and the political influence of the office thus created—the minister of public instruction. His power permeates throughout the entire of this State. The canals run only through portions of the State, and the power of the parties who may have them in control, is limited to those lines. But, sir, so far as it regards the power of this superintendent, it goes, to use the words of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] last night, from Buffalo on the one side to Greenport on the other, into every single nook and corner of the State—into every school district. Sir, it begins its work at the very foundation of society; for however ignorant man may be in this enlightened age, however neglected they may have been in their younger years in the way of education, there is hardly a man so poor, or so low, or so debased, but who desires the education of his children. He desires that they shall take a higher point in the world than his father had before him. And the children of these men are at the disposal of the teacher so far as it regards the matter of education, and the power of the teacher is controlled by the superintendent of public instruction. And sir, that officer has a gigantic and immense power which may sap the very foundations of the government of this State, instead of educating our people to the full appreciation of the benefits of Republican institutions. I say that this power is one that we should not crystalize into the Constitution; it should be kept in the hands of the people; it should be kept where the hands of the Legislature could reach it, and who know the wants of the people so far as respects the matter of education, and they can from time to time control and regulate. I agree with the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], that education lies at the very foundation of the prosperity of our country; that it shall do no harm, but that good shall come from it should be our aim. Now, sir, in that light, I have the right to use the argument of those who, outside of this Convention, are the only ones who appear at its bar to represent them, and I have still further a right to quote from that celebrated document which has been so often spoken of. I desire here to say, and I can repeat to the members of this committee, that there has been an undue anxiety on the part of the men who are undertaking to foist this matter into the Constitution, by the manner in which they have proceeded in regard to this matter of getting it before us upon our desks. They were aware of the fact that by the deliberate vote of this Convention, the communication had been sent to the Committee on Printing to determine whether or no the document should be printed. They were not willing to await the action of that committee; they were not willing to await the action of this Convention in reference to the placing of this document upon our files; but, sir, simulating in all respects, except the putting in the number of the document, the form and shape of our documents, they have printed it and laid it upon our table in order that it should take a part in these deliberations. What other object was there in regard to it? It being before us in this form and in this shape, we have a right to use it for the purposes of this argument. Now, sir, we have a communication which has been printed by this Convention, under its rules, from the Board of Regents, and in that communication we find that these parties who have laid this document upon our table are the original authors of all these stereotyped petitions which have come to us upon this subject, and that they send at the same time they send these stereotyped petitions through the State, a circular, and in that circular they state what their object, desires and intentions are in regard to this matter. I have a right to say here, outside of the Committee on Education, and nothing whatever to do with the Committee on Education, what the intentions of those who pressed this matter are, what will be the legitimate and ultimate result of the action of this Convention in making the section now under consideration a part of the fundamental law of the land. I will read the second paragraph of the instructions which they send out with the petitions. I read:

"The memorial is sent to you in the belief that you fully indorse the free school law of 1867 and desire the complete triumph of the free school system, as well applied to the higher as to the common schools."

So that their object and their aim is to cut down the academies and universities of the State and compel them to come under the iron rule of this superintendent, and share the common fate of the common schools of the country. That, sir, is what we are opposed to. Now, sir, there is no need of discussing it. We might as well talk plain face to face in reference to this matter. There is in this State, as there is in every other State, no matter how republican may be its form or theory of government, a difference among the people. Some from necessity are poorer than others in this world's goods. Some from necessity have a different organization of the mind, and are in favor of removing their children, so far as their education is concerned, to another and different sphere from the ordinary school education of the country. They will do it, sir, and that class of men in this State, I am happy and proud to say, appreciate the benefits and advantages of education, and believe in the necessity as a preventive of crime, and as an advantage to the growth of the country, that the children of the State should be educated, and they have been the most ready and the most eager in the past history of the State to promote the largest amount of taxation to be had among the people, that the greatest amount of benefit shall be assured to the children of the State in their education. There is no difference of opinion or sentiment in this regard. Whence comes the money for the support of the common schools? It comes from those men who are supporting your academies and your colleges, it comes from the men whose means are abundant, and they do not wish to be compelled by any solemn enactment of the Constitution, to send their children, as they will necessarily, from out the bounds of the State into other localities, for the purpose of education, rather than to be compelled to come so far as regards the educational interests of the State, under the iron rule which this board will bring about. And it is for this reason, among others, that I am opposed to the idea of the change. What is the difficulty? What is the trouble under the existing state of things? Let me look a little into the record. In 1867 there was a law passed by the Legislature of this State, authorizing the trustees of any of the academies within the limits of the State to surrender their franchises under certain conditions, and the academies to become union schools of the country. Under that law, those academies which thus surrender their franchises, become part and parcel of the common school system of the country, if they desire to, by their own motion. But, sir, in portions of the State, for instance in Salem, in Washington county, and in Watertown, in Jefferson county, the academies did not desire to go to that length. They desired to retain, so far as a portion of the organization was concerned, the academic form. And they had special laws passed, authorizing the establishment of primary institutions, leaving the custody, and ownership, and management of the higher branches of education in the trustees, as originally granted—marrying, as it were, the two systems together, one under the common school idea, and the other under the academic idea. No sort of protest or objection, but, on the contrary, the hearty concurrence of the Board of Regents of the University has been had in reference to this movement. They have not attempted in the Legislature, they have not sent circulars to the academies, nor undertaken to use any efforts to prevent this. They leave this matter to the trustees to do as they shall see fit, allowing them to judge what the best interests of their locality and of the State require under the circumstances, and leaving it to the Legislature of this State, from time to time to make special enactments in reference to the subject, as parties shall come up and ask them at their hands. There is, therefore, no difficulty, none whatever, in this translation, if necessary, of the academies of the State into the plan of union schools, or the transfer of some portion of the funds of the academy to the control of the superintendent of public instruction for the benefit of the schools that have thus changed their plans. Now, sir, another thing—and I am only reiterating possibly in this regard an argument which has been used upon this floor, and which it seems to me has great force and weight in it. You propose in this proposition creating and crystalizing in the Constitution this system of education, to make seven men a board of education, one of them the superintendent of public instruction, two others of whom are ex officio members of the board, and of course are men who are elected through political considerations, and who being merely ornamental as members of this body will never be selected by their political party with reference to any duties that they are to perform in this board; men who from the necessity of their position will reflect not only their political sentiments but must also work for the accomplishment of the political ends of their party. Then, so far as it regards at least two of the three ex officio members of the contemplated board, they must of necessity be and cannot avoid being political rather than educational in their desires and inclinations. Then what do you do next? You come down to the selection of four members of the board by the Legislature, or I care not in what way, either by the voice of the people or otherwise, they must of necessity be elected, so far as they are concerned and they always will be with reference to their political position; and they, sir, as well as we, knowing the tremendous political force that can be exerted by the head of an institution like that, permeating all over the State of New York, if they shall agree with the political superintendent who is at the head of that department, they will enjoin upon him the exercise of political power for the purpose of building up their political hopes and aspirations. In this connection permit me to say, although it has been hinted to me privately outside of the Convention by members here, but notwithstanding that I desire to place myself right before this committee and before the world, that my opposition in this matter grows out of no hostility to the present superintendent of instruction. I have counted upon him in the past as I count upon him to-day, and I trust that I count knowing what I believe and think is true, as a warm and devoted friend of mine personally. I believe, so far as it regards the administration of the trust that has been imposed upon him by the people of this State, he has done it admirably and well in the past, and would continue to do so in the future, if he were permitted by the exigencies of the time longer to retain his position. Therefore my remarks have nothing whatever to do with him. The term of his office is fixed and settled. The flat has gone forth through the statutes of this State, and his mantle is to descend to his successor, who is to be of a different political faith from that which he has. Therefore, so far as it regards the insinuation that personal motives entered into the controversy, so far as I have any regard to this matter, I make this simple denial of it in this way. But I tell you that the superintendent of public instruction in the future of public education, could not depart from the political duties that are put upon him, no matter how you may name him. For men will always be politicians, and the result will be that this great system of education will be a foot-ball in the politics of the State of New York. It may be, sir, that I look upon this with gloomy eyes and with clouded vision; but if there is so great a necessity for this great reform which gentlemen desire to put into this Constitution, can they not do it—have they not the power to do it through the Legislature? If it shall work badly, and does not meet the anticipations of those who framed it, then it will be in the power of the Legislature to remedy that difficulty, and the ship of education can ride on in its course in safety. But if they put it in the Constitution, there the system will remain unalterably fixed for twenty years or more. While that power has rested with the Legislature from the foundation of our government, while there has been no desire or attempt to crystalize a board of education in the Constitutions of 1777, 1821 or 1846, and while the people of the State of New York have made such rapid strides in their educational interests, I think that we should leave the future interests of education in the same hands until it has been shown that under their auspices it works badly. Sir, I ask any man, and I speak it with pride as a citizen of the State of New York, to go over the broad expanse of this Union and point out to me in any State, old or young, where the results of common school education have been so beneficial to the interests of the people as the common school instruction of the State of New York. Sir, it is a bright glory of the people of this State that it is so. And sir, let the matter be as it has been in the past, and from time to time, as the necessity shall arise for a change in its organization, and its administration, that change can be worked out by the hands of the people speaking through the Legislature; but do not mold or make it so hard or so inflexible, that it cannot in one jot or tittle be altered or changed for the better. That is my view in regard to this matter. I have been so far as I am concerned, honest in the opposition which I have made. I stand upon what I believe to be the best interest of this State. I speak, sir, not because of personal feelings against this, or that, or the other man, but simply from the solemnity of the oath that I have taken here to do that which I regard as best for the interest of this State, and as a member of this Constitutional Convention. And I wish to say another thing before I conclude, I do not drop it as a fire-brand either. I ask gentlemen to reflect upon the matter for themselves. There has been, sir, in the past a great difficulty and trouble growing out of the administration of our common school system for reasons that will make themselves obvious when I name them. There has been probably good cause for the complaint. I refer to the constantly recurring change of class books in the common schools of this State, costing parents who send children to school large amounts of money. People have said, and have repeated over and over, and over again that it has been because of combinations between certain interests in the management of schools, and the book-sellers. Sir, this may or may not be true, but it is a lamentable fact that so great has been the diversity in books from time to time, and the anxiety to get better books, and consequently to approach a higher grade of learning, that there has been this change almost weekly sometimes in the history of the schools of this State; aye, even before the leaves of the books have become thumbed by the children, the order has gone forth to throw the books one side to take in other text-books published by other book-sellers. And these books are not only stereotyped, but they are copyrighted, and there are only certain book-sellers from whom they can be procured, and then at fixed prices. Sometimes they are to be got only from a single book-seller in a place; but there are cases where no book-sellers had them at all, and they were only procured from the teacher's desk. It may not be that this result has been that of a combination, but these changes have been a great evil and a source of complaint. But, sir, you give this autocratic and despotic power into the hands of this proposed board, and that board will have it in their power to fix an iron rule in reference to this thing, and to change it at their pleasure. I do not say that it is the teachers who have enjoyed the profits arising out of this state of things, but I do say that there is in the minds of the people of this State, a strong suspicion that such is the case. And, sir, put it into the Constitution, giving this board a despotic power, with no responsibility so far as the Legislature is concerned, and there will be no limit to the abuses which will come upon the people. For, sir, in this enlightened age when a man studies how he can make the most out of doing the least, that board consisting of really enlightened and educated men, and able to look through the mill-stone, with the almighty dollar as the end in view. I think they will find a way to get a piece of it before they get through. I have but one other remark to make and then I have done. I have understood the learned gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], again and again, to repeat in his place, that the Board of Regents of the University in this State have, from the very commencement to this time, discharged all the duties incumbent upon them, by statute or otherwise, to his entire satisfaction, and to the approval of the people of the State. We know how that board is composed. We know how it has been composed from the early stages of its history to the present time. We know that it is composed of men who are among the most erudite and learned in this country. It is true that they may not have been professional school teachers; it is true that they may not have all been at the head of colleges, or professors in collegiate institutions; but they are men of large and extended views, men of a higher order of education, and men standing in their different positions at the head of their respective professions. They are men eminently capable from their political knowledge, and who with a good foundation in learning are capable of taking hold and determining what the higher interests of the people of this State, so far as their educational interests are concerned, need. They are a board that is ready made. If you desire that there should be this unification of the educational interests of the State under one board, let your superintendent of public instruction be made a member of the board, name him in this Constitution if it must be so, and make your Board of Regents your board of education. You have your superintendent of common schools now. You have your Board of Regents of the University now. Marry them together, and give to your Board of Regents of the University not only the powers that they now enjoy—twenty-three of them, but also the powers which you propose to give to the board suggested by this section. Make that provision, and your work is all done, and there is no necessity of going through the machinery of erecting another public board in this locality. There is no necessity for any feeling on this question between the common schools on the one side and the academies on the other. This is the simple solution of this problem. If the gentleman will propose some such amendment as that, although I am entirely opposed to the idea of putting the matter in the Constitution, I will receive it if it must be and go with it to the people. Gentlemen on the other side complain that an antagonism is sought to be brought about between our institutions of learning, the common schools on the one side and the academies and the universities on the other. Where has this antagonism been brought in? By whom has it been brought in here? I do not undertake to say that it has been brought in by the Committee on Education, but it has been brought in here by those people who have come here and demanded that this radical change should be made constitutional. It is unfortunate that those gentlemen should have thrown this fire-brand into this Convention, but the fact is so plain that "he who runs may read" that this hostility has been produced by those who seek to break asunder the friends of the great cause of education in the State of New York. I trust, therefore, that the sober sense of this committee will see to it that their efforts shall not be rewarded with success. I tell gentlemen, and I do not tell them by way of threat for the purpose of influencing their course in this matter at all, that this proposition if it succeed will create more opposition against our Constitution than almost any thing else that could be suggested. The people of this State do not desire to have matters placed in the Constitution except there be a necessity for it. I believe that the people of this State are so much wedded to the interests of education that they do not wish to have it put in an iron mold that cannot hereafter be changed as the exigencies shall demand. And now, sir, thanking the committee for having listened to me so long in the remarks I have made, and in which I have endeavored to be courteous and amicable in what I have said in reference to my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis],

"To nothing extenuate or aught set down in malice,"

So that I do my duty as a member of this committee, I shall satisfy myself with what I have said, and I trust that gentlemen will not upon a mere meager majority insist upon putting this wrong principle in the fundamental law of this State.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I do not propose myself to become a party to a fight between a clerk in the department of the superintendent of public instruction, and a clerk in the department of the Regents of the University. I have always found matters enough of that kind of my own seeking—of my own getting up, matters that happened to myself—to engage in, and therefore, I cannot consent to step in as the champion of either of these gentlemen in this controversy, and in my action upon this question, I shall have no reference to what one or the other of these gentlemen have said, or what one or the other of these gentlemen wish. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], as chairman of the committee that reported that article to the Convention, has fallen into the same trap that some others have fallen into in this Convention, of accepting from his enemies, that is, the enemies of the measures which the committee have reported, a proposition brought forward by them, however plausible. When the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] offered his proposition that the four non official men to be created as members of this board, should serve without pay, whether he designed it or not, he struck directly at the power and efficiency of the body of men which it was the design of this committee to create, who should have charge of the interests of education. And my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] will pardon me for expressing a little surprise at the adoption of that proposition, when the proposition itself must have been seen to originate from the circle affected by the breath of the salaried officer of the Board of Regents, affected by the breath of an individual whose salary will be destroyed by the change proposed to be made. and my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] and my friend from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], and my friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], sitting in a sort of a charmed circle, so far as this question is concerned, will pardon me if I state that when I heard from them the high eulogiums which they have passed upon the Board of Regents, those eulogiums beyond my power to imitate and beyond my power to conceive and comprehend; my thoughts ran back to the time when the apostle of God was preaching the truth of sacred things to the people of Ephesus, when the cry rose up, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The Sacred Book tells us why that cry rose up; and my friends will pardon me if my imagination ran back to that date, and I thought whether it was possible that the endangerment of any body's craft in this day had led to the same cry. I must be pardoned, sir, for talking plainly; I must be pardoned for making plain allusions. My friends know that it is in my nature; I cannot talk otherwise; I cannot think otherwise; and if my friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] should find that my mode of discussion, as he indicated in regard to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], was not as satisfactory to his mind as his own mode of pertinacious discussion, when the canal question was before the Convention, I hope he will pardon it in me, as being the weakness of my nature and not a sin that is not to be forgiven. Now, sir, I beg pardon of my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] when I say that it is not the political aspect of this board that he is afraid of that induces him to oppose its creation. No matter what he thought at the moment; no matter how zealously he worked himself into the position of his argument; that is not what he is afraid of, because this pet Board of the Regents of the University are created in precisely the same way that it is proposed to create the four men whose creation he deems may be so fraught with political influence. Their election is by the Legislature of the State, and he has no right to say, and he does not believe—he will pardon me for saying it—when the zeal is down, when the heat of argument is passed, he does not believe that any Legislature will elect men of a different faith from themselves as members of the Board of Regents of the University, any more than the men to be elected to these places are to be of a different political faith from the majority of the Legislature at the time when these men are elected. So that it is not political influence that this gentleman is afraid of. This board will not be any more political than the Board of Regents. As I said yesterday, I find no fault with any gentleman, either in the Board of Regents or elsewhere, for having political views. If they have none they not only are not fit for an official position, but they are not fit to live under the blessings that we enjoy under this government. I do not deem that this question is of the importance that some gentlemen seem to attribute to it. If we should follow high literary example, if we should adopt the course which was adopted for the benefit of his cat and kitten by the celebrated Dr. Johnson, and have a large hole for the cat and a small one for the kitten, I do not believe the cause of education in this State would be entirely obstructed or entirely stopped. I do not believe that any body in this State, sympathizing with either branch of education, either that of the common schools or academic education, is hostile to the other system. If any gentleman, either in this Convention or in the State at large, is friendly to the subject of education, he wishes all these systems to succeed. I understand the question to be this, and if I am wrong, if this be be not the question, then I wish some gentleman to show me what the question really is. I understand the question to be this: Will our system of education move more efficiently by setting new men, young men, active men, at work in controlling and managing our system of education, or by leaving a part of the system under the control of those who are paid nothing for their labors, under the control of those scattered in every part of the State, devoting but a very little, and some of them none of their time to the subject? This I understand, sir, is the question. It is not the question, and it is below the dignity of this house to fight the battle between those two clerks. It is not a question of politics: for politics will live and exist in the State. Sometimes one set of men will have the lead, and sometimes the other. It is not a question between colleges, academies, and common schools; for every man possessed of intelligence, or without intelligence if he has knowledge enough to know that education is valuable, is in favor of all these things. Am I right about this? I ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L Allen] if the preceding provision of this section has not secured to colleges and academies forever, the use of this very fund that he refers to? How, then, is it in hostility to colleges and academies? I know, sir, that whoever attacks what is venerable, assumes a very unpleasant task. The Gracchi at Rome were stricken down in the streets for doing it. It was said that they raised a sedition. It was not they that raised a sedition. It was the men that cried "great are the privileges of the Senate" that raised the sedition. It is not the committee that have made this report that have raised this cry. It is the gentlemen who cry out "great is Diana of the Ephesians," and claim that there is hostility between the common schools and the colleges and academies. Read that circular, if you please, in regard to the department of public instruction, and you will find that all that is suggested there is the complete triumph of the system of 1857. I wish to Heaven that system might triumph. I remember when we had but one free school in the city of Troy, I expressed the hope that I should see the day when the common school system of the city of Troy should be stronger than the common council, stronger than every other interest. I thank God I have lived to see it, and instead of destroying education, the attendance at the so-called academies in the city, is five times as large as it was then, and we have a high school in the city that is an ornament to the city, an ornament to the State, an ornament to the civilized world, and that furnishes education through the common school system in every respect, except the effete languages, equal to that in the colleges of the State: and a man that expresses the wish to see the common school system in this State triumph, is a man with whom I will join hands, effete institutions to the contrary notwithstanding. When I say this, I say it with no hostility to the Board of Regents. There are many things about that board that I do not understand. Perhaps I should have understood them better had I seen what I understand is the chief characteristic of that board. Had I been in that convocation last summer and seen that marvelous and mysterious cap and gown which the Chancellor wore on that occasion, I should have been satisfied that the preservation of the board was necessary to the enlightenment of the people of the State, and the preservation of our system of education; but as I did not see it, sir, I confess an entire ignorance upon that subject. If this system that is proposed by the committee will give us a body of working men, I am for it. If it will not I am against it. We have ageeed that we shall have a living, active man, and not a clerk in a coal hole in one of the State offices, to be at the head of public instruction in this State, so far as the common school system is concerned. This, I think we should not recede from. But I am free to say this to my friend from Richmond [Mr Curtis], with all due respect, that unless the paying of these four men, that it is proposed to put in that board, shall be restored, or the prohibitions against paying them shall be stricken out, I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. It is the very difficulty that exists in regard to this Board of Regents. My friend from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], I think, yesterday spoke about the good old days when men served for nothing. Sir, when men serve for nothing they do nothing. It is said that upon the other side of the water men do render services without salaries and without compensation. That may be true upon the other side of the water, but, sir, it is not true upon this side. Now, let me call the attention of this Convention to a solemn fact, that they may just as well admit here as not, many gentlemen in this Convention now stand in the maturity of their years in the possession of large and liberal wealth. But there are probably not five men in this Convention who have not been compelled to earn the wealth they now possess by hard and diligent toil. They have now passed the time when their services in any cause can be particularly useful, at no period of their lives have they been able to leave their business and devote themselves to any cause without compensation, whether that cause be political, whether it be religious, whether it be benevolent, whether it be literary, it is a necessity of our state of society, and I pray to God that the day may be far distant, when this state of society shall be changed. Men in every pursuit here are laborers; and, in the language of that same book that told me about the terrible cry that was raised at Ephesus about the dignity of Diana of the Ephesians, in that same book I learn that "the laborer are worthy of his hire:" And, sir, if you want men to do something, these men must be compensated for what they do. If these four men that are to be selected for the purpose of fostering the interests of education in this State are to be worth any more than four members of the Board of Regents, they must be furnished with a salary that will enable them to live in the meanwhile. It is a necessity of our state of society; and although I am prepared now to vote in the present state of things against the proposition of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], yet, if it be the final and persevering judgment of this body that we should prohibit the Legislature from paying any compensation to the four individuals, I shall vote to strike out finally from this section every thing except that which creates a superintendent of public education.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—It would be inexcusable in me not to say a few words in answer to what has fallen from the honorable member from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. I regret exceedingly, sir, to see that he is so sensitive in regard to what was said yesterday upon this subject, and that he has lost his temper this morning, and assailed me for what has been said in debate. He seems to desire to place me in the false position of having assailed the committee of which he is the honored chairman. I assure you, sir, I have had no such intention. I have great respect for every member of that committee, and more especially for the chairman, as he knows full well. It was very natural that I should suppose, when I knew that all the action of this Convention had been based upon a circular that originated here in a public office, and had been sent through the State and returned in the form of memorials, when I knew that all our acts had been based upon those memorials, that they had all been referred to that committee long before they reported—it was very natural that I should suppose that they had been somewhat influenced by those memorials. And yesterday, when that was alluded to, when those memorials and the later article were referred to, members of the committee rose, one by one, to reject the alliance with that memorial, to repudiate its influence, and to declare that they had acted independently of those documents. That was all very well, and yet the fact remains that all those papers were before them—I mean the memorials—long before they made their report. Now, because, when they had gone on one by one, each one "excusing" himself, as the learned chairman says, because I happened to ask "if there were any others to come to the confessional," my friend has taken great offense; he has laid it up, and it has rankled in his breast, and he comes in this morning and makes an attack upon me. I regret, exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, that he has misapprehended me. I take back that offensive expression. It was intended to be said playfully. It was not so received. I take it all back, Mr. Chairman, every word. I should be very sorry to give offense to the members of that committee. They are gentlemen, not only for whom I entertain great respect, but I entertain respect for their judgment, and ordinarily I am very happy to agree with them. I will always do so when it is possible. But if they are wrong—clearly and palpably wrong before the Convention and the country, as we believe them to be, we can not agree with them, and we must say so, and differ with them. We must not commit this Convention to a project that will sink to the lowest deeths all the work that we shall do, to say nothing of its palpable injustice and impolicy. So far from acting on the offensive I stand upon the defensive, and I only rose yesterday, drawn into the debate unexpectedly and unprepared, to defend the institutions of this State; to defend its colleges, that I thought were attacked by the chairman of the committee, and unfavorably compared, at least, with other institutions; to defend its academies and those who have had charge of them for many years; because it was a subject in which I had once felt great interest, having served in the board, having served in every capacity connected with the academies, as a student, as a principal of an academy, as a trustee, and as a regent, and I had a right to feel an interest in that subject and to stand up in the defense of those institutions when they were assailed. It is only on the defensive that I speak here. I assail no one. I do claim that the policy intended to be inaugurated is hostile to the best interests of the State, and ruinous to our academic system of education. I charge no hostile motives upon the committee. I charge it, however, as the policy that governs the memorial and the later document, as the policy that results from the animus that is shown in all that has emanated from those that have inaugurated this movement. It is a war upon the academies of the State. It is an attempt to deprive them of the small pittance that has heretofore been given to them to sustain them. Gentlemen yesterday pointed to the first section of this article to show that they were protected by the Constitution in that first article, and I referred to it, not to find fault with it, but only to show that they were there protected simply to the extent of fifteen thousand dollars at most, the income of the literature fund, and that all the rest was, as it has always been, left open to the action of the Legislature; and to show that if this policy prevails, which I stand up here to resist, it will sweep away all of the balance of the forty thousand dollars and the twelve thousand dollars that have been given it. I do not say that this committee would effect that object. I do not believe they desire it, but those who uphold the action of the document that lies upon the table actually propose it now; sir, they propose it in advance, propose it before they secure the action of the Convention under which they will shield themselves hereafter. I do not believe in this system of leveling downward. I do not believe in tearing down the academical interests of the State to the lower level. I do not believe in depriving them of the little benefit that they have heretofore had from legislative favor, and yet that seems to be the policy that underlies the movement that has inaugurated this proceeding. I do not charge it upon the committee, but upon those that move in accordance with the action of the committee, upon those that seek to control the future operations and the future laws that are to be passed in regard to it. I insist, sir, that all that we have done is to defend against this attack. We have claimed that the true policy was to lay this whole matter upon the table; to treat it as was done with the report of the Committee on Charities; to consider it a matter that belongs properly to the Legislature and not to the Convention; for certain it is, sir, it is a matter that heretofore has never been taken charge of by a Constitutional Convention. It belongs to the Legislature. The Legislature created the Board of Regents; and not one word has ever been said in any Constitution of the State in regard to them. But the attack has been made, and the fact that it was an old institution, of eighty years standing, has been referred to from time to time in the repeated remarks that were made by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] and he says age is sometimes a good thing. He says it is good in wine, and it is bad in bread and eggs." Pray, what has that to do with this question? How is it in men? How is it in institutions, is the great question here. He says, "there is less vigor in age," and it is true of the physical condition of man, but is there not more wisdom? I should be sorry to disbelieve that oldest doctrine upon this subject. How is it with institutions? Do they not grow and increase and thrive by age? Why, the two institutions in New England, which he has held up for our example and with which he has compared the colleges in this State most unfavorably, Yale and Harvard are of very great antiquity for this Continent. It is great age as well as great wealth that has given them their present prosperity. Oxford in England the very first university upon the globe, has stood, many say, since the day of Alfred the Great; certainly since the time of Edward the Confessor, in 1050. It is by great lapse of time, and by great age, and by the accumulation of wealth and means to educate, that these institutions have grown up into their present prosperity and their present ability to accomplish so much good. The question here is, whether age is not necessary to these institutions? Surely gentlemen here do not mean to descend to the slang of the day and ridicule old age wherever it is found, in institutions as well as in men. I deny the applicability of any thing like that to this question. Sir, I would preserve that Board of Regents and have it keep on in doing good as it has done. At least, I would leave that question to the Legislature. Sir, I would keep in that board the chairman of this committee, now a valuable member. He seeks to withdraw himself, to commit what he calls a hari-kari, an official felo de se. He seeks to do it. Let us prevent him. If it was physical death that he sought to accomplish, it would have been murder, at the common law, for us to aid him. It would be manslaughter now, under our milder statute. But it is his official felo de se that he covets. Let us prevent even that, Mr. Chairman, if we can, for if we should join in accomplishing such a result, so unfortunate to the cause of education, I think we should at least be guilty of a misdemeanor. I only add, I regret exceedingly to have been misunderstood in what I said, and to have it supposed for one moment that I would make an unkind remark or entertain an unkind feeling toward any member of this Convention. I have learned to this moment to cherish and prize the acquaintance of every gentleman I have met here, and I should blame myself justly if I allowed myself to utter one word that could be construed as intentionally offensive to any member of this body

Mr. MERRITT—I think we have discussed this matter sufficiently, and that we can now safely go into Convention, and I hope that the committee will agree with me that it would be better to arise and report progress upon this article, and then to proceed to consider it in Convention. There are no amendments which require printing, and we can proceed at once and can reach conclusions that will be as satisfactory as if we remained in committee. I therefore move that the committee rise and report the article to the Convention and recommend its adoption.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared carried by a vote of 39 to 30.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. BEADLE from the Committee of the Whole reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Education and the Funds relating thereto, had gone through therewith and had instructed their chairman to report the same to the Convention, and recommend its adoption.

Mr. ALVORD—I trust the usual course will be taken, that the committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and that it will be referred to the Convention. I make that motion.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY then read the first section as follows:

SEC. 1. The capital of the common school fund; the capital of the literature fund; the capital of the United States deposit fund; the capital of the college land scrip fund, and the capital of the Cornell endowment fund as it shall be paid into the treasury, shall be respectively preserved inviolate. The revenues of said common school fund shall be applied to the support of the common schools; the revenues of said literature fund shall be applied to the support of academies, and the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars of the revenue of the United States deposit fund shall each year be appropriated to and made a part of the capital of the said common school fund; the revenues of the college land scrip fund shall each year be appropriated and applied to the support of the Cornell University, in the mode and for the purposes defined by the act of Congress donating public lands to the several States and Territories, approved July 2d, 1862; and the revenues of the Cornell endowment fund shall each year be paid to the trustees of the Cornell University for its use and benefit.

Mr. McDONALD—I offer the following amendment:

"After the word 'and,' in the third line, strike out down to the word 'treasury,' in the fifth line, and insert as follows: 'and the capital of all educational funds paid or to be paid into the treasury.' Also strike out the rest of the section after the words 'school fund,' in line eleven."

The object of this amendment is to provide a constitutional enactment that all educational funds of the State shall be inviolate, and not to enumerate or specify any particular fund except the capital of the United States deposit fund; the capital of the college scrip fund, and the capital of the common school and literature funds; that is, it is to name those funds for which the State is responsible as trustee for the grantor and after specifying these, to enact that all other educational funds of the State shall remain inviolate. This simply strikes out the enumeration in the Constitution of what is called the Cornell endowment fund and the Cornell land scrip fund. I do not know that I name them exactly, but those are the two funds. It is proposed by the committee that these two funds shall be mentioned in the Constitution, and shall thereby be directed and enacted to be given to the objects to which they are now directed by law. Now, I will ask the committee what is the reason of the selection of this college and thus putting it into the Constitution? Every college in this State has an educational fund, more or less, which the State has given it. Union College has a large fund which it has derived partly from the State and partly from private gifts. Every college, I need not enumerate them, has either a greater or less fund which came from the State, and which the State has a right to direct and control; and I ask why make any distinction between the colleges of this State? Why not let them all stand upon the same foundation, and simply say that all educational funds shall remain inviolate? I know it is not said here, but I claim that the object is to make this a State institution, not by direct, positive law, but by the recognition of its funds in the Constitution, so that it becomes an absolute State fund, and thereby becomes in that regard at least a State college. Now, what reasons are urged here? I am aware that the founders of this institution hope much for it. I know and feel that the founder, Ezra Cornell, will do every thing that he has promised, and I know and feel, contrary to all aspersions, that he intends to do every thing to carry out, and will carry out his part of that contract to the uttermost. But what I contend is, that, even if he does, I am not so sure that it will be such a success that the State will care to father it, or will care to preserve it in its Constitution. The State has other colleges. It has another college, which has been partially, in a certain respect, a State institution; which college, although I am a graduate of it, has not of late years made that progress which we see other colleges throughout the land making. I allude to Union College. Let us see what there is about this Cornell University that is so different from any other college. In the first place there is this difference—it is all on paper. There is a large building about completed. I suppose a class has been entered there; but other than that and further than that, it differs from the other colleges of this State by being still in the future; and whatever it may accomplish is still to be accomplished. We have other colleges in this State that have accomplished much. We have none, I know, that will equal in reputation Yale or Harvard; and why? Simply because we have too many. That is the only reason. A State cannot make a college without students! The students are taken up by these various colleges, and we have a number of first-rate colleges instead of one great college. That is the alleged evil that we have grown up under. We cannot help it. The ground is fully occupied. It is like the soil. After a certain number of trees are planted in it, and draw all the nourishment they can from the soil, you cannot plant a great tree, for the smaller trees take up all the nourishment there is. So these colleges take up all the educational aliment there is in the State; and if this great institution is to grow, as they expect it is, it must grow to the injury of the present colleges of the State. And for that reason I think it will only rank as one of the main colleges of the State and not as that great college for which its founders so much adore it. Now I am not here to say that our system is not better than the eastern system. I believe that in this State, by virtue of the great number of colleges, there are a great many more students educated. As far as my knowledge extends, I have never yet seen any institution in which the professors were not ready to teach the students all they were willing to learn. It is not the college, it is the student. If those who are graduates of college will look back, they will find the man, on the average, in the world as they found him a student in the college. He is the same individual; and if he has derived that benefit which he has had an opportunity to derive, he has made good use of his advantages; and if he has not improved his opportunity, if he goes in the college without ability, he will come out in the same condition, though it may be a little polished. No college can furnish brains. But it is claimed that this institution is to have an endowment which shall outstrip that of any college in this State, or I was going to say the United States. Is it an endowment that makes a college? There are now in this State three colleges that have more endowment than they can use; and there is in this State, one college that has a greater endowment than I understand the Cornell University expects to have from its present funds. Columbia College now owns property in the city of New York which is valued at $2,900,000. It is not a very productive property I admit; but is located on the Fifth avenue, Sixth avenue and Sixtieth and Fiftieth streets, and although it does not bring much revenue into their treasury at present, it is rapidly increasing in its value as any other property can be throughout the State. So there stands Columbia College with a greater endowment now, their property worth more now than all the property which has been given either by the State or Mr. Cornell to that institution and yet that is not the greatest college in the State, or at least if it is the greatest in numbers on account of its law and medical departments, yet it may be doubted whether it is the largest in its college department proper in the State. It has all the funds it wants, it has all the professors it wants, and I have never yet heard of any professor refusing to go to Columbia because they did not pay a sufficient salary. Take Union College, which has had more funds than it can use. Fifteen years ago it had an attendance of over two hundred and thirty, I think about two hundred and fifty students, and only a corps of ten or eleven professors. I find now its funds sufficiently large with an attendance of only one hundred and thirty-five and a corps of fourteen professors, so that neither the addition of a corps of professors nor of a fund makes a college. Again it is said Cornell University is a kind of State institution, because it has the Governor and the Lieutenant-Governor and several other ex officio trustees. This has been so with Union College ever since its organization; and the last election of president was accomplished through a vote of those ex officio trustees, so in that it does not differ. But it is claimed that this is a college where there is to be no denominational influence, where denomination is not to be considered. This has been the distinguishing element of Union College from its commencement. At the time that I was there, I know there was a Presbyterian, an Episcopolian and a Baptist, and there was one that I think did not belong to any religious denomination. Whether an entire disregard of denominational influence, is an element of success or of weakness, I am not able to determine; but I must say that for the past few years, denominational colleges have progressed, while my own alma mater has rather decreased, so that this is not a distinguishing difference Therefore I cannot see why this college should be mentioned rather than any other. Let us simply say in our Constitution, that all educational funds shall remain inviolate, and when we shall have done that, we shall have done justice to the Cornell University. We shall have done justice to every other college in the State; and we shall not have given any cause for the feeling which I am sorry to say has some influence in regard to this matter. I know that the colleges of this State feel to blame, themselves, because they have let slip so good an opportunity to largely endow themselves. But Mr. Cornell has by his extraordinary diligence, by his munificent offer, and by his advantageous circumstances outstripped them in this regard. He has secured the fund; and I only hope that the college of which he is the honorable founder, will derive from it the benefit which he expects it will. Having thus obtained this fund, having received this declaration in the Constitution, I know he will be satisfied; and I hope he, or his friends will not ask any more. But there is one other thing. It is claimed by some that this is a munificent gift. Admit it, I am glad, I am happy, and I rejoice, to see any worthy individual make so good an appropriation; but it is not the only munificent gift that has ever been given in this State. My own father—for I have a right to call him such, as he always pleased to call me his son—the lamented Dr. Nott, gave his life to his college, and when he died, gave as great a gift as Mr. Cornell. He donated to Union College, as I understand, real and personal estate. The personal estate amounts to over $225,000 at present, and I understand the real estate, not yet sold, is worth the same amount. He applied it, during his life, as best he could, and every one who had the good fortune to be one of his sons—as he was pleased to call all his pupils—and as I am sure we were pleased to be called—knew with what benefit he gave his services. And as I said before, he gave this munificent gift, which I understand to be equal to that of Mr. Cornell. This does not take away from the value of the gift on the one part, but it shows that there are in this State other colleges whose friends have thus shown their natural feelings, and to whom they have been equally kind. But we come to another thing. There is another claim that this college is bound to give, or will possibly give, free tuition and free room-rent. What is the fact? In Genesee College, in Western New York, it has been absolutely free for the past eight or ten years. For a $100 scholarship you can get a year's tuition, and if you are not able to pay that you can get it by asking for it. That has always been so in that college. In Hobart College, at Geneva, as a condition of a gift by Trinity Church, tuition and room-rent has been absolutely free for the past fifteen years, but within the past year they have asked to be and have been released from this obligation, and commenced to charge tuition; so that after an experience of fifteen years they decide that free tuition is an injury, rather than a benefit. In Union College, to my knowledge, there has been aided almost one-third of the students, and the best of it is, nobody knows who gets it. You cannot call a man a charity student there, and be sure you are right; and if he knocks you down, the rest of the students will say you were served right. In all the colleges of the State I will venture to say no young man has ever been turned away because he was too poor to pay his tuition. But it is claimed that this college aids the soldiers of the army. Well, what of that? Is this any thing peculiar to this college? Why, we find—

Mr. AXTELL—I would like to ask the gentleman if these remarks are pertinent to the proposition before us.

Mr. McDONALD—The pertinency of the remarks would be better seen if the gentleman had heard the discussion in the Committee of the Whole. I understand all these claims were made in the discussion in favor of this institution. I was not present, but I understand they were made. Now, with regard to the aid of the soldiers of the army. Lately an organization of which I believe the honorable gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] is a member, sent a circular to the various colleges to see what they would do for the soldiers of the American army, or the children of those who died or were disabled in the service, and I think they received a universally favorable response from every college to which they sent a circular, and a promise to take a limited number of soldiers or children of soldiers, and educate them free, and without charge for room-rent. I say that there is no difference between this college and the other colleges of our land, except that it is in the future, and the present colleges are in the present. I do not wish to say any thing against the future prospects of any college. I know every thing will be done to make that college as great as it can be. But if I am right, there is no place for it to grow in this State. When you look at Yale and Harvard, this great university, part of these, as they call it, amounts to but few men. It has a law school. That is a small part at Yale, but a large part at Harvard. It has a medical school. This is quite large at Harvard, and not so large at Yale. It has a theological department. But as to the university plan proper, Yale, like all our colleges, has a department of arts and sciences. You will find a few students there; and at Columbia College you will find a department called school of mining; and there you will find more, but not very many students—so that the difference is more in name than in fact. We have Alfred University, in Allegany county. We have any number of universities, with a corps of professors, and a scheme as large as any can be made. There is no trouble in the scheme on paper. But as I have said I do not believe we have the material here in this State for a great university—all educational aliment of this State is used and needed by our present colleges, and I know enough about the colleges of this State to know that they will not willingly die—never. They are accumulating funds as well as other colleges. If they cannot get them from the State they call on their friends, and they will all become independent as far as money is concerned, so that their income will be sufficient to support them. When I look at it I have to think sometimes about some of these schemes—look at the scheme of the People's College. There was a most magnificent scheme. It had this same fund. It had a rich man behind it who said he was willing to give money; but when the Legislature came to a place where he had to put it absolutely out of his hands, he was not willing to do it. There stands the building, which they have put to another use. I hope it will turn out to be an equally good use. Again, there was the State Agricultural College at Ovid. I remember very well the advocates of this plan. I shall never forget the day—a broiling day in June—that I heard a most eloquent address from a deceased Governor, whose portrait I now see before me—the Hon. John A. King, on the occasion of the laying of the corner stone of that building, and if I continued to believe, as I did then believe, the eloquent and silvery words of the orator of the day, when describing the glorious future of the State Agricultural College, and the great benefits to be derived therefrom, I should not doubt that this institution was to bring about the entire renovation of agricultural education in this State. I should almost believe it was to make every thing grow without work. I do not know how it was to be done, but he persuaded me at that time that it was to be done. As I look about, I think I see some men in this Convention who were believers in the great future of that scheme and are here now believers in the great future of this university, who were then present and who then insisted upon and did walk two and a half miles in order to do honor to that occasion and institution; and now as I go by and see it, I see a building being erected on the State agricultural farm, near this building, for a very different use—the care of the insane—and I am led to recognize that this is sometimes the result of such schemes, and when I look at the building and know that the committee have pronounced it unfit even for an insane asylum—all I have to say is, thus do human hopes sometimes vanish.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—For the purpose of facilitating business, I move that the same rule adopted in the Convention in discussing the article on the powers and duties of the Legislature, be applied to this article.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Mr. President, I would like to inquire what that rule was precisely?

The PRESIDENT—It allows five minutes to each speaker.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think that such a motion comes with good grace from gentlemen who have already occupied the floor for hours on this subject.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I withdraw my motion with great pleasure. I supposed that so much had been said already that there was no desire to say any thing more upon this question.

Mr. MERRITT—I renew the motion.

Mr. KINNEY—I move to amend by making the time ten minutes instead of five.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Kinney, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Merritt as amended, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. McDonald, to strike out the words "and the capital of the Cornell endowment fund as it shall be," in lines three and four, and insert instead "and the capital of all educational funds paid or to be"; also, to strike out all the balance of the section after the words "common school fund," in line eleven, and it was declared lost.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question on the first section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then put on the adoption of the first section, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. All the said educational funds, as they are paid into the treasury, shall be invested by the Comptroller in the stocks of the State of New York and of the United States, or loaned to counties and towns for county and town purposes exclusively, and the State shall guarantee said funds against loss.

Mr. SEAVER—I move to strike out the word "and," in the third line, and insert the word "or," so that it will read: "stocks of the State of New York, or of the United States."

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Seaver, and it was declared carried.

Mr. WALES—I propose to offer now the amendment which I withdrew yesterday, as follows:

"The Legislature shall provide by law for investing in the bonds of the government of the United States, under the direction of the Treasurer of the State, the principal of the United States deposit fund, as it shall be paid in to the loan commissioners of the several counties."

Digitized by Google

I withdrew that amendment yesterday at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, because he said that that was already provided for; but a member of the Convention, a lawyer, seems to think that he was mistaken in that statement, and I leave it to the Convention for such disposition as they think best.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—There was some discussion in regard to this proposition of the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales] in Committee of the Whole when this section was before us, and one gentleman seemed to suppose that the provision at the close of the first line was adequate to meet the object which the gentleman from Sullivan proposes. I understood the whole of the committee concurred in this his view, that this loan that is now scattered among the several counties of the State is very badly invested oftentimes, and a great deal of it lost, and that it would be better to make the same investment of this fund that is made of the other funds of the State. It was supposed by some gentlemen that these words, "all the State educational funds as they are paid into the treasury," provided for a contingency which is sought to be specially provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales]; and those gentlemen expressed the opinion that being paid into the treasury was equivalent to being into the hands of the loan commissioners. I do not so understand it, sir I understand that these commissioners may re-invest the funds without ever actually paying them into the treasury; and if that be so and if it be the desire of the Convention to have these funds invested as the other funds then we need to adopt a provision such as that now proposed by the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales].

Mr. MERRITT—I understood yesterday that when the money was received into the hands of these loan commissioners it was, to all intents and purposes, paid into the treasury. If there is the slightest doubt about that we need the amendment offered by the gentleman from Sullivan [Mr. Wales].

Mr. ALVORD—It strikes me that this is a plain common sense proposition, that these loan commissioners receiving the money by way of payment upon mortgages, either by foreclosure or otherwise, are absolutely prohibited by the first part of this section from re-loaning it. These educational funds are in the treasury absolutely and cannot be re-loaned by the commissioners.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Wales, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I move to amend the second section by inserting after the word "treasury" in the second line, the words "except the United States deposit fund." The object of this amendment is to test the will of the Convention with respect to withdrawing that fund rom the counties where it is now invested. Originally this fund was distributed among the several counties of the State, loaned on bond and mortgage. It is undoubtedly true that there have been losses growing out of these loans, but I would be willing to adopt a Constitutional provision making the counties liable for any loss occurring in that way, and letting that fund remain where it is now invested on bond and mortgage, so as to give the counties the benefit of the loan. I think, therefore, that this amendment should be adopted; and then I will vote for an amendment, if any gentleman will propose it, making each county liable for any deficiency occurring upon any loan that the commissioners may make of this fund.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Wakeman, and it was declared lost.

The SECRETARY read the next section as follows:

SEC. 3. The Legislature may provide for the payment into the treasury of money or securities for the general or special endowment of any literary or educational institution in this State; for the investment of the same, and for the payment of the interest upon said investment in accordance with the terms of the endowment as approved by the Legislature.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to strike out the concluding words of this section, "as approved by the Legislature." I am not sure that I know what those words mean in that connection but if they have any intelligent meaning whatever, I think it must be the endowment which a private individual may make to an institution must be approved, and may be changed and modified by the Legislature. The words are "for the investment of the same, and for the payment of the interest upon such investment in accordance with the terms of the endowment as approved by the Legislature,"—if that language has any sensible meaning, it must be what I have said.

Mr. CURTIS—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]?

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will be very happy to do so. I am anxious to know the meaning of this language.

Mr. CURTIS—I will explain what was the understanding and intent of the committee in using that language. It was intended to provide that before these moneys are paid into the treasury, and put in the care of the State, the State should understand the terms of the endowment before accepting that care; in other words, that the State should know what it is doing in regard to any special endowment. This language has no further meaning than that, as I understand it.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That interpretation is not a very obvious one, and I do not think that any body but a member of the committee who framed the section would be able to cipher out that interpretation. But if that be the meaning of the words, they are simply superfluous. I object to them, however, myself, not so much because they are superfluous, as because they are mischievous in the last degree, or at least capable of being perverted to very great mischief. The law in England in regard to charitable endowments is, that when a donation is made by an individual to any charity whatever, and the gift cannot by the law of the realm, take effect precisely as the donor intended, then, instead of going to the heirs or representatives of the donor, the king, by his sign-manual, may take up the gift, and give it to any purpose whatever; and I recollect very well a case where a donation was made by a benevolent individual to an educational institution, and which could not take effect by reason of the law of mortmain being in the way, and the king by his sign-manual gave the fund to a foundling hospital. Now, that is not the law of this State, or of this country. Here, charitable donations must take effect as the donor intended, or they fail utterly and entirely, as they should fail. There is in our State no power to modify the gift, or to divert it from the object for which it was intended, and give it to some other object. Now, according to my understanding, such a power is contained in this section. It is intended, I think, to give to the Legislature the power to modify endowments, to approve or disapprove. If that be not the meaning of it, then the words have no function whatever in this section. The section says that the Legislature may provide for the payment of money or securities into the treasury. It is a merely permissive power to the Legislature, and that is all you want. If the Legislature do not approve of the endowment, it will not meddle with it. But look further and it says that the Legislature may "provide for the investment of the same, and for the payment of the interest upon said investment in accordance with the terms of the endowment as approved by the Legislature." First, the Legislature is to approve the endowment or modify it so that they can approve it, and then the interest is to be paid over. If these words have any meaning in the section, I do not think it is a wholesome one.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move to strike out the word "as" in the sixth line, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "if." That will not allow the Legislature to modify the terms of the endowment. They must take it as it is if they approve it, and if they do not, they need not assume control of it. This provision will not impose the burden of it upon the Legislature, if they are not satisfied with the character of the endowment, but it will not be in their power to modify it in any shape.

Mr. CURTIS—I differ from the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] as to these words. It seems to me that their meaning is very plain to the ordinary reader. They may be superfluous, and if they are, of course there will be no object in retaining them; but I think the meaning is very plain.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I wish to ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], whether he supposes that the Legislature is to pass general or special laws on the subject, whether it is to be regulated by general legislation, or by some special act in the case of each charitable gift? If it is done by general laws, the Legislature can know nothing about the endowments in particular, and can neither approve nor disapprove.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I did not understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], and I may have moved an amendment which I would not otherwise have offered.

The PRESIDENT—The motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] was to strike out the words "as approved by the Legislature," at the end of the section.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. RUMSEY—This section imposes no duty upon the Legislature, and restrains no action of the Legislature. It is, therefore, in my judgment, entirely immaterial, because the Legislature may do precisely the same thing that is provided for in this section without any constitutional provision. The section, therefore, is entirely useless, and we certainly ought not to incumber the Constitution with words that have no meaning so far as regards the action of the Legislature. In the absence of a prohibition in this Constitution, the Legislature have the entire power to do with this matter just as they will, and this section does nothing to increase or to restrict that power. I therefore move to strike it out.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Rumsey to strike out the section, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. The Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall elect, in joint ballot of the Senate and Assembly, a superintendent of public education, who shall hold his office for four years and until his successor is appointed. He shall have such powers, and perform such duties, and receive such compensation as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature at the same session shall create a State board of education to consist of seven members; of which board the superintendent of public education, the Secretary of State, and the Comptroller, ex officio, shall form a part; and the other four members shall be elected or appointed as shall be provided by law. The State board of education shall have general supervision of all the institutions of learning in this State, and shall perform such other duties as the Legislature may direct. The term of office and the compensation of the members shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. HADLEY—I move to strike out the first four lines, down to and including the word "appointed," in the fourth line, and insert "There shall be elected, at the first general election after the adoption of this Constitution, a superintendent of public education, who shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor is chosen." I offer this amendment with a view of testing the sense of this Convention, as to whether the superintendent of public education, if we are to have such an officer constitutionalized, shall be elected or appointed. It seems to me that if there is any officer who should be elected by the people of the State, it is the superintendent of public education. He should be elected, I think, for the reason, first, that it is in accordance with our present theory of State government. We elect our Comptroller, our Secretary of State, our Attorney-General, and our judges, and I will add here that in twenty-three or twenty-four of the States of this Union the judges are elected. Now, this idea of going back and appointing State officers does not meet with my approval. If this officer shall be made elective, then there will be throughout this State in every school-district, an interest in choosing, the right man, and the trustees and the citizens of every school-district, will attend more to the primary meetings, and we will have in this office a man elected directly by the people, and having their attention expressly fixed upon him. But I do not wish to detain the Convention. Every man's mind is probably made up as to whether the office should be elective or appointive. For myself, I am entirely opposed to constitutionalizing this superintendent of public instruction. I am in favor of striking out the entire section. But if we are to have such an officer, I desire that he shall be elected by the people.

Mr. GOULD—I simply wish to ask each member of this Convention to think of the gentleman whom he would prefer to have at the head of the department having charge of the educational interests of the State. Let him fix his mind upon the man, and when he has selected Dr. Anderson of Rochester, or President White, of Syracuse, or any other educational luminary in the State, let him ask himself this further question, would such a man as Dr. Anderson or President White, go before a State Convention of any party and solicit such an appointment as this? And when he has done that, let him ask himself further, if the very man he would not desire to see at the head of the department of education, would not be just the man who would be present urging upon the Convention his own appointment?

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hadley, and it was declared lost.

Mr. ALVORD—I desire to renew my motion to amend by striking out of the first, second and third lines down to the word "superintendent," all after down to "appoint."

Mr. COMSTOCK—That proposition, if I understand it, goes to the whole of the fourth section, except what was specified in the remarks of the gentleman. Before the motion to strike out is put I propose an amendment with a view to perfect this plan so far as I can. I shall myself go for the motion to strike out; but first let us make the thing as tolerable as may be, in case the Convention see fit to accept it. I move to strike out all after the word "supervision," of the sentence contained in lines thirteen, fourteen and fifteen, and to insert, "of the common schools and such supervision of the other institutions of learning in this State, as the Regents of the University have heretofore exercised;" so that if the amendment prevail the paragraph will read:

"The State board of education shall have general supervision of the common schools and such supervision of the other institutions of learning in the State as the Regents of the University have heretofore exercised."

There is a breadth, and depth, and comprehensiveness in this plan of the committee which I believe has yet escaped the attention of the Convention. According to the terms of this report, it is declared that the State board of education shall have "general supervision" of all the institutions of learning in this State. The common school, the academy, the college are to be subjected to that power, and it is to be noticed that whatever power this board can exercise or will exercise over the common schools of the State, the same power is given in the same words over the academies and colleges of the State. Now, sir, to that I am invincibly opposed. I am opposed to subjecting education in the colleges and in the academies of the State to the supreme control of the State in any one of its boards, or even in its Legislature. Education in those institutions rests upon very different bases from education in the common schools. Our common school system is maintained wholly at the public expense. It is maintained by the exertion of the taxing power of the State, which, through local and general taxation, annually raises millions of money from the people for the support of that system. My impressions are in favor of that system, and I will maintain it. But education in our colleges and in our academies does not rest upon any such basis. Our colleges receive no aid whatever from the State, except those casual and rare donations which are sometimes made to them by act of the Legislature. Our academies receive but an inconsiderable support from the State. I believe the entire fund which is annually bestowed upon the academies of the State, is not more than about $40,000. Now, sir, in that lower department of education, the expense of which is defrayed entirely by the State, there is the most exact propriety in subjecting it to the supreme control of the State either through the Legislature, or through some board created by the Legislature and subject to its direction. But that reason does not hold when we come to speak of education in these institutions of learning which are supported by religious enterprise, and by donations from private individuals with which the State has no concern, and which, therefore, the State has no right to control. I object to this board and to this power, because it is unknown in the history and in the laws of the State. Our academies and colleges are not now subjected to any such control as this plan proposes, and in my humble judgment they ought never to be subjected to any such control. I take it for granted that these words, "general supervision of all the institutions of learning in this State," as I find them used in the plan of the committee, are the same in meaning as the words "supreme control of all the institutions of learning in this State." These are convertible expressions, and I suppose it to be the meaning of the provision, and the intention of this plan, to subject every educational institution in the State to the dead level of this supreme control of the board to be created by the Legislature. I say that we have no such power now in the State, and I hope the State will never claim such a power over our educational institutions—I mean those institutions where education in its higher departments is imparted. The State has no right to that control. If we look at our laws on this subject, we find that the trustees of every college in the State are to direct and prescribe the course of study and discipline to be observed in the college. We find, also that the trustees of every incorporated academy in the State have like authority to prescribe the course of study and discipline to be observed in the academy. The Board of Regents is now the only authority which exercises a general visitorial power over these institutions, but that board has no such power as it is here proposed to confer upon this State board of education. What is the power of the Board of Regents? It has simply the authority, in the language of the statute, "by themselves or their committees to visit and inspect all the colleges and academies in this State, to examine into the condition and system of education and discipline therein, and make an annual report of the same to the Legislature." There is no power there to mold or control the course of instruction in any of the institutions of learning in this State, and such a power ought not to reside in the Board of Regents, as it does not, and it ought not to reside in this State board of education. Why, this whole plan is founded upon a false and erroneous idea. You, sir, or I, endow an institution of learning, and in the terms of the endowment we direct the application of the funds and require a particular thing to be taught in that institution. Now, we have a right to do that. I have the right, under the laws of this State, to found an institution of my own, to incorporate myself and my associates according to the general laws of this State, and to endow the institution in my own way and manner; and when I have done so, I have the right to protest against this supreme control of the State over that institution. I would be protected by the Constitution of the United States, but for that clause which we are accustomed to insert in all charters and general laws of incorporation, that the same may be repealed or modified. But that does not change the nature of the question. What I insist upon is that institutions which are not dependent upon the State for their support, which are not founded by the State, but are the result of private liberality or private enterprise, and in many cases of religious denominational enterprise, ought not to be brought down to this horizontal dead level of control by the State. Why, sir, look at the institutions of the State which we now have, which are to be subjected to this unity of control, the same control which this board proposes to exercise over the common schools of the State—

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COMSTOCK—Yes, sir.

Mr. RUMSEY—What meaning does the gentleman attach to the word "visit" and the word "supervision?" Do those words give this board any more than the right to overlook and inspect these institutions, and have this board any power by this section except such as they shall derive from the Legislature.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Yes, sir, by the constitutional article which is proposed by this committee, they are to have the general supervision of the educational institutions of the State; whatever power they possess over the common schools, they will possess over the colleges and academies of the State also. If these words are not of the same meaning and import as the words "supreme control," then I am unable to appreciate the force of language. The mere power of visitation is nothing, that is the power of the Board of Regents. They have the power to examine, visit and report, but not the power of supervision, which is simply the power of control. The object of my amendment is to reduce the functions of the board proposed by this constitutional article, to the same measure as those now possessed by the Board of Regents.

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], allow me to ask him as a professional man whether it is the accepted ruling of the courts, that the word "supervision" when used in such a connection as this, is equivalent to the words "supreme control?"

Mr. COMSTOCK—The gentleman asks me, and I answer as a professional man, if he will have it in that way, that in my judgment the words "general supervision," is nearly or quite equivalent to the words "supreme control."

Mr. CURTIS—Is it so ruled by the courts?

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think that precise question has ever arisen in any court. If it has I am not aware of the adjudged case. I speak of it however, as a question of the natural interpretation of language. If I have power to supervise an institution, I have power to control that institution. Is it not intended by this provision, to give the supreme control over the common schools to the State board, and do you not give the same power over the academies and colleges that it will have over the common schools?

The PRESIDENT—The time of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock[, has expired; but he may proceed by unanimous consent.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—Go on; go on.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Now, let us look over the State, and see what are the subjects upon which this constitutional article is to operate, if it shall be accepted and go into operation. There is not one of the colleges of our State that has been founded by the State; there is not one of them that is supported by the State; they have all been founded by private or by denominational and religious benevolence. To begin with we have Columbia College and Hobart College at Geneva. Those are colleges under the control of a particular religious denomination, the Protestant Episcopal church. They are not sectarian. None of our colleges are sectarian in the just sense of that word, but all, or nearly all, our colleges are denominational in a certain sense, in the sense that they are founded and endowed, patronized and mainly supported by particular religious denominations. That is so now. It always has been so, it always will be so, and the great work of education in its higher branches never will go on successfully in any other way. Now, let me ask any one interested in these institutions which I have named, if he would desire to subject them to the unlimited control of this board of education. Then we have the Madison University, and University of Rochester, which I believe are under the patronage of another religious denomination, the Baptists. They, too, are not sectarian, except in the sense that they are denominational. The education imparted there is not a sectarian education, and they are very meritorious and praiseworthy institutions. Now shall these institutions be subjected to the supreme control, for I still adhere to the words, of this State board of education? I might go on with other illustrations. Nearly all our institutions of learning, colleges and academies, are under some of these denominational influences. Let me put the question whether it would not be competent for this board of education to prescribe uniform text books and courses of study in all these colleges and academies? If any one says that the power is limited, let him tell me how and where it is limited in this article. I say Mr. President, that under this provision that board of education will have the power, if it chooses to exercise it, of subverting the very foundations, the very intention of nearly all the higher educational institutions of the State. Perhaps that is the design, sir, for I find it avowed in the circular sent out, calling for these petitions with which this Convention has been flooded, that the intention is to bring all these higher institutions down to the level of the common school system. Without enlarging further upon this view of the case, I repeat that this whole plan is founded upon a very false and erroneous view of the subject. Education, except in that lower department which is a matter of State care, ought not to be subjected to State control. We consider, and consider wisely and well I believe, that it is a matter of State concern, a matter of great political concern, that education in the common schools should be universal and free. And to that extent the State very properly takes care of the interests of education; but if the State will let education alone in its higher institutions and departments, it will take care of itself. There is wealth and benevolence, and enterprise enough among the people to foster, encourage and build it up. It does not want your State care or your State control. We have been told by the learned and eloquent gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] that education is a unit. Well, sir, in a certain sense education is a unit, because from the time the pupil begins to lisp the alphabet until he has reached the loftiest heights of astronomy and the profoundest depths of philosophy there is but one course of progress and improvement. So is human life a unit in that sense. But does it follow from that, that this whole course of education in all its stages should be subjected to a single control? By no means. In the different stages of progress, we have the common school, we have the academy, we have the college; and there is no reason whatever that I can perceive, why all these institutions, taking up the youth in the different stages of his education and carrying him forward—there is no reason I say, that I can perceive why these institutions should be subjected to a uniform system of State control; and I am opposed to it.

Mr. ARCHER—If the interpretation put upon the section by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is correct, the committee most assuredly made a grave error in the selection of the language used, for it was not their intention to confer by the phrase now under consideration, any power whatever except that of visitation, and it seems to me that a fair construction of this portion of the section, will lead to a conclusion entirely different from that of the gentleman from Onondaga. It is the last portion of this clause that confers the power, and it is for the Legislature to confer such powers as they please. All that was intended in the first portion of the section was to present generally the idea of unification, to give to this board of education the same powers that are now exercised by the Regents of the University over colleges, academies, and common schools, and no further than that; nor do I believe that the article, properly interpreted, would bear any different construction.

Mr. GOULD—It seems to me, sir, that the astuteness of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has very greatly overshot itself. What is the meaning of this Latin word supervision? Why, sir, put into plain English, it means simply oversight. The board of education created by this article has oversight or watch, not control over the institutions of learning in this State. What is the difficulty, what is the objection to that—that this board should watch over the institutions of learning in the State—should overlook them? Why, sir, we are taught in the old proverb, that a cat may look upon a king, and if it is the inalienable right of pussy to look upon royalty, what is the harm in allowing this board of education to watch over all the interests of education in the State, to see what is going on in every school of learning? Why, we have been recently informed by the English papers that an investigation has been made into the affairs and mode of conducting female schools in England, and it has been found that girls of eighteen or nineteen years of age, are publicly whipped, and their persons disgracefully exposed in the presence of the whole school. Now, I ask if any public or private school here should adopt that plan, would it not be the right, would it not be the duty of the board of education to look into and report the facts to the Legislature in order that laws might be enacted to prevent the practice? A person might endow a school for the training of model artists if he pleased. Now, certainly such a violation of morality and decency as that should be liable to be inspected and reported upon by the board of education; and without going so far as this, there may be great wrong done in our schools which should come under the supervision of this board. The board, although not empowered to take any action for the redress of those wrongs, should have the right to keep watch over our institutions of learning, and to report any such wrongs to the Legislature. Now, as the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Archer] very properly says, this word "supervision" is limited by the subsequent part of the section which provides that in any action which the board may take, they shall be authorized only by the Legislature itself. I see no sort of difficulty in this section.

Mr. CURTIS—I have but one word to say upon this subject. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has very properly pointed out a defect in this paragraph. As it reads now the State board shall have general supervision of all the institutions of learning in the State. That would include every conceivable school, whether private or public, and since the gentleman from Onondaga assures us that there may be a difference of opinion as to the signification of the word "supervision," and inasmuch as the intention of the committee is plain, and as my own private conviction entirely agrees with that of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], that the more the higher institutions of learning are separated from State control the more they will flourish. I am certainly willing for myself to change the section in such a manner as to attain what I conceive to be the intention of the committee. That is substantially done in the amendment which he proposes, and which, as I understand it, is something of this kind: "The State board of education shall have general supervision of the common schools, and shall perform those duties which are now performed by the Board of Regents." But while I agree substantially with the amendment, my objection to it is, that if it prevail, the highly honorable and respectable Board of Regents of this State will be abolished by name, and their abolition will be made constitutionally perpetual. I therefore desire that some verbal change should be made in the amendment, and if the gentleman will modify it in that particular, I individually shall have no hesitation in supporting it. As it stands however, I shall certainly vote against it, because I am not in favor of abolishing the Board of Regents by name.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Why not say plainly what you want?

Mr. CURTIS—Because I have no hostility to the Board of Regents. My argument throughout has been simply that the duties performed by it would be more wisely done in the way suggested in this report,

The PRESIDENT—The proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], is not germane to that of his colleague [Mr. Alvord]. This was not discovered by the Chair at the time the amendment was offered, for the reason that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] did not furnish his amendment to the Secretary. The pending question is first on the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], to strike out the fourth section down to and including the word "law" in the sixth line, and to insert in lieu thereof "the Secretary of State shall be superintendent of public education, and as such shall have such powers, and perform such duties as may be prescribed by law.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared lost.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock and again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Education as amended in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT announced the pending question to be on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I think that the amendment was ruled out of order at the time I offered it. It was offered under a misapprehension of the extent to which it was proposed to strike out. I offer it now in a little different form. I move to amend section 4 by striking out in line fourteen the words "all the institutions of learning in this State" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the common schools of the State." If this amendment shall prove acceptable to the Convention, it leaves the board of education in the article, if the Convention shall determine to constitute such a board, and it confines that board to the common school system of the State leaving open the question of what number the board shall consist. In the mean time, I hope to rally to the support of this amendment all those who are opposed to placing the higher institutions of learning in the State under the unlimited control of the board of education now proposed to be created. I gave the reasons this morning as well as I was able, briefly, why in my judgment, the colleges and academies of the State ought not to be subjected to State control, and ought not to be merged into one system with the common schools of the State. For the reason which I then gave, as well as I was able, I hope that this amendment may prevail.

Mr. CURTIS—I wish to offer a substitute for the one proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] which I will read for the information of the Convention: "The Board of Education shall have general supervision of the common schools, and such care of all other institutions of learning which receive aid from the State, or which now are or hereafter may be subject to State visitations as the law may prescribe. The term of office shall be determined by law." My object in offering the substitute is this: it seems to me to be the desire of many gentlemen on the floor to leave the general relation of the State to the various institutions of learning to which it has any relation whatever at the present time undisturbed. It is however, the desire of the committee that these relations shall all be subject to one head and therefore, specifying what these relations are, my amendment provides in detail and serially for the common schools and for the academies and for the colleges which are the only institutions over which any State care is now exercised, and it retains by name the specific character of the care of which is exercised by the State. Therefore, sir, I shall vote for the substitute which I propose in place of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] which will secure the present relation of the State to the various institutions precisely as it now exists. The section already adopted secures to academies the revenues of the literature fund. But the change which is worked by the substitute which I have now offered is that all this care is vested in one supreme department, and therefore all those who believe with me, and who agree with me in the general course of the discussion that has taken place will, of course, see that the intention of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is to leave precisely where it is now what the committee had in view slightly to disturb.

Mr. LARREMORE—I do not see that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] accomplishes the object intended by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. It virtually leaves the academies and higher seminaries under the supervision of the same authority that has charge of the common schools. I understand the object which the gentleman from Onondaga seeks to accomplish is to confine that authority to common schools, and, therefore, in that view I shall be compelled to vote against the substitute of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis].

Mr. CURTIS—My friend from New York [Mr. Larremore] will understand that the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga is diametrically opposed so far as the unity of care is concerned, to the one he offered this morning. This morning he proposed a board of education that should also discharge such duties as are now performed by the Board of Regents. No gentleman who feels with me, of course, can support the substitute of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock].

Mr. COMSTOCK—The amendment which I now offer is not antagonistic to the one that I offered this morning; but it is a little less extensive in its reach. I will explain the situation in case my amendment should be adopted—if this amendment shall be accepted by the Convention—and if the article be afterward adopted there will be, in place of the present superintendent of public instruction, a State board of education, of which the superintendent will be one, that board to be constituted of such numbers as we may hereafter agree upon when we reach that question. The functions of that board will be confined, without any change in the laws of the State, to the common schools, as the functions of the present superintendent of public instruction are confined to that sphere. But the whole effect of the proposition will be that the State board shall have the supervision of common schools, and shall perform such other duties as the Legislature may prescribe. That is the whole of my proposition. Now, Mr. President, that constitutional provision, if we shall adopt it, leaves the Board of Regents in existence with the care and management of the State library, and with such power of visitation of the literary institutions of the State as they now have. It leaves that board undisturbed. This I desire the Convention clearly to understand, for it is my meaning; but the provision will confer a power upon the Legislature to devolve the functions of that board, if it shall see fit so to do, upon the board of education to be created by this Constitution. That power will arise and may be exercised under the words "and shall perform such other duties as the Legislature may prescribe." It will be, therefore, for the Legislature hereafter, if it shall be thought wise and expedient so to do, to abolish the Board of Regents, or to take from that board any portion of its functions and confer them upon the board of education. The Convention will not do it if the proposition is accepted. The Convention will not do it, but the power will be left in the Legislature to do it if it shall be thought wise so to do. Now, I object to the proposition of my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] because it does not really change the original character of his plan as reported to this Convention; because the board is still to exercise a general supervision over the institutions of learning; the power is conferred upon the Legislature in terms altogether too broad and sweeping for the benefit of these institutions and for the welfare of the education in its higher branches. I repeat that, for the reasons which I have endeavored to state to the Convention, the educational interests of the people in the higher departments of knowledge are not a matter of State concern, and, being a matter of private liberality and of private endowment, the State should touch them just as lightly as possible. It is all very well to have some authority in the State like the Board of Regents, or like this board of education, if the Legislature shall see fit hereafter to substitute it; I say it may be all very well to have a power of visitation of these institutions to see that nothing is going on in them contrary to the peace and good order of the State; but while the laws of the State are observed in these institutions—while nothing indecent or unlawful is going on in them—I insist that the State should keep its hands from them. I believe, sir, and it is a solemn conviction in my mind, that higher education will never flourish unless the State lets it alone. What is the amendment of my friend from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]? It is that if one of these institutions of learning shall receive a dollar from the State, it shall be subject absolutely to the control of the State. An institution cannot go to the State and ask for one hundred dollars, or the State, in its liberality, give to it a hundred dollars, without subjecting it to the absolute control of the State board, if the gentleman's amendment shall become a part of the organic law. This is the scope of the amendment and it is upon that ground that I object to it as not essentially changing the character of his original proposition.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Curtis, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 27 ayes to 31 noes.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I now renew the motion I made in Committee of the Whole to strike out of this section all after the sixth line. It will be observed that the chairman of the Committee on Education claimed that there should not be two boards of education, and that if the board proposed in this article was adopted the powers and duties of the Regents of the University should be transferred to the new board, so that there should not be two boards of education. The Convention having refused in effect to take away from the Board of Regents their present powers, the chairman of the Committee on Education [Mr. Curtis] and his friends, I trust, will not insist upon the adoption of the section under consideration.

Mr. FERRY—Inasmuch as I expect to vote for this amendment, on the motion to strike out offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], I desire to state the reason briefly why I do so. I have no very certain opinions of the merits of this controversy which has occupied the attention of the Convention for some time past. My reason for voting to strike this out is, because I think the time inopportune to make the change that is contemplated here by the Committee on Education, which has reported this section. Unfortunately, a controversy, and one which has become somewhat angry, has arisen in regard to abolishing the Board of Regents. I have no well defined opinion as to who is to blame upon this thing. I have no charges to make against any body for it. It is unfortunate that the dispute has occurred; but that fact, to my mind, renders it inexpedient for this Convention to take this action at this time. I wish to say, in defense of the position I occupy, that I have great respect for the action of the committee. I believe that in their labors they have been assiduous and devoted, and that they have done their work well; but I object to adopting their recommendation for the reason I have stated. I believe it to be better that the Convention take no action when there is no necessity, by which a weight might be placed upon our labors in endeavoring to carry them through the ordeal which they have to pass before the people. If I had no doubt — if my opinion was clear either upon the one side or the other—then I should stand by it; but not deeming it very important I think we had better leave the matter where it has been left. Nothing has been more frequent than for me to hear among my constituents statements in regard to the length of the time that has been occupied in our labors, and they very much fear that the State Convention has undertaken to do too much; that they have laid out too large a work instead of confining themselves to the manifest wants of the present Constitution. To some extent there is truth in these criticisms. At any rate that conviction has become deep seated in the minds of the people, and I have respect enough to regard it, at least so far as my action in this matter is concerned.

Mr. LARREMORE—As a member of the committee I desire to make an explanation in reference to what might be regarded as a seeming inconsistency on my part in reference to the motion I advocated this morning. In the position in which the question stood this morning I took the ground that we should not have two boards in reference to the educational interests of this State. The Board of Regents have now a supervision of the common schools; and if the proposed board were created the common schools would have to report to that board and we should have two boards having control. Inasmuch as we have determined to retain the Board of Regents I shall be compelled to vote for the motion to strike out.

Mr. CURTIS—The Committee on Education in reporting this article proposed no change in the State care but only in the limit of its exercise. It was with that view they made the suggestion for a State board of education. By accepting the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] the Convention has passed upon that question. It has decided that it will not make the proposed change in the care of the educational institutions of the State. Having proceeded so far it would be folly of course for the committee to continue this debate, and I therefore trust that all those who with me voted in favor of a State board of education, in order that all the various institutions of education might be under the charge of that board, now that the Convention has decided to have no such board, will abandon the support of the section and vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] to strike out.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Verplanck to strike out all of the section after the sixth line, and it was declared carried.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out the remainder of the section not stricken out on motion of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck].

Mr. MERRITT—That is doing away with the appointment of the superintendent of public instruction.

Mr. CURTIS—I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] will prevail.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger to strike out the remainder of the section, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the fifth section of the report by the Committee of the Whole, as follows:

SEC. 5. Instruction in the common schools and union schools of this State shall be free, under such regulations as the Legislature may provide.

Mr. BARTO—I propose an amendment to this section by offering the substitute found on page 599 of the Journal, as follows:

"SEC. 5. The Legislature shall not impose upon the people of the State, for school purposes, a greater tax, in the aggregate, than one-fourth mill upon the dollar in any one year."

The sphere and duty of government is the protection of the citizen in his person and property, and so far as it is necessary to use the citizen's money to furnish him protection of person and property, government has the right to take by taxes his money, but according to the theory of the founders of our institutions, government can go no further. Says a distinguished writer:

"The public, the government, are but aggregates of individuals, and no quality, power, or right resides in the aggregate which does not previously exist in the component individuals."

Government is not a true and real source of any thing; it is an agency combining and directing powers which originate elsewhere. It seems absurd, but no less needful, to repeat, that every penny of taxes which it pays, whether to the army, to the judges, to a school, or to a picture gallery, it first receives from somebody. Hence arises the question: all these receipts being enforced, has the government a right to take a penny from John to pay for the teaching of William's son? Is any such agency included in the objects for which government is appointed? It neither pays for the teaching of William's son with money it has earned, nor with goods which it has created, but with either the money or the goods earned or created by somebody else, and it takes it, in the last necessity, by force. Where is the warrant? The answer, and the only answer made, is; that it is necessary to educate to make secure person and property. The answer is more specious than wise, it being impossible to show that mere education makes a man better. The experience of those nations in Europe where are established free schools, and where compulsory attendance is enforced, and where statistics show there are scarcely none who are unable to write and read, and thoroughly instructed in the elemental branches of education, notwithstanding their free school education, in immorality and the vices of mankind, they are far in advance, being the most immoral and vicious. Proving that mere education does not prevent crime and vice. It may make a villain or rogue more adroit. It would be a strange claim to say that Monroe Edwards or Sanford Conover were better men than rascals of less or no education. If the claim was for religious education, there would be more reason and force in the argument, but we are so divided in religious sentiment that no one asserts or suggests the right of taxation for the purpose of building churches, and supporting teachers of religion. Besides, the experience of the world has shown that religious establishments flourish best where individual enterprise furnishes the money. The cry of free schools, as if they were free from burdens, and the name would make them free as the air we breathe, or the speech we indulge in, has a very pretty sound, but when we feel and estimate the millions of taxation it causes, and the recklessness with which the money is spent, seems to an overburdened people, to bear the impress of a far different name than free. "The property of the State must educate the children of the State," is a communist idea, that to many has the wisdom of an adage—and might be such if the State had any children, and could exercise the functions of paternity and maternity. But the State has no children. The child belongs to the family. The family is utterly ignored under such a theory. The father and mother of the child have no duties to perform, all are usurped by the State. There is nothing left, provided this section stands, and is fully carried out, to the parent, but the begetting of the child, and after birth the State is to take them and bring them up to religion or irreligion, as the majority may declare. Are we prepared for such a doctrine as this proposed by the committee? Free schools made so by enormous taxation, forced from the people, and free attendance of children forced upon the parent. If this is freedom, in what do we differ from monarchy? Only the monarch is the tyrant, instead of the majority. No, sir, the State cannot thus usurp the sphere and duty of the parent. The State by and through its hired and disinterested agents, can never and ought never to take the place of the parent. Who has the greatest and most abiding interest in the education of the child? Is it not the parent? Says John Locke, in his essay upon government: "The power that parents have over their children, arises from that duty which is incumbent on them, to take care of their offspring during the imperfect state of childhood. To inform the mind and govern the actions of their yet ignorant nonage, till reason shall take its place, and ease them of that trouble is what the children want and the parents are bound to." When the day comes that the children of the State are given up to the care of the superintendents of public instruction and commissioners of schools, we may bid farewell to religion, virtue, freedom and education itself. Leave something for the family if you would retain in our land the freedom and virtue we have left. Give the family its duty, and let that duty by the family be performed. If poorly, it will then be better done than by State agents or agencies. All appreciate the importance of education; and the importance and value set upon it led the Governor of the State, the first year after the adoption of the Constitution, to recommend aid in establishing schools throughout the State. The design being to encourage the people in every locality to build school-houses and by furnishing the opportunity and paying a small portion of the expense by the State at large and equal amount by the locality—and the bulk by the individual, availing themselves of the advantages and thus by a small aid from the State the originators of our school system sought to promote education. Our fathers appreciated every thing that cost them labor and effort—the value of the thing being generally in ratio to its cost. Hence they never thought of giving or making education free, regarding it as every thing else if free, and without cost to recipients, comparatively worthless. All were to be given at small expense the rudiments of an education, and for this purpose and this alone State aid was given, and thus stimulating the desire in all to acquire knowledge rather than to give it to them without cost or effort. I think they were wise in not going further, and only erred in departing from principle; and that I may not misrepresent the men who gave character and from whom we derive every thing that is valuable in the common school system, and because they have said for me and with more force on account of their learning and experience, I propose to read from their reports short extracts. I shall read from reports of the following superintendents of common schools: Hon. Azariah C. Flagg, Gen. John A. Dix, and Hon. John C. Spencer—three men who have distinguished themselves in every department of public affairs in which they were placed—men who as I think, wisely refused to degrade our schools to a pauper system. They felt it was the duty of the father to educate his family, and did not wish to relieve him of the responsibility. They knew a State system, controlled and managed by men seeking place and salaries, would dwindle and become sickly under management that is interested only in drawing salaries and increasing emoluments and power in the hands of men who really care little about education except as it pays in money, place and power. I cite first Secretary Flagg's report on schools in 1832:

"Our system happily combines the two principles of a State fund and a town tax. Enough is apportioned from the State treasury to invite and encourage the co-operation of the districts and towns, and not so much as to induce the inhabitants to believe that they have nothing more to do than to hire a teacher to absorb the public money. * * * * When if the whole expense was provided by a State fund, they would allow the trustees to receive and expend the money, as if it was a matter which did not interest the great body of the inhabitants of the district. The common school system of this State is founded upon the principle that the public funds shall be applied to the payment of the wages of teachers of the district schools, in all cases where the inhabitants of a neighborhood will tax them. selves for the erection of a school-house and furnishing it with necessary fuel and appendages."

Says Hon. A. C. Flagg, Secretary of State, in his report in 1831, in reference to two systems of schools, free or inhabitants paying part:

"An eminent individual has pronounced that system the best where a State fund is provided as an inducement to the inhabitants to organize districts, and which at the same time requires such a local tax as will command the attention of the inhabitants and excite an interest in the district operations."

And adds a note:

"Of the three modes of providing for popular instruction—that in which the scholars pay every thing and the public nothing, that in which the public pays every thing and the scholars nothing, and that in which the burden is shared by both—the exposition given by Dr. Chalmers * * * in favor of the last appears to us unanswerable. When the people know that they can get their instruction for nothing they care very little about it, and are so apt to wait till the proper period for education be gone, without seeking it at all, that we perfectly agree with this most accurate observer of the habits of his countrymen, that 'one consequence of charity (or free) schools with us has been a diminution of the quantity of education."

Says Hon. A. C. Flagg, in his report on schools, Jan. 7, 1833:

"There is some difference of opinion among the friends of universal instruction as to the mode of providing funds for maintaining the school; which is best adapted to the accomplishment of the object. Of the three modes of providing for popular instruction—that in which the scholars pay every thing and the public nothing; that in which the public pays every thing and the scholars nothing; and that in which the burden is shared by both, Dr. Chalmers, in his considerations on the parochial schools of Scotland, gives a decided preference to the latter mode which is the system adopted by the State of New York. This system offers to each neighborhood a small sum yearly as an inducement to the inhabitants to tax themselves and to establish and maintain a school. The sum distributed is not so large as to induce a belief that the inhabitants have no exertions to make themselves; on the contrary, it is coupled with such terms as to require a school-house to be erected and a considerable sum to be expended, before the district can participate in the public fund; and this fund, as the returns show, pays so small a share (only one-eleventh of the school expenditures), that there is a continued necessity for individuals to tax themselves in order to keep up the school. This feature in our system, which authorizes district taxation, and which requires individuals to pay beyond the amount received from the public, has a beneficial influence upon the school and all the district operations. The power given districts to levy taxes upon all property of the inhabitants, for school-houses, repairs, appendages and fuel, induces a punctual attendance of all the taxable inhabitants at the school meeting; those citizens who have most at stake in the district are induced to act as trustees, in order to secure themselves against improvident taxation, and all the ills of a careless administration of the district affairs; and even the persons who patronize the school are induced by the assessment to send their children with more punctuality in order to get an equivalent for their money; when if the whole sum was paid by the State, these same persons might neglect the school as a matter with which they had very little concern."

And in a note the Secretary commends this remark:

"We know from common and universal experience that little interest is felt in that which demands neither expense nor attention."

The Secretary further adds:

"The amount distributed from the school fund of this State has been eminently serviceable in arousing the public attention, and in affording an inducement for the establishment of schools, when otherwise they might have been neglected. This is all that can be beneficially done by a public fund."

Gen. Dix, Secretary of State in 1834, says in his report on schools:

"Experience in other States has proved what has been abundantly confirmed by our own, that too large a sum of public money distributed among the common schools has no salutary effect. Beyond a certain point the voluntary contributions of the inhabitants decline in amount with almost uniform regularity as the contributions from a public fund increase."

He says further in same report:

"The organization of the system is complete; the public fund secures to it annually a sum entirely adequate to call forth exertions from those on whose voluntary contribution its support mainly depend."

Gen. Dix, in his report in 1835, in discussing the system of free schools in Prussia, says:

"It has indeed been said that in establishing systems of public education, the government and not the people must give the impulse. But however true the observation may be of other countries, experience has shown that it has no application to our own. * * * It is hardly necessary to say that the leading features of such a system are wholly incompatible with the genius of our institutions. * * * It was for a long time contended by the most profound writers that the support of religious societies could not be safely intrusted to the voluntary contributions of the people. But our experience has completely overturned the arguments on which this fallacy is founded, and it gives the strongest assurance that the same enlightened sentiments which have so liberally sustained the established systems of religious worship and instruction will, with equal liberality, sustain those systems of early moral and intellectual cultivation."

Same officer, Gen. Dix, says in his report in 1836:

"If the expenses of the common school system were all defrayed by a public fund and by property, it is apprehended that the worst effects would ensue. A man with a large number of children may sometimes feel the expense of their education a burden. But his contributions for the very reason that they are made with some difficulty, give him a deep interest in seeing that the affairs of the district are managed with economy and prudence. The effect of the present mode (1836), of providing for the expenses of the system, is undoubtedly to surround it with interested and watchful observers, who will be vigilant in detecting abuses and in seeking proper redress.

In same report he says:

"The Prussian system is maintained upon a plan very similar to ours, so far as expenses are concerned. The government pays something toward the support of schools. The property of the vicinage pays something more, and the residue is paid by those who send their children to school."

Gen. Dix says in his report in 1838:

"The common school system of this State has been carried to its present high degree of excellence principally by persuasion, by appeals to the interest of the inhabitants of school districts; and it is believed that the improvements of which the schools are susceptible may be secured by a continuance of the same policy. To change a system of measures which has worked so well, for compulsory enactments, would be unwise; nor is it deemed advisable to impose on the inhabitants of school districts any further burdens.

Gen. Dix, in his report in 1839, says:

"The common school system of this State is of comparatively recent origin. The first law authorizing the establishment of common schools was passed about twenty-six years ago. In the management of the economical and pecuniary affairs of the district there is nothing to be desired. Greater regularity in the administration of this part of the system cannot well be fancied."

John C. Spencer says in his report of 1840:

"While public beneficence is bestowed in such a degree as to stimulate individual enterprise it performs its proper office; when it exceeds that limit, it tempts to reliance upon its aid, and necessarily relaxes the exertions of those who receive it. The spirit of our institutions is hostile to such dependence; it requires that the citizens should exercise constant vigilance over their own institutions as the surest means of preserving them. A direct pecuniary contribution to the maintenance of schools identifies them with the feeling of the people, and secures their faithful and economical management. A reference to the condition of the free schools and other institutions of learning in England, which have been overloaded by endowments, will exhibit not only the jobbing peculation which has perverted them from the noble objects for which they were designed, but will show that when the government and wealthy individuals have contributed the most, the people have done the least either in money or effort; and that instead of being nurseries of instruction for the whole, they have been almost exclusively appropriated to the benefit of the few. * * * These schools were not of the people; they did not establish them, nor did they contribute to their support; and of course they regarded them as things in which they had little or no interest. In the State of Connecticut the large endowment of the public schools produce lassitude and neglect, and in many instances the funds were perverted to other purposes to such an extent that an entire charge in the system became necessary. Free schools partake so much of the nature of charitable institutions that those who can possibly afford to educate their children at select schools will do so in preference to sending them to the district schools for gratuitous instruction; and thus a practical distinction would be created between the children of the republic, hostile to the spirit of our government and inimical to those great feelings of equality among all our citizens which constitute genuine republicanism. In the cities, where there are large numbers who would not be instructed at all if free schools were not provided, the evil must be encountered as being less in degree than that of total ignorance But in the country districts, such destitution merely exists, and when it does provision is made by law for gratuitous instruction in each particular case."

John C. Spencer, in report of 1841, says:

"The superintendent retains the doubt expressed in the last annual report, whether this capital at present needs any provision for its enlargement. He does not believe that the public schools could be made charitable institutions, with any benefit to them or the community. While the means of providing education for the indigent, and of sustaining individual enterprise are thus abundant, the payment by those who are able, of a small remuneration for the instruction of their children, will induce that constant vigilance which is essential to the preservation and improvement of the system. The idea of gratuitous education comes from, and is better adapted to those countries where the working classes are impoverished by the taxation, in various forms, by the government, which, having thus rendered them dependent, degrades them by its bounty as a compensation for its exactions. With us, the rewards of labor are left with those who earn them, and they are thus rendered able to provide for their wants without being indebted to the government; and that personal feeling of independence which places men on an equality, is preserved as the foundation on which free institutions can alone rest. The schools to which a citizen has contributed become the objects of his solicitude, and their faithful and economical management is thus secured. It is believed that the provisions in our system, which require that indigent persons shall be exempted from all charges for the tuition of their children, and yet demand, from those who are able to make it, a compensation to the teacher, rendered inconsiderable by the public benefactions, have attained the happy and exact medium adapted to our habits and institutions. The exemption is silent and quiet, the feelings of none are injured; and while our schools are really free to the poor, they are not confined to them, nor are they eleemosynary, but children of all conditions there meet and mingle as they are to meet and mingle in after life, on terms of equality."

These, sir, are the opinions of the learned men who gave to our common school system its character, and brought it to the condition in which it was praised by all; a system which from many thousands who failed to avail themselves of its advantages in 1815, was so stimulated that the entire children of the State were brought into the schools in 1841, and our schools continued to prosper until too much aid was given, and since then the schools have declined and continue to decline. A pauper system may and perhaps does work well in our cities, but is not acceptable or productive of good results in the country. I am informed, however, by men, original advocates of free schools in our cities, and who have been long connected with their boards of education, that even there the system is a failure and ought to be changed. The money raised by taxation is foolishly and often corruptly spent. Parents have lost all interest in the schools, and they must ultimately be a disastrous failure. We are admonished of the difference between schools under governmental patronage and management and those under the management of the people, without patronage, by the first schools established in Virginia and Boston. The first school in Virginia was established by government, with a princely endowment, and fell through, while the school in Boston, established by the people, without patronage, has continued to widen its influence. It is true that latterly they have had school funds and school systems in some parts of New England, but we have the testimony of some of her wisest and best men, for saying that they have not profited by the change. Hobart College, of this State, and several other of our institutions of learning in this country, have tried the experiment of making them free. Instead of increasing the number of students the attendance became less and less, until they were oblired to charge for tuition. Students and parents alike were adverse to a charity or pauper institution, and would not patronize. A series of questions were presented to the superintendent of public instruction by resolution of the Convention early in the summer, the answers to which would show, if we could get them, that the ratio of attendance upon our common schools has decreased in the ratio of aid given. The superintendent, as is his custom, declines to answer the questions, upon the ground he has not the time to do so. He cannot see the value of an exhibit showing what is accomplished and what is failed to be accomplished—that our schools, with aid given, to a certain extent improved in efficiency, but after that limit was reached they have declined in efficiency. He has abundant time to spend in attending State, county and ward conventions, but no time to tabulate information showing his management a failure. He is engaged in running the political public school machine. His clerks can spend their time in stumping the country prior to an election, and get up petitions and circulate to influence the Convention, but no time to give us facts upon which to predicate our action. I hope, sir, we will not authorize our State Legislature to raise money by taxation to make our schools free: first, because it is wrong in principle; second, because by it education is not promoted, and, third, because the State will not, as a State, so well perform the duty as the individual citizen. Another, and fourth objection is, that if your Constitution contains this provision, it will be rejected by the people. The committee who have reported this article it seems to me, do not apprehend the active and determined hostility this section of their article will arouse among the people in the country districts. This question has twice been before the people, by a law submitted to them in 1849, and again submitted in 1850. The law was adopted by the people in 1849 by a very large majority. In 1850, excluding the cities, it would have been rejected by about 60,000 majority. The vote stood, in 1860, in the whole State:

For law—or rather against repeal, ...	209,947
For repeal, ...	184,208
Majority against repeal	24,939

The three counties of New York, Kings and Albany gave over 53,000 majority for the law, and the six counties of New York, Kings, Albany, Erie, Dutchess and Onondaga in each of which counties there are large cities, gave a majority against repeal of over 63,000. Notwithstanding the majority in the State against repeal; the justice of its repeal and the injustice of forcing a pauper system on the country districts caused its repeal by the Legislature. The burdens of taxation are now so much greater than they were in 1840 and 1850 that it would seem apparent to all that a provision entailing upon the people such a load of taxation for all time could not with any possibility receive the sanction of the people. I can assure the committee that the opponents of this provision will use all their efforts to defeat a Constitution containing so objectionable a feature. There is another objection to the section as reported by the committee. The section reads as follows: "instruction in the common schools and union schools of this State shall be free." How or in what manner free? They have always been free for all children to attend them. And no one proposes to change. How then are they to be free?—from taxation, or rate bill? How is this word free to be understood? The proposition should be clearly stated and to explain the intention of the committee the words "shall be free," should be stricken out and the words "shall be supported by taxation" inserted, so that the section will read:

"Instruction in the common schools and union schools of this State shall be supported by taxation under such regulations as the Legislature may provide."

Thus you state the question honestly and fairly and the Legislature and the people can understand what is meant. The word free does not express any such idea as I suppose they intend. I may be wholly mistaken, and if it is intended by the word to say that we shall have schools supported without, or free from taxation, I hope the chairman will consent to an amendment clearly expressing such intention. My amendment proposes to reduce taxation in the State between two and four millions of dollars, and yet give the schools more State aid than was deemed desirable by the eminent men whose opinions I have just read. Is it not wise for us to make some efforts to relieve the tax payers of the State? There have been efforts made to increase debts in this Convention. There have been efforts made to devise means to get hold of more property of the tax payer to tax, but no effort yet to reduce the burdens of the much abused "public goose" the tax payer. no one has any sympathy for him. He must bear all the load of debt and taxation, and the only reward is a kick because he does not yield up more of his substance for taxation. I think my amendment is a step in the right direction—less taxation. I hope it may be adopted or that the section may be stricken out.

Mr. KINNEY—No question, Mr. President, has been before this Convention which so directly and so seriously affects the great mass of people in whose behalf governments are instituted, as the one now under consideration. Having recognized the principle that all political power resides in the people, and that they, to an almost unlimited degree, rule in this land, we cannot too carefully guard in the fundamental law the moral and intellectual character of that governing power; we cannot be too watchful over the purity of the fountain of our State and national politics and of all State and national institutions. Governments necessarily partake of the characteristics of the governing classes. The institutions of a State are but the crystalized ideas of the people who govern the State. Those States which have attained the greatest success in all the elements of successful governments are those in which the governing elements have been the most thoroughly and universally educated. Believing in the principle of the equality of human rights, and having established thereon our system of popular government, we are under peculiar obligation to carry out that principle to its logical and legitimate conclusion, by making that system of government as perfect as possible by perfecting its source and working power. Monarchies are perfect, as monarchies, only when the monarch himself is a perfect monarch. Republics are perfect, as republics, only when the ruling power, the people, are perfect. When we consider that the true and legitimate end of all government is the utmost development and perfection of humanity, then we must come to regard monarchies as the most imperfect and unreliable of all governments. We see them, then, as pyramids standing upon their apex, and upheld in that unnatural position, not by the internal and eternal principle of right and justice, not by the moral sense of the people, but by the external propping and bracing of the bayonets which may be commanded to that end. We are apt, in viewing such governments from a distant stand-point, to mistake their great brilliancy and military display for real strength and success as legitimate human governments. In truth, they are the greatest possible failures when the true ends and objects of governments are considered, viz.: the protection of all their subjects in the enjoyment of all the rights which their Creator has bestowed upon them, and the ultimate development of a perfect humanity. Modern wise men now tell us that the pyramids of Egypt were not built for the glory of the Pharaohs, but as a great stroke of national policy to give employment, wages and bread to the people. We are also told that Paris is not only the "glory of France," but that "Paris is France," and that whatever contributes to the glory of Paris contributes to the glory of France. And this patronizing adulation comes from Americans now worshiping at the feet of Napoleon III, who say his triumphal arch, which cost several millions, evinces wonderful political and economical sagacity, for while it added to the glory of Paris, and therefore to the glory of France, it also gave employment, wages and bread to the people. Now, I can conceive how the true ends of government could be attained, the laborers of Egypt and France get employment, wages and bread, and the glory of those proud nations be maintained and even magnified without such an aimless and fruitless waste of labor and wealth The labor and wealth sunk in the pyramids and triumphal arches might have been so employed as not only to give employment, wages and bread to the people, but also to have erected thousands of comfortable and permanent dwellings for the poor, hospitals for the sick, and schools for the ignorant. And when the American toady abroad should be constrained to ask for the monuments to the glory of the Pharaohs and Napoleons, the people could say, as did the cockneys of London, when asked for the monument to Sir Christopher Wren, "look about you and you will see them in the comfort, intelligence and happiness of the people." To those taught to regard governments as instituted for the benefit of some privileged class which have usurped the right to govern, and that the great mass of mankind were made to contribute to the same end by their slavish toils, such manifestations of grandeur and glory may seem eminently proper and befitting; but in the American Republic, where, theoretically, at least, "no man liveth unto himself," they are sadly out of place. As we have no superior classes here ruling by divine right, so here the people stand upon the most perfect and absolute equality, and rule without hinderance or restraint from any power not of their own creating. Their greatest boast is that their government guarantees to every man the exercise of the largest natural liberty, and the enjoyment of every natural right not inconsistent with the welfare of the whole. In short, that the greatest glory of the government consists in developing the broadest and most perfect humanity among all classes and conditions of men. While the monarchies of the world boast of developing a few great men, and of building monuments and triumphal arches to their greatness, our own republic boasts that it develops and perfects humanity, and points to a nation of good, wise and happy people as the monument of its greatness. Governments controlled by the few conserve the interests and greatness of the few. Governments controlled by the entire people must necessarily subserve the interests of the entire people. And as the aims of our government are broader, and its designs deeper in the work of developing the humanity of the race, so will its results be greater, and the monument of its greatness be the more glorious. It is true that we see not yet the full fruits of popular government; but equally true is it that our Republic is but in its infancy, and that as yet no system for the free education of all the people has been put into practical operation. The elaborate outlay for the education of the governing elements of Europe, drawn from the earnings of the producing classes, perfect them in the peculiar work of governing for their own special interest and glory; and when a tithe of it shall have been devoted to the education of the governing element in this country (the people), then, and not till then, will have been laid the chief corner stone of a perfect and successful republic. Our fathers established a government based on natural laws, so far as it was then deemed practicable. They dug and brought to light those natural rights of man which had so long been ignored or covered up by the prevailing idea of caste, and to some degree, at least, incorporated them in the organic laws. Thomas Jefferson sounded the key-note when he declared that all men were created equal; and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed Self-government is founded in nature; it inheres in the very constitution of man; is a part of the law of his being; and all the laws of society affecting the question of government are but agreements among the people who constitute a State regulating the exercise of a natural right. And having recognized the supremacy of the natural laws in the construction of a free government, we stop short of carrying that recognition to its logical conclusions by ignoring some of the most important laws of man's being. We appropriate money beyond the power of computation in ministering to his mere physical wants. We spend millions upon millions upon canals, railroads, and other avenues of commerce; we pile up laws at the rate of more than a thousand a year to aid in the accumulation of wealth, and surround that wealth, when acquired, with every conceivable guard and protection. The energies of the State are expended in the development of the wealth that perishes, while scarcely a feeble spasm is devoted to the truer and more legitimate end of government—the development of man. The parent is forbidden by penal laws to utterly neglect the physical wants of his children, but no such guard is set over the starvation of their minds. We build poor-houses, asylums, and various other charitable institutions, support them by taxation, donations, and other devices for raising the necessary funds, for the very laudable purpose of clothing the naked and feeding the hungry; but where in the land have we a charitable institution, the leading and distinctive feature of which is to educate the ignorant, and fit them for useful citizenship? If a very limited degree of education accompanies the other provisions, it is but an incident, and not the leading feature. Physical comforts are commendably provided for, while the mental food is withheld. In this land mind rules and mind governs, and every law of man's being points to the development of mind as the chief end of earthly existence, and an important end of earthly governments. And to this end we propose to implant in the fundamental law of this State, as the important prerequisite of the success of man as an individual, and of this government as a free government, the provision which shall make the schools of the State free to the children of the State. Why not? No gentleman who regards the ulterior end of all government to be the prosperity and happiness of the entire people, unless he be blind to the adaptation of means to ends, can answer the short interrogatory: why not? Can any thing sound or logical be interposed between free government and free education? You may as well withhold food from the child and expect it to become a man. You may as well attempt to divorce cause and effect. Can any one conceive it the duty of the State to enforce laws for the punishment of the legitimate consequences of ignorance and degredation, and not equally the duty of the same power to employ the legitimate means of removing that condition of ignorance and degredation? Do gentlemen say that the want of that moral and intellectual development of the people which the common schools afford, is not fruitful of crime and its consequent miseries? Let them but open their eyes and look about; let them consult their own every-day observations and experiences; let them examine the statistics at their command, and they have overwhelming answers to all such propositions. Long and careful study of prison statistics satisfy me that thirty-three per cent of the criminals of our country may be ranked as uneducated, and they may bear the stronger term of the grossly ignorant people of the country. English statistics show that fully one-third of their convicts can neither read nor write; and that only about one in seventy can be considered educated. Probably a large percentage of the balance have so little education that they might with propriety be classed among the grossly ignorant of the kingdom. The statistics of the Monroe county penitentiary, at Rochester, exhibit the fact that about one-fourth of the inmates are without education of any kind whatever, and as many more have none that is available for practical purposes. The Albany penitentiary presents a still stronger record. According to the last report, about one-half the inmates can neither read nor write, and about one-sixth can read only. Of the remainder a large number, no doubt, can be regarded as having no practical education. This unusual percentage of ignorance in the Albany prison, may be attributed to the fact that it has received a large number of its inmates from the District of Columbia, where the institution of slavery has so long been hostile to public education. A system of secular instruction prevails in the Clinton prison to a very limited degree, and the report is most favorable, indeed, to the moralizing influence of even that very limited intellectual culture. But in that prison, as elsewhere, the passion of greed among its managers, which looks to making it a paying, instead of a reforming, institution, restricts unreasonably the time which might be profitably employed in that moral and intellectual development, so essential to a proper balance of the human mind. I am unable to ascertain the educational status of the Clinton prisoners when admitted; but reports from other prisons and penitentiaries fully sustain the views I have expressed, and show that at least one-third of all the inmates of our prison houses, from the county jail to the State penitentiary, may be classed as grossly ignorant, and that fully one-half have not sufficient education to be of any practical value in life. The census of 1860 discloses the fact that of the population of our own State who have attained the age and status of accountability to our criminal laws, only about one in fifty are so ignorant as to be unable to read and write. But it has been urged that such intellectual development as results from a common school education, has no appreciable influence over moral conduct—that, in short, intellectual development is not moral development. There is evidently some truth in this position, but not enough to compensate for the error. A purely intellectual education is not moral education. But there never was, and probably never will be, any system of intellectual development which does not affect, for good or ill, the moral sentiments of the pupil; and besides, the system of public school education which has prevailed in this and other States, very judiciously, though not as efficiently as could be desired, combine moral and intellectual instruction. When our common schools attain the perfection to which they are tending, and which, I trust, they will soon reach, then all those substantial virtues, the practice of which makes noble and exemplary men, will be both theoretically and practically taught therein. But I insist, sir, that a purely intellectual education is of itself a strong guaranty against subsistence in our prisons or poor-houses, at the public expense. We are all creatures seeking happiness; and unless we become so low as to be indifferent to pleasure or pain, we will seek happiness in some department of the mental energies. The man without intellectual or moral culture will seek pleasure in the domain of the passions and propensities. He who is endowed with a fine and highly cultivated intellect finds in its exercise the highest order of enjoyment which it is possible for man to attain; and to withhold his intellectual food would be the most painful privation of life. Such a man has a keen relish for mental pursuits, and in them he finds a sweeter pleasure than the non-intellectual man does in the gratification of the more animal instincts of his nature. But with a fine intellect let there be a well developed morality as the governor and director of human actions, and we have the highest source of happiness and the best possible guaranty of an honorable, upright and useful life. This state, in view of its own safety as a popular government, and out of regard for its honor and standing among the States of the nation, is in duty bound to put forth efforts to secure this important end. The results cannot be accomplished through the churches, for while they teach morality, they also teach church creeds and church theology, which may be so obnoxious as to shut out the majority of those who most need moral and intellectual culture; and besides while they teach their peculiar theology which people do not feel bound to support, they fail to cultivate the intellectual powers to the propriety of which all agree, and in which all feel a common interest. It is only through the system of common schools that the State can so develop the moral and intellectual powers of the people as to render it a perfect popular government—eternally strong and secure. Not only the general welfare of society, but the safety of the State and nation demand a more complete and universal system of education. The history of riots in our land, and more especially in our cities, develops the fact that they have been confined almost exclusively to the grossly ignorant classes. The three days' reign of terror in New York, which shook the foundations of free government quite as seriously as the rebellion itself, was the bloody work of the most ignorant and degraded portions of that city. Ignorant humanity was wielded as a mighty instrument in the hands of a few wicked leaders. And what is true of that riot has been true of all the riots which with bludgeon and torch have disgraced the land. It is a remarkable fact that the four years of rebellion which shook this republic like a great political earthquake, and struck its bloody ax at the very foundation of civilization and free government, was the most virulent and fierce in the States which were the most benighted and depraved; but it gradually ran into a more modified and moderate form as it reached a more enlightened state of society. Everywhere it had its root and material support in the ignorance of the masses. For a period of many years that rebellion had been developing to its culminating point by a system of hostility to public education, amounting to almost positive prohibition. The census discloses the fact that in one of the States, which went into the rebellion the earliest, fought the fiercest, and came out the latest, every seventh white male adult could neither read nor write. Had free public schools prevailed at the South even to the limited degree they do at the North, such wicked and wanton rebellion would have been simply impossible. I do not forget, sir, the strong argument urged, that the State has no moral right to take the money of one man to educate the children of another; neither do I forget it has not the moral right to take his money to pay for the imprisonment of those children who from want of proper education have been led into crime. Do men realize that a large share of the taxes they are annually paying to build jails, prisons and penitentiaries; to maintain courts, sheriffs and prison-keepers; in short, for efforts at neutralizing the legitimate out-growth of the dense ignorance which still prevails in the land, might be saved by striking at the root of these evils through the agency of the common schools? Apply one-half the money thus expended in doctoring effects, to doctoring the cause through the agency of universal education, and you will save the other half. Is there any greater wrong in taxing a man to prevent crime than there is in taxing him to punish crime? On the contrary, does not economy and sound statesmanship dictate that we should rather educate the people, than punish them for the want of education? This protracted warfare upon the effect of a cause, instead of upon the cause of the effect, is the poorest possible economy in an individual or a State. A farmer was once seriously annoyed with flags and rushes which annually grew on his meadow land; and he studied economy in the employment of hands to pull them out. If he saved a few pence in this annual labor he boasted of his great stroke of finesse for the year. But the old man eventually died; and his son, who had received a smattering of scientific education, succeeded to the estate. He at once saw that the flags were the production of the stagnant water, which, for a portion of the year, stood on the grounds. He at once struck at the cause by drainage, and forever after saved the annoyance of the flags and expense of pulling them up. The State might learn a profitable lesson from that simple and veritable incident; and instead of lavishing so much time and money in building prisons, maintaining dignified courts, and supplying all the other expensive paraphernalia of criminal prosecutions and criminal punishment, it would work great economy as well as sound morality to drain the swamps of their malaria by sustaining the most perfect system of common school education. True, we now have on our statute books a law which seems to make ample provisions for free common schools the current year, but the very next Legislature may entertain views not unlike some gentlemen upon this floor, and return to pulling the flags instead of draining the swamp, by reducing the tax to the one-quarter mill system for the next school year. If there is any thing which should go into the Constitution and there forever remain, it is that which lays broad and deep the foundations of a free government by laying broad and deep the foundations of free education. Political considerations may frighten some from sustaining such a proposition, and a false sense of economy may lead others astray, but there has been nothing before this Convention with regard to which I have so much desired to stand upon the record as this article on education. Economical, political, national and moral considerations all demand the establishment of free schools by constitutional law. Give me control of the common schools of the State and I care not who attempts to control its politics. With universal and free education it will be safe politically, financially and morally, and when the devotees of the Pharaohs or the Napoleons shall ask for the monument of American glory and greatness we can point them to the wisest, happiest and best people beneath the sun.

Mr. SPENCER—I do not suppose that any member of this Convention opposes universal education. For myself, I am willing to see it free, and that the experiment which is now being tried shall be fully carried out; but before we commit ourselves permanently to a system, it seems to me that we had better know whether it is capable of being carried on without incurring a degree of danger and hazard arising from the circumstances in which we are placed. We heard it stated from a member of this Convention, a few days since, that in the city of New York, where the schools are free to the most unlimited extent, that a portion of the population there belonging to a religious sect did not avail itself of the freedom of education which was bestowed upon it; and the reason was, because the religion to which that class of persons was attached was not taught in the public schools, and they desire to send their children for education to schools where religion as well as other matters of instruction should be taught. The same thing occurs in other parts of the State. In the village near where I reside the free school system prevails, but notwithstanding that fact, in that village a religious denomination does not avail itself of the freedom of education which was there permitted to be enjoyed; but for the purpose of uniting religious instruction with secular they have their separate school for the education of their children. Now, sir, what I desire to call attention to is this: the day may possibly come when there will be a contest—and a severe contest, too—in various localities upon that question, which will so far interfere with the education of these localities, and perhaps with the education of the children in the State, that we shall be without a sound system of instruction as we have hitherto enjoyed. I desire to state another fact in this connection. In the single district in which I reside, a majority of the voters are of the Catholic faith. As soon as the free school system in the last year went into operation the Catholic priest in the village close by went to each individual in the district attached to his church, and advised him to be on hand at the time of the annual election, and to choose a trustee from their own number. For that there was no ground for complaint, except the fact that a person outside of the district, through motives of pretended protection of its religious faith, sought to interfere with the administration of the affairs of this school district. These difficulties in the way are those which will constantly arise under this free school system, or, at least, there is danger that such may be the case, and I think that before we commit ourselves permanently to any such system, we should let the experiment be tried under the auspices of the Legislature.

Mr. MERRITT—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto], who offered the pending amendment what amount would be raised by the tax he proposed?

Mr. BARTO—Between four and five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MERRITT — I would like to inquire whether he intends that that amount shall be collected in coin. [Laughter].

Mr. BARTO—I should like to see money again.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Barto, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BARTO—I move now a further amendment, that the words "shall be free" be stricken out, as not properly expressing the intention of the committee, and to insert in lieu thereof "shall be supported by taxation."

Mr. RUMSEY—I offer the following as a substitute:

To strike out all after the word "be," in line two, and insert the following: "without charge and the Legislature shall require by law the education of all the children in the State."

I believe it is a well established proposition now, that the cheapest way in which we can get rid of the expense of criminal jurisdiction is by educating the people. The Legislature have already adopted propositions by which schools are to be without charge. They have always, heretofore, been free for the education of every one who sees fit to send their children to school, but instruction has not been furnished to them without charge. I agree with the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto] that the language used by the committee does not properly express the intention they have in view, that the school should be free of charge, and I have inserted that language for the purpose of correcting that which I consider as a defect. Sir, when we have adopted this system it is right and proper that the parents of all children should be compelled to educate the children, and I have inserted in that amendment a proposition requiring the Legislature to provide for the education of all the children, but leave it to the option of the parent to educate his children where he pleases. But by it we furnish the means of education for all the children of the State, in accordance with the intention, and then we require that all the children of the State shall be educated. That is the provision of law in Prussia, and it works admirably; it will work admirably in our country, for it will diminish the volume of crime and the expense of criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. VAN COTT—I would ask the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] if the amendment he proposes is not open to a disputed construction? The first provision is for the free education of all the children of the State in the common schools. Then follows the provision that the State shall provide for the education of all the children in the State. Now, suppose it happens, as it has happened, that Catholic parents or Jewish parents are not willing to educate their children in the common schools, and they keep them from those schools, here is a mandate that the State shall provide for the education of all the children. Would not that be so construed as to compel the Legislature to provide separate schools for the education of that class of children? I think it might receive that construction.

Mr. RUMSEY—The intention is to impose the duty upon the Legislature to require that all children shall be educated. Nothing more. They have provided the means of education, and if those who have children are willing to avail themselves of those means it is all right. If they are unwilling to educate them in those schools thus provided and paid for at the expense of the State, then they must comply with the provision of the Legislature, and educate their children wherever they will, and find schools of their own.

Mr. BARTO—Does not my amendment clearly express the intention?

Mr. RUMSEY—No; I do not think it does.

Mr. VAN COTT—I would suggest this form to the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], "the Legislature shall provide for the education of all the children of the State in the public schools, and such education shall be free of charge."

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir; I do not propose to do that; for I do not desire to compel those who have any scruples, religious or otherwise, against sending to the public schools, to send there. I would require them to send to some school, or in some way to educate their children.

Mr. VAN COTT—The trouble with the gentleman's proposition is, that he requires the State to pay the expense of educating them at whatever school they choose to send them.

Mr. RUMSEY—The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the proposition which I submit. It is that they shall provide by law for the education of all the children; and they will have done that when they furnish free schools and require the education of the children either in those schools or wherever the parents choose to furnish this education.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I would like to ask a question; whether this is not a proper subject for legislation?

Mr. RUMSEY—It is a very proper subject for legislation, but it is better than we should put it in the Constitution, where it will not be the subject of controversy year after year at our elections, and in the Legislature by those who like the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto] are unwilling to defray any portion of the expense of educating these children who seek to get rid of taxation by appealing to popular prejudices from year to year.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I ask the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] if it is his meaning that a young man may go through college at the public expense?

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir.

Mr. E. BROOKS—It seems to me that the conclusion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] is irresistible, that the law will be capable of the construction which he has suggested; and it, therefore, becomes the Convention to consider whether, when the State enters upon the work of educating the children of the State, it is not bound to recognize those prejudices which exist among a large class of its people; to wit, the Jews, of which there are some thousands of children in the city of New York; they also have I believe some thirty or more synagogues there; and the still larger proportion of that population known as Roman Catholics, and who keep very many of their children apart from the general free schools of the city. If this proposition admits of that construction suggested, as it seems to me it does, it is wise for the Convention to consider what may be the bearings of such a proposition. I do not mean to state whether it would be just or unjust to educate all the children of the State. Nor do I think the precedent made by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] in regard to the kingdom of Prussia, to be an apt one; for he must remember that, while the children in that government are educated at the expense of the State, it is in the consideration that when they are young men they shall serve the State for the term of seven years or more—ten I believe—in the military service of that government. Therefore, the education which the State gives in one direction is paid for by the military equivalent which it receives in another. I doubt, Mr. President, whether it is wise to adopt an amendment capable of the construction to which the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] has made reference. I do believe, with all my heart, that it is wise and proper to educate the children of the State. I believe, also, that education is the greatest possible preventive of crime; and that there can be no greater economy practiced by the State than in these various modes of prevention, such, for example, as is proposed by the article under consideration, and such as was considered the other day in the article from the Committee on Charities.

Mr. VAN COTT—Will it be in order to propose a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey]?

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—It will not. There are two amendments now pending.

Mr. VAN COTT—Then I will read the amendment which I propose to offer, if that is not adopted:

"Education in the public schools shall be free of charge, and shall be provided for all the children of the State."

That is not open to misconstruction.

Mr. RUMSEY—I object to that. I propose to amend my proposition by inserting:

"The Legislature shall pass laws requiring all the children of the State to be educated."

Mr. BICKFORD—It seems to me that it will not accomplish much to say that children shall be educated unless you say in what manner they shall be educated. All parents educate their children in some way. Whether they send them to school or not they receive some sort of an education. If any thing is to be accomplished by the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey], it is necessary for him to say that they shall be educated in school; that they shall be sent to school to be educated. The fact is that all the children of the State are educated now, either in good or in evil. No person can grow up uneducated. Therefore, I apprehend that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Steuben will amount to nothing if adopted. There is no force in it, unless it is required that children shall be sent to school.

Mr. OPDYKE—I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] to be to enforce in this State the policy of compulsory education. That proposition I am in favor of. My impression is that the form of the proposition might be improved from that in which it is now presented. I had prepared an amendment for that purpose which I proposed to offer, and which I will read in the hope that the gentleman from Steuben will accept it.

SEC —. The first Legislature chosen under this Constitution shall provide by law for the compulsory attendance at a public or private school, for at least three months in each year, of every child between the ages of seven and thirteen, whose health will permit its attendance.

It seems to me that this amendment is preferable to that of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey]. It presents a more specific plan for establishing the rule of compulsory education. Whatever form that proposition may take I desire to say a few words in its support. It is no new proposition; it is no untried experiment. It is well known that that rule has been in force in Northern Germany for a long time, and that its results have been most salutary. It is known that is has placed that people in the very front rank of all nationalities in point of intelligence: and it is rapidly putting them on an equality with the foremost in political strength, power and influence. I believe it has been inaugurated also in some of the New England States, but at a period so recent that we have not yet had an opportunity to ascertain the results. But there can be no doubt that its results must be beneficent wherever it is tried, and pre-eminently so under a free government like this, where nearly every adult male shares in the administration of the government. I hold, sir, that its adoption is due to children of neglectful, intemperate and vicious parents. It is well known that to children study or mental discipline is distasteful. They prefer play. It needs the incentive of parental influence to induce them to go to school That influence is not always exerted; and the result is that the children grow up in idleness, and often with vicious habits; and when they arrive at the age of discretion, they find themselves, without any fault of their own, mere drones and outcasts in society. It is regarded as the proper province of a government to care for the unfriended infirm, such as the sick, the insane and the poor; and certainly there is no class of persons so helpless and unfriended as the children of vicious, intemperate and neglectful parents. In the next place, I hold it is due to society itself. It cannot be expected that children thus reared in ignorance and vice will become useful members of society; and, consequently, they are the material out of which our almshouses and our penitentiaries are chiefly filled. If we want to elevate the moral character of our people, and qualify them for usefulness, we can take no better means, in my judgment, than to adopt this rule of compulsory education. It has been said here this evening that these are proper questions for the Legislature. On the contrary, I believe it to be the duty of those who frame the fundamental law, thus to lay down the principles which shall govern legislation. In some cases where the Legislature has failed in its duty they must even step beyond this sphere and embrace details which properly belong to legislation. This was done by the Convention of 1846 in regard to State finances and with excellent results. But, sir, I hold that this proposition is not of that character at all. It is the exclusive function of those who frame the organic law to engraft on it a policy as fundamental as this, provided they deem it to be salutary. We put in our Constitution, all States put in their Constitutions, some rules in regard to public education. Here is a rule which I believe to be of the best, and as fundamental as any. If there be a proper place for it anywhere, that place is in the fundamental law, leaving to the Legislature, as my proposition does, the duty of carrying it out in detail. If the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] should be voted down, I will then offer this, and also ask the Convention to indulge me in some further remarks in its support.

Mr. RUMSEY—I have no care about the form which my proposition assumes; but the difficulty with that proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] is, that it requires the education of these children at a particular place, at a school. That should not be. If the parent is willing to educate them at home, he should have the liberty to do so; and I will accept any proposition that the gentleman may offer, that shall require the Legislature to pass a law requiring all the children within this State to be taught to read and write; that will satisfy me; and let them be taught wherever the parents choose to have them taught.

Mr. OPDYKE—I have used the term "a public or private school." I suppose any sort of private education would be called a private school.

Mr. RUMSEY—Very well, I will accept that amendment, then.

Mr. CURTIS—Do I understand the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] as accepting the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] to offer this as a substitute for the section?

Mr. RUMSEY—No, sir; I propose to keep the first part of the section, that instruction in the schools shall be free of charge, and the balance of it he proposes.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands this to be a new section proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke].

Mr. OPDYKE—I propose to blend it with the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] leaving the first clause of his proposition.

Mr. RUMSEY—That instruction in the schools of the State shall be free, and then the balance of it as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke].

Mr. CURTIS—The point involved is so important, Mr. President, that it seems to me it should receive, for a few moments, at least, the very thoughtful attention of the Convention. The principle in the amendment is what is known in the science of education as "obligatory education." It is a principle which is well recognized by the chief governments of Europe, and by all the keenest thinkers on the subject at this moment. I will cite, for instance, John Stuart Mill, who, of all the distinguished English publicists is, probably, the one who asserts the small function of government as strongly as any man who insists that government should interfere in the individual action as little as may be; and yet Mr. Mill, after the greatest consideration, does not hesitate to say, with his characteristic caution, that it is a just exercise of the power of government to furnish opportunity to every parent in the State to have his children educated, and then to require that those children shall receive an elementary education. Nor is it a new principle, sir. Certainly four centuries ago, in Scotland, it was recognized. It was again recognized in France a century later. The French Convention, at the close of the last century asserted the same principle. In Sweden, in Norway, and in Denmark at this moment, it is required that every child shall go to school, under penalty of not receiving confirmation from the minister, and a further penalty of a fine imposed on the parent or guardian. And in Germany, to which my friend from New York [Mr. Opdyke] has referred, this system has received its fullest development. I will mention, for the information of the Convention, that in the old duchy of Wurtemburg, there is now supposed to be no person who cannot read or write. In the duchy of Baden, which at the beginning of this century was one of the most backward states in Europe, for the last thirty-four years, there has been a system of obligatory education, which has diminished crime and increased the general welfare of the duchy of Baden in that degree that the current of emigration from that part of Germany to this country has been stopped; and of the enormous increase of prosperity in that State, the director of commerce, certainly a most competent judge, declares that the chief cause is the system of obligatory education. As my friend from New York [Mr. Opdyke] observes, it is Prussia which is the great model of this system. Now, Mr. President, in Prussia this system dates from Frederick the Great in 1763. The law of 1812 and 1819 inflicted very severe penalties upon the parents or guardians who did not conform, and the result was in the twelve following years, a decrease in the ratio of crime of forty per cent. So far is the system carried there, so perfect is it, that there is a word in the German language to express the time when a child is due at school, as we say of a note of hand that it has fallen due. In 1864, of three million of children of the legal school age in the kingdom of Prussia, there were only one hundred and thirty thousand absent, and those one hundred and thirty thousand were those who were educated at private schools or educated at home, and included also the physically and mentally disabled. Still further, in illustration of the operation of this system as a phenomenon of the science of education: in the Prussian army, of every hundred recruits, there is an average of three only who can neither read nor write, and the drill inspector at Potsdam having found in twelve years, among the recruits who came under his observation, only three who could not read and write well, was led to inquire into the circumstances, and found that these three were born upon boats, and, plying up and down the river all their lives, had never stopped long enough to go to school. My friend and colleague from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] implies that all the development which America expects of a citizen does not necessarily flow from the education which is given in Prussia. But the most competent observer that America has ever sent to Europe for these subjects—Horace Mann—who may be called, in this sense, I think, the father of public school education in this country, and who seemed to see every subject connected with public schools with every pore of his body—Horace Mann, who made a thorough investigation of the Prussian system, of which he gives the most graphic and picturesque account, does not hesitate to say that in his judgment the reason that it does not make good citizens is not that there is any fault in the system, but that there is a fault in the state of society, and it was his judgment, also, that the state of society would in twenty years undergo a change, under the influence of such a system. And surely the changes that have taken place in Prussia since that period are some vindication of the justice of his prophecy. Prussia has within the last twenty years ascended to the highest place among European continental powers, and although a military monarchy, the military budget of Prussia is to-day, in proportion, the cheapest in the world, and the position that Prussia has acquired, she owes, undoubtedly, no less to her system of obligatory education than to her needle gun. In this country the subject was first brought to public attention by Mr. Mann, some twenty years ago, in Massachusetts. He asked the pertinent question, which Lord Denman has since asked in Parliament, whether the State is not morally obliged to protect itself from the necessary danger and degredation consequent upon ignorance, by obligatory instruction. Well, sir, the experiment was tried in Massachusetts. From 1856 to 1866 the average arrests under the law that was passed for this purpose were about one hundred and forty, or one hundred and fifty; no more — showing that the sentiment of the State did not respond and was not yet prepared to adopt this measure. I am told, and I hoped to have authentic information before this matter was reached, but failed to receive it—I am told that there is such a law in the State of Rhode Island. But if there be, my knowledge of that State leads me to doubt if it be enforced. There is, also, at this moment, pending in the Legislature of Missouri, a proposition for obligatory education. But with my own feeling I am sure that our disposition of this question will naturally be that of the Netherlands, a country with which we have a certain intimate political similarity and relation. As long ago as 1600, in the midst of the terrible conflict of the Netherlands with Philip Second of Spain, there was not a single man, woman or child in the Netherlands, according to Mr Motley, who was not able to read, write and cipher. In 184 0in the great city of Haarlem, in the Netherlands, there was not a single child found who had not the same accomplishments. In 1856 Matthew Arnold, the most competent observer that could be sent into that country or into any other country for the purpose, declares that their schools are unmatched upon the continent. But, as I am stating this matter merely as a scientific fact in education, as I am taking no part, so far as the immediate question of the amendment is concerned, but with the views that I at present have, shall vote against it; I add that when the great question was raised in the Netherlands, some two or three years ago, whether the system should be introduced; after every argument drawn from the experience of Prussia had been exhausted, the chambers decided that their old system, the free but not obligatory system, was more compatible with the genius of their institutions, and had produced results of which they were proud enough, and which assured them of the future. In this State, although in parts of it, and especially in the city of New York, the accommodation of the children who are of a proper school age, is so deplorable, that the city superintendent has more than once urged measures looking to obligatory attendance in some manner, I will state as a mere illustration the relative condition of the city of New York with the Kingdom of Prussia that while of the three million of common school age in Prussia one hundred and thirty thousand were not at school, in the city of New York, where there are probably two hundred and fifty thousand children of the proper school age, I observe by the address of my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. Larremore] lately made to the board of education that the average attendance at school out of these two hundred and fifty thousand is only about ninety-six thousand. While this, on the one hand, shows the necessity of doing something, if something can fairly be done in such a population as that in the city of New York; on the other hand, he will bear me out in saying that there are very many of those schools over-crowded. It is the constant complaint with the superintendent and his assistant, and the superintendent of public instruction for the State at large is perfectly aware of the fact and mentions it in his report. Now, then, if the State of New York does not provide, has not provided with the immense school taxation which we think to be all that the State at present cares to endure, has not and does not yet provide sufficient accommodation for the scholars which it has, and in many of the schools in the various parts of the State has not provided the proper school equipage, it is premature in the present state of opinion to put into the fundamental law a requirement that every child in the State shall be educated. This provision of the committee, sir, requires that all the common schools that are now maintained shall be free, that is to say, that the instruction given in them shall be without charge, and it is, I am very sure, in the present state of public sentiment, for moral influence and evident political interest to do the rest of the work which is to be done.

Mr. BERGEN—I have not risen to enter into this discussion, but to set the gentleman right upon one point. I think the gentleman asserted that the whole population of Holland had been educated since about the year 1600.

Mr. CURTIS—No, sir, my assertion was, that Mr. Motley, said every child could read, write, and cipher. I did not mention the numbers.

Mr. BERGEN—It was the year I was speaking of. I will state to the Convention that if the gentleman will take the trouble to examine the records in the City Hall, he will find there are many who have hailed from Holland that have been making their mark.

Mr. CURTIS—That is probably why they came away from Holland. [Laughter]

Mr. BERGEN—I have had occasion to make the examination myself; and I find that many of them have made their mark. They were not so highly educated as Mr. Motley undertakes to assert. I am aware that the Hollanders endeavor to educate all their people; but they have failed the same as we have failed. There are many of them whom I have known to make their mark.

Mr. LARREMORE—The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] made an allusion to the average attendance of the schools of the city of New York, and I rise to make a correction in regard to it. The average attendance is about 90,000, and the whole number taught is about 200,000. The average attendance is computed in accordance with the rules prescribed by the board of education and is based on the daily sessions, taking two for each day, on the number of scholars who attend each of these sessions; I desire also to state in reference to the crowded condition of the schools of the city to which the gentleman referred that that is confined almost exclusively to the primary departments for younger children. And I would state for the information of the gentleman that we are building schoolhouses as fast as we can at the present rates of building, and we hope soon to take them all in.

The PRESIDENT—The motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] not being germane to that of the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto] the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tompkins.

Mr. BARTO—I would like to have the gentleman from Steuben explain in what respect my motion is unfair, and does not express fairly the intention. He says it does not, I would like to have him explain.

Mr. RUMSEY—It does not express it fairly, because it is an appeal to the popular prejudice against the provision.

Mr. BARTO—Then you wish to cover the thing up?

Mr. RUMSEY—I wish to put it precisely in the shape where we intend to put it, to establish free schools to be paid for by the whole State.

Mr. BARTO—By taxation?

Mr. RUMSEY—Yes, sir.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Barto, and it was declared lost.

Mr. RUMSEY offered the following substitute for the fifth section:

SEC. 5. Instruction in the common and union schools of this State shall be free of charge, and the first Legislature chosen after this Constitution shall have been adopted shall provide by law for the compulsory attendance at a public or private school, for at least three months of each year of every child between the ages of seven and thirteen years whose health will permits its attendance.

Mr. BICKFORD—I hope, before the vote is taken on this proposition, that it will be so amended as not to make it compulsory upon the Legislature. Let them have the power to do it, and let them have the power to repeal it if it does not work well.

Mr. VAN COTT—The Legislature has the power already.

Mr. BICKFORD—Then I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DEVELIN—Mr. President, the latter part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] is exceedingly objectionable. It declares that the Legislature shall make a provision for the education of children in a public or private school. I, sir, have children that are being educated, but they do not go to school at all. My children are taught in my own house. Is the Legislature to interfere and take my children away from me and send them to a public or private school? Instruction by a governess at home is not instruction in a school in the sense of the amendment. The schools of New York city and State are divided into public and private schools. The public schools are maintained by the State; the private schools by individuals, where numerous scholars go, and the proprietors receive a compensation for their labor toward their education. The proposed section reads that the Legislature must provide that these children shall go to one of these two classes of schools. I have no doubt there are other gentlemen in this Convention, certainly there are many in the city of New York, and scattered throughout the State, whose children are educated at home. It would be very objectionable, and would interfere with personal rights, and the personal rights of every father who desires to have his children educated in his own house, to adopt such an amendment as this. This amendment is so broad as to allow the Legislature even to determine the class of schools in which children shall be educated. They may designate the schools where I shall send my children. They may pass a law that no child shall go to a school where the Catholic religion is taught, or that no child shall go to a school where the Jewish religion, or the Episcopalian religion, or any other religion they choose to designate, is taught. It is proper that the Legislature should have the power to pass a law designating what religion shall be taught in the schools, and requiring the children to attend those schools? I am opposed to compulsory laws for education as proposed by this amendment. I am in favor of the State affording every means for the education of its children, holding out every inducement to parents to send their offspring to school, and every inducement to the children to go; but I am opposed to the principle that the Legislature shall have the power to interfere with parental rights; to go into a house and say a child shall go to school whether the parent or the child desires it or not. In the cases cited by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], Prussia, Denmark and Sweden, the condition of the people has not been improved by their education. The very town he speaks of, Baden, as so eminent for its educational establishments, has the largest gambling establishment in the world, and supported, too, by the government. It is well known that Sweden is one of the most immoral countries in the world, and Prussia is not far behind it. The city of Berlin has the reputation of being as immoral a city as there is on the face of the globe, whether in Christian or pagan lands. The education of the people, therefore, does not appear to tend to the elevation of the people in a moral point of view. The cases cited by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], were monarchies or despotisms, without any respect for their pretended Constitutions. The government invades the family and removes the child and sends him to such school as its officers choose, or punishes the parent for his neglect. But it is different in this country. Our people never will submit to the interference of the goevrnment in these matters. You might as well undertake to compel parents to teach their children trades, or to follow a certain profession, or oblige our citizens to go to church every Sunday, because it is supposed that such visits improve the morals of the attendants at church, as to adopt this; but does this, in our country, justify the interference of the Legislature? Certainly not. This amendment violates one of the first and most important principles upon which our government is founded—the right of personal and social liberty.

Mr. HAND—I am in favor of this amendment, for the reasons that have been given, and for other reasons to which I shall allude briefly. If it is for the interest of the people of the State of New York to provide for the education of the children of the State, and expend large sums of money taken from us by taxation to secure that object, and if they have the right to do that, to promote the fundamental interests of society, if they have the right to go into my purse, violating my private right, and take my money for that purpose, they have a right to go further, and insist that the money thus raised shall fully accomplish the purpose intended. If they have the right to tax the people of the State of New York to raise the means for the education of the masses of the people, because it is for the interest of the State of New York, the same reasons justify the amendment proposed. It is because the very administration of the laws of the State depends for its security upon the public virtue and the public intelligence of the citizen; so that our government may have a standing on a sure basis and exist in any degree of safety. In order that republicanism may live, in order that the people may be qualified for self government, it is absolutely essential that the people themselves shall be so educated as to be qualified to be citizens under a free government. This is absolutely essential. When gentlemen say that the people will not submit to this, it is equivalent to saying they will not submit to those restraints and injunctions in legislation which are necessary to the welfare of our people, and to sustain our institutions. The man who is opposed to them is opposed to the necessary legislation to secure the very foundation of a free government, and the welfare and even the continuance of our institutions. I have another reason, one that has not been touched upon here, and which is equally important, according to my judgment, a reason why we should provide for the compulsory education of every child in the State of New York; a reason entirely independent of the welfare of our people, and entirely independent, in one sense, of the perpetuity of republican institutions; and that is the welfare of the child himself and the protection that is due to him, to qualify him for future citizenship. We have thirty thousand drunken fathers in the State of New York who take every penny they can lay their hands on to provide for the gratification of their own evil propensities. Those fathers have households which are full of little ones that are coming up to be citizens of the State of New York. You hold them amenable to the laws as they grow into manhood; you require that they shall understand the laws; you say in your jurisprudence, ignorance is no excuse for a man, that the State prison shall receive him as a victim whether he is ignorant or not of the laws he is unable to read. The State requires these things of its citizens, and is bound by every principle of justice to qualify those children for that citizenship, and for those responsibilities which they place upon them. The future well-being of the child should not be left to the caprice of a drunken father. It is the glory of our government that it extends equal protection to all. It is the glory of our government that manhood in its intelligence and strength shall be protected. Now, manhood in its wisdom and strength comparatively little needs your protection, but the little ones that cannot protect themselves in their ignorance and weakness, appeal to the citizens of this State that they shall be protected, that they may be fitted for those responsibilities that will devolve upon them when they come to the duties of citizenship. For this reason, the principles of justice, no less than the principle of the safety of our government and the perpetuity of our institutions, require that we shall provide for, and enforce the education of all. Can any gentleman feel that because a father neglects his duty to his children, because by the institutions of our country, men are permitted to become drunkards—the government by its license system making the way easy and respectable—in truth, that their children shall grow up in hopeless ignorance, the State itself goes into partnership with the whisky dealer (sharing his profits) in establishing and perpetuating drunkenness—are we to leave the little ones to suffer every privation? Let us compel parents to send their children to school, and the State provide for and compel their education, that the seeds of intelligence and virtue may be implanted in them, and that they may receive the protection which is their right. I do not propose to go into an extended argument on this subject. I rose principally to say that I am in favor of compelling the education of children—of all children in the State. I do not agree with my friend from New York [Mr. Develin], that education by a governess is not a private school. I understand that it is a private school, and that such education comes under that provision. If it does not, this can be so amended as to cover cases of that kind. I have no doubt there are thousands of such cases in the city of New York. But we should make some provision for the education of every child, and compel every parent to provide education for his children; so that those who are lost to every principle of humanity, and to every parental affection, so sunken in vice, as to neglect this duty, shall be compelled to give that protection and to secure those qualifications for citizenship which education alone can secure.

Mr. FOLGER—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried. So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. KINNEY—I ask to have a division of the question, if it is proper under the previous question. I desire that part shall be voted upon first which provides that instruction in the schools of the State shall be free of charge.

The question being put on this branch of the amendment of Mr. Rumsey, it was declared adopted.

The question being put on the remaining proposition it was declared lost.

Mr. ALVORD—Is it now in order to move to strike out this section?

The PRESIDENT—It is.

Mr. ALVORD—I trust without making any remarks, that it will be stricken out; and I make that motion.

Mr. KINNEY—I would ask if this part of the section is still remaining in the section:

"Under such regulations as the Legislature may provide."

The PRESIDENT—It is not.

Mr. KINNEY—Then I move to insert them.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I ask to have the section read as it stands.

Digitized by Google

The SECRETARY read the section as follows:

"Instruction in the common and union schools of this State shall be free of charge."

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I move as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Tioga [Mr. Kinney], to insert after the word "charge" "and shall be provided for all the children of the State."

Mr. DEVELIN—I rise to a point of order. Whether that is not substantially the same amendment voted down a moment ago about compulsory education?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KINNEY—I accept that amendment.

Mr. DEVELIN—The gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] I understand to offer such an amendment with the idea that it would produce compulsory education.

Mr. BERGEN—I hope that neither the amendment now pending or any other amendment will be adopted, but that the section may be stricken out. It appears to me that we are endeavoring to place in the Constitution an article which may tend to destroy it. It is known that a large class of our adult population decline, for reasons of their own, to send their children to public schools, yet we propose in this Constitution to tax that class of individuals to support the public schools, while they at the same time, at their own expense, support their private schools. Is it wise to place this matter in the Constitution? Can we expect to secure the support of that class of citizens to this Constitution if we place such a provision as that in it? Had we not better leave it to the Legislature where it has been left heretofore? Let them act on the matter; they can change it from time to time as the public interest may require. It reminds me of the condition of Ireland, in relation to the matter of church and State. The complaint there, is that the Catholics are compelled to support the established church, and at the same time support their own church. This is a similar case. We compel men here, if we place this article in the Constitution, to support the State schools, to which they will not, in consequence of religious views, send their children any more than they will go to the State church, and at the same time support their own schools. It appears to me to be unwise, impolitic, committing suicide we may say. If gentlemen desire to destroy the Constitution they can do it in this way. On the other hand I desire a Constitution which the people will support, and to obtain that support I consider it unwise to put any thing in the Constitution which will be objected to by a large class. It is for these reasons that I hope every amendment will be voted down, and that the section will be stricken out, as proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Kinney, as modified at the suggestion of Mr. C. C. Dwight, and it was declared lost.

Mr. ALVORD—I now move to strike out the section.

Mr. RUMSEY—I rise to a question of order. The Convention have this moment inserted that provision by an express vote; and the only way in which it can be got out is by a reconsideration of that vote; and the motion to strike out is not in order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands the entire section to embrace different and independent propositions; and that it is in order to move to strike it out.

Mr. ALVORD—It is the right and privilege of any parliamentary body to perfect any work before them, and after that they may strike it all out. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe with the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott]. I am in favor, individually, of the schools of this State being free. I have no doubt but that the education of the people of this State should be based upon taxation to the extent that may be necessary for that purpose; leaving it to those who are in the community who have the means and who desire to patronize other than the common schools of the State to do so; but that the whole property of the State should bear the burden of taxation for the purpose of the education of the children of the people of the State. But we have in the past left this matter out of the Constitution. The first section of the article which is now before you goes to the full length of all the necessities that have come upon us since the time of the passage of the Constitution of 1846. It constitutionalizes certain funds; it authorizes the Legislature to receive certain other funds by way of donation or endowment, to institutions, and to take care of them in the public treasury. It has gone far enough in that regard; we may safely commit to the charge of the Legislature of this State the providing, from time to time, as the necessity shall arise, for the further interests of education. We may leave that entirely in the hands of the Legislature. They have moved thus far with the people in this matter, and they have recently made a very great reform. They last year passed the act by means of which all common school education of this State is free. Let that system settle down upon the people, and let them conclude, as I have do doubt they will, that the enactment of the Legislature shall be in truth and in fact a fundamental law of the State not to be altered. But I fear that if you undertake to crystalize it in the Constitution, you will find men getting the idea that my friend from Kings [Mr. Bergen] has, who says that here is an immutable and fixed law, which will operate injuriously if placed in the Constitution; and they will, for that reason, and for that reason only, vote against the Constitution, whereas, when the people shall speak through the Legislature from time to time, as they come up to Albany to make laws, they will get that reflex from the influence of the people that will enable the law which makes these schools free, to make them free indeed for all time to come. I trust, therefore, that gentleman in their views of this case will come to the conclusion that we have gone far enough in the direction of education, we have gone to the full extent and even beyond that of the Constitution of 1846, and will leave this matter where it may safely be left, in the hands of the Legislature, who, I venture to predict, will never dare to repeal the law by which the schools of this State are free.

Mr. BARTO moved the previous question.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Barto, it was declared carried.

Digitized by Google

The question then recurred on striking out the fifth section, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 48 ayes, noes not counted.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I now renew the amendment that I proposed in Committee of the Whole to the second section in reference to the educational fund after the word "State" in line three to insert "or of any of the cities thereof." I will take occasion to say again, as some gentleman may be present who were not when I addressed the committee, that this constitutional restriction that these investments shall be made exclusively in certain prescribed funds, may be found a very inconvenient one. I will remind gentlemen that under the operation of our State sinking funds, if the means are realized to any thing like the sanguine expectations of the gentleman from Erie, and others with reference to the canals, the stocks of the State of New York will before long be very difficult to procure; and they may be at a premium of ten or fifteen per cent; which would so much lessen the revenue of the school fund. I desire that the Convention, while taking care to secure the funds safely, should at the same time secure as large an interest as possible. We all know as to the stocks of the United States how their values fluctuate; that they have been worth within a few years at one time thirty-five cents in gold, and at another time have been sold at par, and furthermore we have not control over them to any thing like the degree we have over our city stocks. I have always held, in my classification of stocks, city stocks first, State stocks next, and United States stocks next, and the nearer home you come in this matter of stocks, the better is the security because our home stocks are more under the control of our local laws. The stocks of the city of New York their amount, value, etc, were mentioned the other day. Why, sir, could there be any better security than they present? Not that the city of New York will require any such assistance to her credit as this. She has only forty millions of dollars of indebtedness. She has fourteen or fifteen millions of her own bonds in her treasury, very injudiciously, as I think, for in my opinion they should be canceled; and she has her great revenue from the Croton water-works, a revenue which is supposed to be capable of being increased one millions dollars a year without extortion. As it is, the revenues of that work more than pay for the whole investment that was made in it. I suppose representatives of the city of Albany can cite similar circumstances creditable to that city, and indicating the value of her stocks. And I now leave the question with the numerous representatives of cities on this floor to take care of the interests of those cities in this section and to sustain the amendment.

Mr. KINNEY—I move to reconsider the vote by which the fifth section was stricken out, and also the first paragraph of the fourth section.

Mr. DEVELIN—That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion lies on the table, under the rule.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—I propose to add to the amendment of the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] another, which I think is germane to it, and that is to restore the words which were stricken out in Committee of the Whole. After "United States," in the third line, add "or loaned to counties and towns for county and town purposes exclusively."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hitchcock, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. S. Townsend.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move, as an amendment, to insert the word "bonds" after the words "United States." I believe the United States has no stocks.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I accept the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] will prevail. It seems to me that the discretion for the investment of this fund is altogether too narrow, being confined to the stocks of the State and of the United States. Every one knows that our municipal bonds are the best security in the world, and they generally bear a higher interest than these more public stocks. I think the amendment is peculiarly proper, in view of the fluctuating value of some of our public stocks and in view of the possible danger that the fluctuations may be much greater in the future than they now are.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. S. Townsend, and, on a division, it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out the section entirely. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee from what was derived the idea of the necessity of it? I find that the Constitution of 1846 has no such provision; and it must be known to many gentlemen who are practically familiar with the finances of the State, that the Comptroller is in the habit of borrowing from the school fund for the purposes of the general fund or some other fund, and that this is almost a yearly practice in the Comptroller's office. Now, this section, if adopted and passed into a constitutional provision, will prevent that facility of carrying on the financial operations of the government by borrowing from one fund to supply the deficiencies of another; and if there is no pressing necessity for such a restriction, I think the section had better be left out.

Mr. CURTIS—It was simply intended to provide for the greater security of these funds. As was stated at the time, in the committee, there is a constant loss of the school moneys of the State, arising from this system of mortgages to individuals, and it was therefore desired that this fund should be made and kept good, and to that end, as fast as these mortgages should expire, these funds should be invested in those securities. This section was drawn by the committee after consultation with the Comptroller of the State, and with the late Comptroller, Mr. Church.

Mr. FOLGER—Has there ever been a loss from the fund after the money has got into the treasury?

Mr. CURTIS—Not after it has come absolutely within the power of the State.

Mr. FOLGER—Well, this provides only that the funds, after they come into the treasury shall be invested. Why the necessity, if none has ever been lost?

Digitized by Google

Mr. CURTIS—There seems to be a great deal of uncertainty as to what is being in the treasury.

Mr. MERRITT—I call for the reading of the section, as amended.

The SECRETARY read the section as amended, as follows: "All the State educational funds, as they are paid into the treasury, shall be invested by the Comptroller in the stocks of the State of New York, or of any of the cities thereof, or in the bonds of the United States.

Mr. ALVORD—I believe that the Chair has just decided that the amendment to insert the words, "or the cities thereof" has been lost. It is evident, sir, that the intention of the committee in this matter was that similar losses to those which had been sustained heretofore in the United States deposit fund, should be provided against in the future. I started the idea that when this money got back into the hands of the loan commissioners it would be in the treasury of the State. I was told no, and I have since examined into that matter and I find that there was an absolute appropriation of this money to the different counties of the State for the purpose of being loaned out by the loan commissioners; therefore it has got to be by law restored back before it can come within the strict meaning of being in the treasury, although in the hands of the loan commissioners. Inasmuch as they have left that exactly as it was before, I see a great deal of force in the proposition of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], that there is no necessity whatever for this section. Now, I know that this transfer of moneys from one fund to another happens very often in the Comptroller's office. Here are a hundred or two hundred thousand, or perhaps a million of dollars, belonging to different funds. One fund has stocks based upon it due on a day certain. There is a payment to be made from that fund, it is short of money, but on a day not very remote there will be a payment into that fund; so the Comptroller makes a transfer from one fund to the other. The fund to which the transfer is made pays interest, and the fund from which it is made receives interest. This practice avoids the difficulty of the State going outside to borrow money; but if you put the matter under the operation of this section, the result will be that the Comptroller will have no right thus to borrow from one fund for the purpose of tiding over a few days. I trust, therefore, that as the idea of the committee and of the Comptroller, who must have advised them without much reflection, was to protect the funds from depletion, and as that object would not be effected in this way, the gentleman will consent that the section be stricken out.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—It seems to me that the section is evidently proper. In the last report of the Comptroller there is shown to be over a million of dollars lying idle, and it seems to me that that money should be invested on interest.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger to strike out the section, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT—I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the latter portion of the fourth section was stricken out.

Mr. DEVELIN—I object.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move that we adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the article as amended, which was declared adopted, and referred to the Select Committee on Revision.

Mr. WALES—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Wales, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. J. C. WELLS.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY, and was approved.

Mr. VAN COTT presented three memorials from the physicians and surgeons in the city of New York against the abolition of the metropolitan board of health.

Which were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Also, a memorial from various life insurance companies in the city of New York upon the same subject.

Which took a like reference.

Mr. CURTIS presented a remonstrance from all the fire companies of the city of New York, with the exception of four, against the abolition of the fire commissioners in that city.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COLAHAN presented a memorial from forty physicians in Chautauqua county, asking the Convention to provide for a uniform system of licensure and pharmaceutical regulations.

Which was laid on the table at the request of the mover.

Also, a memorial from forty-five medical practitioners of Allegany county, in reference to the same subject.

Which took the same course.

And also a memorial from thirty medical practitioners in the county of Orange on the same subject.

Which took the same course.

Mr. HAND presented a petition of thirty-two physicians of Broome county, asking for the establishment of a medical board.

Which took the same course.

Mr. BERGEN—I ask leave to submit a minority report from the Committee on the relations of the State to the Indian tribes resident therein.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the report as follows:

1. They object to the Legislature being authorized "to provide for an equitable subdivision of a necessary and sufficient portion of the several Indian reservations" for their use and occupation in severalty, as provided in the second section of said report, without their consent being first obtained.

2. Believing that the white or Caucasian races are alone capable of self-government, and that they alone have shown the ability to sustain a republican form of government and arriving at a high degree of perfection, as a principle, they object to conferring the rights of suffrage to any of the colored races, as provided in the third section of the report. They admit that the Indians, the original owners of the soil, have a better claim to these rights than any other of the colored races, but conclude that if the door is opened for them it may lead to the opening of it to the African, Mongolian and other colored races.

3. Private property, or the lands of individuals in this State, never having been allowed to be taken for manufacturing and other private purposes without the consent of the owners, as provided in the fourth article of the majority report, we cannot consent to the lands or property of the Indians being taken for these purposes without their consent.

Dated January 21, 1868.

TEUNIS G. BERGEN.
SOL. TOWNSEND.

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDONALD—As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I declined to sign either report submitted, for the simple reason that, according to the best information I can get, this State has no jurisdiction whatever of the Indians at all. The United States have decided that they have the entire jurisdiction over them, and, if that be so, I suppose the State should have nothing to do with them.

Mr. COLAHAN—I offer the following resolution, and ask that it lie on the table:

Resolved, That there be a special committee of three appointed to consider and report to this Convention a system of licensure of medical practitioners and the establishment of proper pharmaceutical regulations in this State.

Which was laid on the table at the request of the mover.

Mr. FOLGER—I ask that the report of the Committee on Cities be considered in Convention, and that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of it.

Mr. VERPLANCK—What is the object of the request?

Mr. FOLGER—Simply to save the time of the Convention.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] cannot be entertained.

The Convention then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the report of the Committee on Cities, being document No. 112.

The reading of the report being concluded, the SECRETARY read the first section as follows:

SEC. 1. The chief executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor who shall be elected by the electors of the city and shall hold his office for three years. He shall take care that the laws and city ordinances are faithfully executed. He shall receive, at stated times, for his services a compensation to be established by law, and which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall be elected. He shall not receive during that period, any other emolument from the city. He shall hold no other office and shall be ineligible for the next three years after the expiration of his term.

Mr. MORRIS—I move to strike out all after the word "office" in the ninth line. I am opposed to placing this restriction upon the re-election of the mayor of a city.

Mr. HARRIS—No more important question has claimed the attention of this Convention than the report now under consideration. Of the four millions of people in this State, a million and a half reside in cities. Every census shows that this portion of our population is increasing more rapidly than that of other portions of the State. In 1830 the population of New York was only ten in every hundred of the population of the State. In 1860 it was twenty-one in every hundred. The day is not distant when one-half of the people of our State will be found in its cities. The question of good government in cities is one, therefore, which deeply concerns us all. It demands the serious reflection and the resolute action of the members of this Convention. While a great diversity of opinion exists as to what shall be done, all agree in one thing; that municipal governments in this State are exceedingly imperfect and inefficient. It has been said, and perhaps with truth, that "in proportion as cities increase in population, their governments become corrupt—their officers inferior—the administration of laws and ordinances lax and defective, and a general tendency toward weakness and demoralization is exhibited." This admitted degeneracy has undoubtedly reached a lower depth in New York than anywhere else. This condition of things must be changed. This degenerating tendency must be arrested. Municipal affairs must be placed in the hands of better men—men of greater ability—more public spirit—more private virtue and moral worth. The government of the city of New York, especially, should be placed in the hands of men eminent for business talent and integrity — the first men in their several spheres. "There is no city of equal size on the earth," says a popular review, "which contains so great a mass of public spirit and administrative capacity, and we feel persuaded that the time is near at hand when those great qualities will be successfully exerted in rescuing the metropolis from the hands of the spoilers who have stolen into possession of it." There is no reason why the common council of New York should not be equal to the best legislative body in the world. The city abounds with men fitted for such a service, and, upon just conditions, they can be won to its performance. "Think what the government of such a city might be and do," says the same writer, "what noble institutions it might found, what grand experiments undertake, what beautiful edifices construct, what merit employ and reward." When the Constitution of 1846 was framed, the entire territory of the State was separated into counties, towns, cities and villages. These were the only civil divisions then known. They had been coeval with the government itself. The State had never existed for a moment without them. All our thoughts and notions of civil government are inseparably associated with these divisions. They are permanent elements in the frame of government. They are so treated in the Constitution itself. Indeed, the State is but an aggregate of counties, towns, cities and villages. To these civil divisions, the present Constitution, (article 10, section 2), assures the right of self-government. To counties, towns, cities and villages it guarantees the right of choosing their own local officers and conducting their own local administration. It was supposed that the Legislature could not, by changing the name, or by uniting several counties together, and calling them a district, take away this substantial right. And yet this has been done. Indeed, it was the primary object of the metropolitan police act. That act deprived the electors and local authorities of New York and Brooklyn of the power to appoint or elect the officers and members of the police force, and gave it, with all its patronage, to the central government of the State. The expenses were chargeable upon the taxable property of New York and Brooklyn, in proportion to the police force required for each city. In short, the officers were local; their duties were local; their support was a local charge; but the power of their appointment and removal was not local. The patronage was assumed by the central government of the State. The metropolitan police act became a law on the 15th of April, 1857. It was the beginning of an attempt to transfer the control of the city government of New York to the State Legislature. The expedient, justified, it was thought, by the urgent necessity of the case, has proved a failure and must be abandoned. It is false in principle, ruinous in policy, and cannot be upheld. It may not be abandoned now. I am not sure that this Convention is prepared for the change. When or how it will be abandoned I do not know, but that it will be abandoned I am very sure. Even if the change effected by this act were desirable and useful, it was a severe blow at the inherent love for home government, for local administration, which has always been a characteristic of our people. A police officer under our system is a local officer, a city, county, town, or village officer. He never was any thing else. His functions are local, not general. The preservation of the peace, the maintenance of order, the arrest and punishment of offenders, are offices purely local, not general, and have never been confided to officers other than local. A State police, with its chief at the seat of government, and its agents and ministers distributed over the State, is a thing unknown and alien to our system. It will never be tolerated. The principle of the metropolitan police act is in conflict with the principles of the Constitution. It takes from the local communities embraced within the district created by it, rights and privileges which the Constitution intended to secure to them. It substitutes the power of the Legislature for that of the electors. Those communities are excluded from the exercise of rights and privileges which had always before been exercised by them, and which had never before been questioned. There is nothing in the debates of the Convention nor in the Constitution itself which indicates the slightest intention to leave the Legislature in possession of such a power. It was a leading purpose of the Convention of 1846—manifest throughout all its work—to decentralize the powers of government, and to distribute the powers which had been wielded at Albany among the local communities of the State. The constitutionality of the metropolitan police act was sustained solely upon the ground that it created a civil division territorially greater than those mentioned in the Constitution. It was conceded that the Constitution vested in these smaller divisions the exclusive right to elect or appoint their own local officers. The eminent judge who pronounced the judgment of the court says: "If the provisions of the statute had been limited, territorially, to the city of New York, it would be in conflict with the section of the Constitution so often referred to." I am not disposed to question the soundness of this decision, but I may be allowed to say that the distinction upon which it is supported has always seemed to me to rest more in names and forms than in the essence and substance of things. It is worthy of remark that three of the eight judges who constituted the court are members of this Convention. Two of these—Judge Paige and Judge Bowen—have concurred in the report under consideration; the other—Judge Comstock—did not concur in the judgment of the court of appeals. The present condition of things in New York, resulting from the intermeddling of the Legislature during the last ten years, is truthfully described in the article from which I have already quoted. Says this writer:

"The interference of the Legislature has, at length, reduced the city government to a condition of political chaos. The mayor has been deprived of all controlling power. The board of aldermen, seventeen in number, the board of twenty-four councilmen, the twelve supervisors, the twenty-one members of the board of education, are so many independent legislative bodies, elected by the people. The police are governed by four commissioners, appointed by the Governor for eight years. The charitable and reformatory institutions of the city are in charge of four commissioners whom the city comptroller appoints for five years. The commissioners of the Central Park, eight in number, are appointed by the Governor for five years. Four commissioners, appointed by the Governor for eight years, manage the fire department. There are also five commissioners of pilots, two appointed by the board of underwriters, and three by the Chamber of Commerce. The finances of the city are in charge of the comptroller, whom the people elect for four years. The street department has at its head one commissioner, who is appointed by the mayor for four years. Three commissioners, appointed by the mayor manage the Croton aqueduct department. The law officer of the city, called the corporation counsel, is elected by the people for three years. Six commissioners, appointed by the Governor for six years, attend to the emigration from foreign countries. To these has been recently added a board of health, the members of which are appointed by the Governor. Was there ever such a hodge-podge of a government before in the world? And nowhere is there any adequate provision for holding these several powers to their responsibility; consequently, although the system of plunder has now been in operation for sixteen years, during which the public thieves have stolen not less than fifty millions of dollars, not one man of them has ever been punished, nor even been made to disgorge."

Nothing can justify the State government in thus intermeddling with the local concerns of the city of New York but the fact that the people of that city are wholly incapable of self-government. There are men, perhaps many men, who honestly believe that this is so. This belief has been encouraged by artful men desirous of securing the patronage of the city government. The topic has been dwelt upon, year after year, until it has been exaggerated out of all due proportion. In this way laws have, from time to time, been passed tending more and more to the complete disfranchisement of the city. Taxation has increased during these ten years of State interference to an incredible extent—from eight millions to twenty millions and upward. This enormous amount is no doubt to some extent attributable to the unparalleled growth of the city. Increased expenditures, corresponding with the rapid increase in population, wealth and business, might reasonably be expected. But this great increase cannot be accounted for by referring it to this cause alone. Of the entire amount raised for the annual support of the city of New York, more than three-fourths—seven dollars out of eight, it has been asserted—are disbursed by those who hold their appointments under State authority, and who are in no way responsible to the people of the city, if indeed they are responsible to any body, for the amount or the manner of their expenditure. Certainly the amount expended under the control of the city authorities is comparatively small. Taxation without representation, seems now to be the rule. The tendency of the legislation affecting the city of New York for the last ten years has been to check and chill that healthy public activity without which neither fidelity nor energy can be expected in the administration of public affairs. The people of that city have been put in a state of isolation and irresponsibility as to their own municipal government. The city is governed more like a province than as an integral part of the State. The great majority of the people feel that their right of self-government has been invaded, that they are deprived of privileges which, from the earliest civilization, have been allowed to the inhabitants of cities—privileges which have not been withheld even in the most despotic governments of continental Europe. They complain that in this age, characterized by the unlimited extension of popular suffrage, our great American city, the metropolis of the western continent, has been made the first example known in a free country of the denial of the right of managing its own affairs. The opposition to this state of things is becoming more and more demonstrative. Who can wonder at the irritation and discontent which it has produced? The only corrective of these evils will be found in the restoration to the citizens of New York of the right to select their own public agents and to regulate the disbursement of their own money in their own way. No effort to reform city governments through the agency of the State Legislature can be successful. No reformation can be effected by taking out of the hands of the people all control over the acts of their own public officials. Such legislation must certainly be pronounced shortsighted and impolitic. It is sure to aggravate the very evils it is intended to cure. It is in direct violation of the fundamental principles of our American system of government. It is in direct conflict with the instincts and sentiments of the American people. Every government is made up of local communities—towns, villages, counties, cities. It is the right of all such communities, whether they are scattered like rural communities, or compact like mercantile and manufacturing communities, to manage and control their own local affairs in their own way. None will deny, I think, that this is a cardinal principle of free government. No people can be truly free, whatever the name or external form of their government, whose institutions are such that their welfare is made to depend, not upon themselves, but upon the fidelity and capacity of a select number of individuals exercising authority over them. To the extent that the central government interferes in the management and control of local affairs—to that extent it is a despotism. It may or may not be oppressive; whether it be or not will depend chiefly upon the personal temper and disposition of those who hold the reins of power. But however this may be, it is not a free government. However artfully it may be disguised, it is a despotism. What better illustration of the exercise of despotic power can be found than is presented in the act of the Legislature of 1867, which compels the tax payers of the city of New York to raise $199,500 for the benefit of some twenty-three or twenty-four benevolent and charitable institutions. It has been well said in the report of the minority of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, that "were the Legislature thus to interfere with the people of the rural districts, and their property, and compel them to raise money for such charitable objects as it might deem worthy of relief, there would be a cry of indignation from one end of the State to the other; but so long as the power is exercised only over the citizens of New York, it does not seem to excite any special interest on the part of the people of other portions of the State." A freeman—and, thank God, we have none else but freemen in this country now—cannot allow his affairs to be managed by others without his consent. He feels that by virtue of his being a free man he is invested with the right and charged with the responsibility of doing whatever his own individual welfare demands—that he cannot be divested of this right and responsibility without surrendering his title of a freeman, and least of all, can he, as a freeman, consent to have his affairs managed by those who are set over him by an assumed independent authority. The same is true of every local community—as a county, town, city or village—such a community, in reference to every thing in which its people have a common interest, has a right to manage its own affairs in its own way. No other man, no other body of men, has the right to interfere. It cannot be free, nor can it maintain free institutions if it is compelled to allow its own local affairs to be managed, however well it may be done, by others set over it for that purpose. The very simplest idea of freedom involves the ever present consciousness that we have the right to manage our own affairs in our own way. By a further ascending step the same principle becomes applicable to larger communities—the State, the nation. The State has the right to manage those affairs which concern its own people—and this, too, without any interference from the national government; while, on the other hand, to the national government belongs the exclusive management of those affairs in which its whole people are concerned. In the application of this simple and fundamental principle will be found the distinguishing difference between a free government and a despotism. If the government allows men to take care of their own affairs, it is a free government; but if men are compelled to allow others to take care of their affairs for them, that government, whatever its name or form, is a despotism. The doctrine of commissions is, that "the State is a distinct and independent existence, a legal entity," a corporation—apart from the members which compose it, and that this thing, called "the State," has the right to prescribe the limits within which the individuals and the local communities which compose it shall exercise the inalienable right of self-government. All will agree that it is the paramount duty of the State to provide good laws and efficient administration in all its territory and for all its people. Having done this, however, every community, city as well as village and town, should be allowed, unmolested and uncontrolled by central authority, to manage its own local affairs in its own way. There is a class of commissions which are unobjectionable. They are those the duties of which do not involve governmental functions, which give the commissioners power to perform some given specific act, and when that is done the power ceases. There is no objection in principle to a law creating a commission to construct a bridge or a road or a public building, or to locate and embellish a park or other public grounds. These are acts which the government necessarily performs, but they do not affect rights or duties, public or private. I agree, too, that that system of government is to be preferred which practically secures to the people the best results of government. But who is to determine this question? I deny that it belongs to the Legislature to determine whether officers appointed by it and acting under its authority, officers chosen by the people, will best secure the ends of local government. It is a part of the accepted political faith of the American mind that our system of government as it now exists, and without any fundamental change, is destined to be perpetual. How sublimely its marvelous strength and its wisdom, and, above all, the boundless devotion of the American people to it, have been exhibited in the fearful struggle through which our nation has just passed!

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he deem that it would have aided in our national struggle the cause of those who wished to perpetuate our institutions, if the mayor of the city of New York had had the power, as he expressed the will, to send forward the arms and ammunition that had been prepared for the State of Georgia to combat the general government in the rebellion?

Mr. HARRIS—My friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] surprises me. He knows me well. He knows my sentiments, and that he should here, in this public debate, put such an interrogatory to me amazes me.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Not more than my friend amazes me in the position he takes here.

Mr. HARRIS—But if this system of government is to be perpetual, if our free institutions are to continue and our national independence is to be made secure, individual independence and self-reliance must characterize the people. Every district and locality throughout the land must be allowed the full and free exercise of local self-government. There must be no intermeddling by central authority. The general management of their local affairs—such as police, public works, taxation, and every class of administrative arrangement upon which the common welfare of a local community depends—must be left entirely in their own hands. Every interference with these rights is, in a corresponding degree, a sacrifice of the independence, self-reliance and efficiency of the people. These truths are logical necessities, and it is a mark of the empirical mode in which political subjects are sometimes handled to find men, who recognize the importance of allowing the people every where to manage their own local affairs for themselves, still gravely arguing for a central control in some particular and special matters. Such men have generally some scheme of their own which they seek to advance; and while they would not deprive the people of the right of managing their own affairs, generally, they find some pretext for making their particular scheme an exception to the general rule. But such a proposition can never be consistently advocated by a disinterested statesman. An individual is sometimes incapable of taking care of his own affairs. We call him an imbecile, and award him our pity. But such a condition of things can never be predicated of a community, large or small, compact or sparse, city or town. Incapacity to manage its own affairs, in such a case, is simply an impossibility. It may not manage them as well or as wisely as we think we could ourselves, but that is a question which belongs to them, and not to us, to decide. The inhabitants of cities, it will be conceded, have the same rights of self-government as those of other parts of the State. It is as much an invasion of those rights to interfere in the government of the city of New York as it would be to interfere in the local affairs of any town in the State. So far as the right of self-government is denied to the city of New York, so far the principles of our republican system of government are repudiated. We declare that while these principles will do for the country, in great cities they are a failure. We practically deny that all citizens are equal before the law, or that the same rights and privileges are to be secured to all. We assert that our American system of government is well enough when confined to the government of the State and the nation, but that in the government of cities, it is "an alarming failure, and a national disgrace." It is not to be denied that in large communities, like the city of New York, where the vicious element so much prevails, and where it exerts a great, if not a controlling influence in local politics, great evils exist in consequence of the lax administration of municipal government. But these evils are not so dangerous as those other mischiefs which must follow when the power of self-government is taken from the hands of the people, and boards are substituted, holding their appointment from the central power, called "the State," and in no way responsible to the people over whom they exercise authority.

"In New York city," says a leading journal, "we have suffered from the vagaries of a small but impudent and active faction of theorists who succeeded, by dint of unparalleled effrontery, in obtaining indorsement of their vagaries at Albany. Denying the democratic theory of government, and distrusting the efficacy of appeals to the people, these philosophic politicians have had one sovereign remedy for all disorders—the Brandreth pills of political economy—certain to cure any disease which affected communities, and that was to create commissions under their control. The consequence is, that instead of laboring in New York to reform and purify popular sentiment and achieve desired results at the ballot-box, they have step by step encroached upon the municipality, destroyed its franchises, and taken away its rights. This idea of central supervision has extended to the most minute details of administration, so that it has come to be a maxim that the people are not to be consulted at all in reference to their own affairs. That the Legislature at Albany will not only appoint their police and protect their health, but will likewise sell their markets and clean their streets, and build their wharves, and do whatever else may be necessary for the control of their property, and the assumed protection of their interests."

The people of the city of New York, as well as other communities, have a right to demand that they be left free to govern themselves. The power of self-government, so far as it has been withdrawn from them, ought to be returned. Those franchises, which by the very nature of their organization, belong to them, should be restored. With such wise safeguards and precautions as shall best secure its proper exercise, the people should be allowed to enjoy the same political power as the people of other portions of the State. The whole system of commissions is in opposition to the democratic theory which lies at the basis of our institutions. That reforms have sometimes been effected by this instrumentality need not be disputed. But such reforms have not been so great or so beneficial as to justify, or even excuse the State government in depriving the people of those prerogatives which, under our theory of government, they justly claim as belonging to them. Against this policy of stripping municipalities of the right to govern themselves, thoughtful men of all parties protest. It has already wrought the most serious mischiefs, and, unless it shall be arrested by this Convention, the principles of republican government, as applicable to large communities, may be greatly endangered. It is not right, and of course it is not wise, to govern a city like New York by boards of officers created and appointed at Albany. The voters of New York have the right to say, with reference to all matters of municipal administration, who shall rule over them; who shall disburse the taxes they pay, and who shall manage their property. If they make mistakes, it is their own business. If they suffer themselves to be misled by bad men, and to be subjected to corrupt combinations, as no doubt they often do, they must bear the consequences. The very fact that they are made to do so will the sooner work a reformation. The article presented by the majority of the committee materially increases the power and responsibility of the mayor. It gives him, in his sphere, substantially the same authority and power as the President of the United States has in his, and holds him to the same direct responsibility. The system has worked well in the government of the United States; there is no reason to doubt that it would work equally well in city governments. The article defines more specifically the powers and duties of the legislative department. The framers of the Constitution of the United States found their safeguard for liberty and a sufficient guaranty against inefficiency and corruption, in the complete separation of the legislative and executive departments. The article under consideration confines the legislative department of cities—as the Constitution does Congress—to its legislative functions alone. The plan for the constitution of the board of aldermen combines the greatest excellencies with the fewest defects. Example and experience have demonstrated the propriety of making the term of office longer than it now is. It should be a stable and permanent body: At the same time the public voice should be frequently heard in the board. The effect of this would be to make the body feel its responsibility, "to reverence its creator." One great excellence of the plan recommended is, that while the board itself is permanent, one-third of its members are chosen every year. In this choice no portion of the electors is excluded; the voice of the whole body is heard through the annual infusion of new members. In this way, the popular sentiment prevailing at the time of each election, while it does not absolutely control the action of the body, is allowed to exert its proper influence. It is a popular sentiment, coming, not from a portion of the electors only, but from the whole constituency. This yearly infusion of new members into such a representative body is one of the soundest and most democrtic features in our system of government. It insures an annual expression of the sentiments of the people in the body. It is to be regretted, I think, that this principle had not been adopted in the constitution of the State Senate. In the single district system which now prevails, and which the Convention have voted to continue, the popular sentiment can only be expressed in alternate years. Another advantage of the plan presented is, that a majority of the board are always men who have become familiar with the duties of their office and the new members annually brought in have the benefit of their experience. Another advantage of immense importance is, that the aldermen elected for so long a term and by the whole body of electors will hold their places by tenures independent, to a great degree, of those influences which are so liable to control the action of the common council as now organized. The article presents a simple, direct, responsible and efficient system of government. It provides for greater concentration of authority and also for greater subordination—more power at the center and more subordination at the extremities. It recognizes the necessity of more official power and energy in the administration of the municipal affairs of great cities. It proposes for the city of New York, what every other portion of the State enjoys, a simple government by the people, a government so arranged that the legislative branch shall transact legislative business and legislative business only, and the chief executive shall transact all the executive business and be endowed with all the power and authority which he needs for that purpose. All experience proves that there is no more fruitful source of corruption and misgovernment than the union of legislative and executive power in the same hands. That is one of the simplest and best ascertained facts in the science of government. To this evil may be traced much of the misrule that has prevailed in New York. That city has had pretty much every kind of government except a simple government of the people. For the greater part of its history its mayor has been appointed by the State authorities. For the last few years it has been ruled chiefly by State commissions; and all this while it has had its board of supervisors and its common council exercising executive as well as legislative powers. Well might the writer from whom I have quoted say that "the interference of the Legislature had at length reduced the city government to a condition of political chaos." There is no reason, I insist, to fear the people—not even the people of the city of New York. They may safely be trusted. Let the city have a simple government after the model of the government of the United States. Let the people elect an executive officer, the mayor, and hold him responsible for the administration of the affairs of the city. Let them elect a city legislature with legislative powers only. Let this be done, and the day of reform, even in New York, will have begun. Under such a system the people can have a good government, if they choose to have it. How desirable this is they have already learned from severe experience. This, in my judgment, is the only cure for the evils which now so imperiously demand a remedy. The only way of safety is to place the responsibility upon the people. If they fail let them feel the evil results of their own folly. Let them see and feel that they can only depend upon their own good conduct, their own vigilance and self-control for good government. I have given this subject the most anxious consideration, and it is my deliberate judgment that this is the only plan which furnishes even the hope of any permanent relief from the evils which now exist. Then, if the citizens of New York, instead of coming to Albany to obtain new commissions, and thus further deprive the city of its power of self-government would direct their energies and time to the selection of the best men to administer their government, the advantages of such a course would soon be revealed. The government of the city would be improved, taxation would be diminished, representation restored to the citizens, a legal and responsible city government, selected by citizens identified with their interests, acquainted with their wants, interested only in the good government and prosperity of the city, would be secured and maintained. I know that the people of New York would have an arduous labor before them. It would task to the uttermost both their wisdom and their patriotism, but it can be accomplished. Men of leisure and public spirit, men of character and ability—and the city abounds with such men—the very best men in the city must unite together for the purpose of reforming the city government. I believe it is yet possible to elect honest and capable men, even in that city. I believe that when the issue shall be presented directly between honesty and capacity on the one hand, and corruption and incapacity on the other, a majority of the voters in New York will be found voting as they ought. No people ever suffered more from the evils of ignorance and untaxed suffrage; from the presence of a large mass of uneducated and unassimilated foreign population. But, on the other hand, no city in the world possesses within itself a greater amount of public spirit and administrative capacity. It only needs that these great qualities should be invoked and successfully exerted, to rescue the government of the city from the hands of the "spoilers who have stolen into it." To accomplish this desirable end the free representative machinery, which is the sheet anchor of our American system, must be allowed to operate in the city of New York, as it does elsewhere — untrammeled by any interference of the State government, and to bring to the surface and secure the aid of the best men of the city, so that the common council shall be a representation of the wealth, the intelligence, and public spirit of her entire people. But this can never be done until the attempt to govern the city at Albany shall be entirely abandoned. The Legislature cannot be trusted with this duty. The reform must be radical. It must begin at the bottom and work its way up. If the city cannot govern itself now it must learn how to do it, and the only way to learn how to do a thing is to do it, or at least try to do it. Commissions are inherently objectionable, as an agency of government. Their tendency is to destroy free institutions. The rights and responsibilities of freemen are undermined and set aside; the institutions of self-government are reduced to mere forms and names, without character, dignity, influence or efficiency. This is the result which is gradually being worked out by this blighting system in New York. From its first inception, those who live by it—as might naturally be expected—have been constantly seeking to stretch and enlarge its powers by statute after statute, the effect of each being to fetter and restrict still more the rights of the citizen, and to narrow still more the scope for the exercise of his right of self-government, and thus to make places for still greater numbers of functionaries at the expense of the people. It is claimed, and perhaps with truth, that under this mode of governing by commissions, men of more character and ability are selected than are usually elected to corresponding offices in city governments. The mode of appointment seems calculated to give dignity to the office, and, as a general rule, to secure, a higher class of men than are to be found in elective offices of a similar grade. It might, with equal truth, be said that the same mode of appointment would secure better men—men of more ability, greater experience, more distinguished for their integrity and virtue—for seats in the municipal, and even in the State and National Legislatures—perhaps I might add, in a Constitutional Convention. The great objection to this whole system is, that it is a direct encroachment upon the fundamental principle of our government—the noblest principle for which a people can contend. It breaks up that direct relation which, according to our American system, should exist between a people and their rulers. It tramples upon the inherent right of the people to choose their own rulers—a right which it is the great purpose of our government to guarantee and protect. Upon this same subject it has been said:

"There is a class of men in New York, not very numerous, but remarkably enterprising and indefatigable, who make these commissions the tender of their schemes, and the instruments of their ambition. Organized in a compact body, welded together by the cohesive power of pecuniary profits, and acting in secret concert—they are able to wield an influence entirely disproportioned to their numbers or their character. Is a street to be opened, there must be a commission; is a market to be sold, give them a commission; if a wharf is to be repaired, it can only be successfully done by a commission. A commission means a board of pampered officials, who are highly salaried for doing comparatively nothing; it means a retinue of over-fed lawyers and well-kept retainers of every sort; it means a secret league to do the public's business, without taking the public's advice—and to pocket the public's money without asking the public's consent. This practice has grown to be a great and grievous evil. It has but exchanged one form of mismanagement for another that is worse, and substituted for a ring that was in some sense amenable to popular discipline, a ring that lives and breathes, and has all the vitality of its being by virtue of a central political authority."

It is provided in the article under consideration that the term of the mayor's office shall be three years, instead of two, as it is under the present system. The duties of municipal officers in large cities require so much knowledge of details and such familiarity with complicated facts and business arrangements, that longer terms of office are desirable than in the case of State and national officers. It is obvious that officers whose business it is to attend to matters of executive and ministerial detail should not be changed as often as State or national representatives. As things now are, it may well happen that before an officer becomes thoroughly acquainted with the duties of his office, his term expires and he is displaced by another. And besides, the people of New York are pre-eminently a busy people. There is danger, if these elections are too frequent, that those citizens who are actively engaged in business, and who are not politicians by trade, will become tired of them, and instead of making the earnest effort required to secure good officers, will stay away from the polls altogether. The article also greatly reduces the number of elective offices, and increases, in a corresponding degree the appointing power of such as are elective. The mayor and chief financial officers, and the members of the city legislature, are the only municipal officers who are made elective. Under the present state of things, when long lists of candidates for subordinate positions are presented to the voters, they are liable to be puzzled and perplexed with names they never heard before. With the limited number of aldermen proposed by this article, and their election by general ticket, and for a comparatively long term, there is reason to believe that more dignity will attach to the office, and a much superior class of men will be secured for the position. The effect of this change will be to introduce into the common council a more independent element and a higher sense of duty, and thus effectually expose and defeat those jobs and rings which have so degraded the municipal government of New York, and which no mayor has hitherto been able successfully to resist. It is not too much to hope that a board of aldermen thus constituted will become a high-toned, intelligent and independent body, and that the superior character of the men thus brought into the service of the city will command the confidence of the community and furnish a sure guaranty against the extravagance and corruption which now characterize the common council. Such a city legislature would stand high among the parliaments of the world, and contribute powerfully to the prosperity of this great and noble city. Upon this subject a leading member of the New York press, in an article reviewing the report of the committee, uses the following language: "The guarantee for responsibility, for fidelity, for conscience, in a body created, as it is proposed to create the board of aldermen, may not be perfect, and a large class of our best citizens have long been accustomed to urge the necessity of establishing some sort of property qualification: and yet the practical difficulties in the way of restricting the municipal franchise have always been found to be of a very serious kind when any attempt has been made to reach the details of a qualified suffrage scheme."

"No property owner, however, in New York but will admit that in constituting the board of aldermen as is proposed a far higher order of candidates than we have recently known will aspire to the office. Men of position and means —possessed of any degree of public spirit and energy—will not think it beneath them to sit in a select body of twelve in the highest branch of the legislature, deriving their power and authority from the electors at large and holding their seats for double the term of State legislators or Congressmen. Property, in the board of aldermen, ought at least to have a fair and ample representation, and that, too, without any invidious encroachments upon the franchise rights of the poorer class of citizens."

Another popular journal in the city of New York, in referring to this branch of the report, says:

"Making the term of the mayoralty three years instead of two is a beneficial change. The modification of the board of aldermen is also thorough and complete. It makes it within the power of a majority of voters to elect an executive and the chief branch of the city legislature who shall represent the same principles and work in harmony together. The aldermen will not be elected by districts, but on a general ticket for the whole city, and for a term of four years instead of two. In the board of councilmen there is no special change except that they are to be called assistant aldermen, as in former days."

It is proposed to give to the mayor the sole power of appointment and removal of all executive officers. So far as the language of the public press in the city of New York can be regarded as an expression of popular sentiment, this provision meets with general and emphatic approval. In alluding to this feature in the report an influential journal says:

"This is right, as we have seen the corrupt and insolent use the aldermen make of their present participation in the mayor's appointments. The power over executive appointments given to the upper house of legislation is a weak spot in our Constitution, and not to be extended to cities where prompt concentration and the vigorous exercise of power is often so essential. It is most essential to a good city government that it should be efficient as well as safe; and for this it is necessary to unite large trust with weighty responsibility, and that these should be proportioned to each other. Then they secure both ends—vigor and fidelity."

In reference to the enlarged powers which it is proposed to confer upon the mayor, the same article says:

"They—the committee—have gone very far toward what we hold to be indispensable to the existence of a really effective government, by concentrating the larger part of the executive administration in the hands of the mayor and subordinates deriving their authority from him. It is an important step in the right direction. We rejoice in it as one omen for good, as the beginning of a development of common sense and sound principles in the Convention; as an indication that at length statesmen are opening their minds to the conviction of the safety of trusting the people with the power of controlling their own government."

Upon this subject, another journal also says:

"The changes in the government of this city recommended by a majority of the Convention committee are good as far as they go. The mayor ought to have the substance along with the shadow of executive authority; and it is a decided improvement to give him the exclusive power to appoint and remove subordinates. At present the aldermen virtually control all the offices not filled by election, because they can refuse to confirm the mayor's appointments until he names a man who meets their somewhat peculiar views. The mayor, under the new order of things, will have full sway over every municipal department except that of finance. The proposed abolition of that useless and very costly body, the board of supervisors, will throw a load of new duties and responsibilities upon the mayor's hands, and the office, with its enlarged field of labors, will be quite worthy of the ambition of our ablest citizens. Tax payers, and the great number of quiet voters who have been in the habit of keeping away from the charter election, will now have a powerful motive for coming out and electing a mayor who can protect their interests."

The Brooklyn Union also says:

"We regard the principle underlying this report as a sound one. We believe that in Brooklyn it would work well—that our citizens have remaining enough self-respect, courage and integrity to sustain their interests under it. The responsibility of one man for the administration of the government—the idea of a body of legislators elected by a large constituency for a long term—and the system of separated elections for municipal affairs, are commendable."

Before commissions were established, the government of New York was divided between the city authorities and the board of supervisors. Each had power to levy taxes. The city authorities were not responsible for what the supervisors did, nor were the supervisors chargeable with the abuses of the city authorities. Between them both, as might well have been expected, the affairs of the city were sadly mismanaged, and the people greatly overtaxed. An appeal was made to the Legislature to interpose and correct the abuses. It assumed the task—I have no doubt it was with the best and most patriotic intentions. By a series of special acts, beginning in 1857, it has taken a large portion of the affairs of the city out of the hands of the people, and transferred it to special commissions appointed by the Governor. From its first inception, this system of commissions has been making gradual inroads upon the inherent right of the freemen of New York to govern themselves. Statute after statute has been passed, the effect of which has been to lessen more and more the character, dignity, influence and efficiency of the local government, and to expand the powers of a few functionaries who are so fortunate as to hold places under this new system of government. Thus the authority which had before been divided between the city authorities and the board of supervisors, has been again divided among a large number of commissions which are responsible to neither the board of supervisors nor the city authorities. It is easy to see how matters might become much worse under such a triple-headed government, but it is not so easy to see how they could be improved by the change. The experiment which has thus been tried for ten years has most signally failed. Let me say to my political friends and associates that we cannot afford to continue it. The right of local self-government cannot always be denied with impunity. Commissions have had their day—let them be abandoned. Let the State government cease to interfere in the affairs of cities any more than it does in the affairs of other localities. We profess to believe in the right and the capacity of the people to govern themselves. Let us act upon that profession and allow the cities, as well as other portions of the State, to exercise that right. Let the Convention give to cities, New York as well as others, a simple form of municipal government. Let the whole control of municipal affairs be vested in a city government, with a mayor at its head who shall be endowed with the substance as well as the shadow of executive authority, and who shall be directly responsible to the people. If such a government shall fail to correct the abuses which still exist, it will be the fault of the people themselves. If nothing more, it will have the effect to confine the existing evils to the limits of the city, instead of making them co-extensive with the State, as the present system is doing. The charter of the city of New York needs careful revision. Its great defect is a want of unity and subordination in the different branches of the government. The powers and duties of each department should be specifically defined; safeguards against fraud, and more adequate means of detecting and punishing official delinquency, should be provided; a sterner and more detailed system of accounting in respect to financial affairs should be adopted; the legislative and executive powers should be more clearly distinguished, and the duties of each distinctly defined; the distinction between city and county taxes, accounts, and expenditures, should be entirely abolished; the line between city and State authority in relation to city affairs should be more accurately drawn — in short, there should be a complete and thorough codification of the laws relating to cities. For myself, I attach very great importance to such a revision, as a most effective measure of reform. Such a code of laws for cities, would, to a very great extent, prevent applications for special legislation, and thus remove a fruitful source of corruption. "The whole system," says Mayor Hoffman, in one of his messages, "commencing with the charter, and running through all the commissions, is the worst that could be devised." He adds, "With a well devised charter we can have the best local government in the land." It has been said that more than one-third of the time of every session of the Legislature is devoted to the affairs of the city of New York. The annual controversy over the tax levy presents dangerous opportunities for corruption and bribery. It is obvious that it must exert a most demoralizing influence upon the members of that body. They are allowed to appropriate enormous sums of money, to which neither they nor their constituents in any way contribute. These fearful evils must go on increasing from year to year, unless by some constitutional provision the power now annually exercised by the State Legislature over city financial affairs shall be restrained. When the city elections should be held is a question upon which a difference of opinion will naturally exist. There are some considerations which favor the plan of having all the elections for the year, national, State and municipal, take place at the same time. The citizens would more generally give their attention to such an election. A larger vote would thus be secured, and the merits of candidates would be more likely to be carefully scrutinized. The expense, too, would be materially diminished. On the other hand, if the city elections are separated from the State and national elections, the local affairs and interests of the city will be less affected by State and national politics, and the attention of the citizens will be more exclusively given to their own local interests. Each plan has its advantages. But it is very clear that if both the city and State elections are not to take place at the same time, they should be separated as far as possible. The separation of the government of New York into city and county departments, is obviously a great defect. All agree that the board of supervisors should be abolished. Its existence renders two sets of officers necessary. Double accounts must be kept and two annual tax levies must be made. The city and the county of New York being the same in territory, in population and interests, there can be no advantage in maintaining two distinct systems of government. The public has long been aware of the evils and abuses to which I have referred. They have long existed. The most injurious consequences have resulted from them. The interposition of this Convention is unquestionably necessary in order to secure an adequate remedy. Such alterations should be made in municipal governments as will make them more popular and render them more efficient and useful. The inhabitants of these great communities have a right to expect at our hands some measures which will relieve them from the abuses which have so long preyed upon their vitality—measures which shall effectually contribute toward the maintenance of tranquillity, the security of property, the encouragement of industry, and the preservation of public freedom. To secure these important ends has been the controlling object of the committee. The reforms they recommend are intended to establish a more intimate connection and sympathy between those who are invested with the powers of government and those who are liable to its burdens; to subject municipal corporations to vigilant popular control. In this way, it is hoped to effect a safe, efficient and wholesome reform of these valuable and indispensable institutions.

Mr. FRANCIS—Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of this question with a profound sense of the magnitude of the interests which it involves, and of the direct bearing it has upon the welfare of more than one million of the people of this great commonwealth.

CITY GOVERNMENT.

The governments of cities—what shall they be? What can we do to insure a better system? Is a uniform plan, whatever it may be, practicable? Would it be wise to adopt an article as a part of the fundamental law of the State, unchangeable for twenty years to come, that shall establish municipal governments upon a policy of uniformity, and thus render modifications impracticable if not impossible for so long a period of time? These are grave questions that demand the serious attention of the members of this Convention.

THE PROPOSITION TO MAKE STATES OF CITIES.

The chairman of the Committee on Cities has submitted a report which, instead of one section mainly devoted to cities, as in the Constitution of 1846, has sixteen sections. Its effect, if adopted, would be to make every city in the State a little state in itself, independent of legislative authority, and with a mayor whose powers are not limited like those of the Governor of the State, but are as ample as those of an autocrat. If this article goes into effect, New York and Brooklyn will be practically independent states. The State must abnegate its powers and yield its sovereignty to municipalities. To this I, for one, do earnestly object. If it is thought best to sever the connection between the cities and the State, I prefer to have them erected, with the consent of Congress, into new States, according to the legitimate constitutional method. If, however, they are to remain a portion of this State, I insist upon their being subject, like towns and villages, to the general laws that govern the whole State, and especially to the legislative power. I object to this whole article in its form and its spirit, as inimical to the interests of the State, as opposed to the fundamental principles of our government, and as dangerous to the welfare of the cities themselves. The form of the article is more like a legislative enactment than a constitutional provision. It goes into detail, petty detail; whereas a Constitution should deal only in generalities—laying down fundamental principles, and leaving details to legislation. The spirit of the article is equally objectionable. It is a blow at State sovereignty. If cities are to be invested with independent powers, we shall soon be split into fragments. Our cities will be like the ancient cities—not a part of the State, but each city a whole State, and the agricultural districts their tributaries and subjects. New York and Brooklyn will be like Hamburg, and Bremen, and Frankfort, and the so-called free cities of the middle ages. The day has gone by for the establishment of such forms of government. It would have been far better for Germany if its free cities and petty principalities had been long ago merged into one Germanic nation. The spirit of the article is one of past ages. It is a spirit of disunion, and not of union. It is a policy not of unification, but of dismemberment and separation. It is a recognition of the pestilent heresy of State rights, as applicable to the cities—the political ulcer of the republic, which, after festering for seventy years, ripened into secession and burst into open rebellion, and which has cost us four years of bloody civil war to extirpate.

POLITICAL DIVISIONS—THE POLICE DISTRICT SYSTEM.

The tenth and eleventh sections of the article are aimed at the several boards of police. The Legislature is forbidden to divide the State into any other political divisions than those of counties, cities, towns and villages, and no territory is to be annexed to any city except for the purpose of changing its boundaries. We might ask here whether this ill-considered and sweeping clause in the tenth section—and I invite particular attention to this point—does not abolish school-districts comprising parts of different towns in a single district, or parts of towns with villages and cities? It certainly does in terms, and its effect would be, if adopted, to break up more than two hundred school-districts of the State. But if this objection can be obviated, would it be desirable to destroy the police districts, as proposed? I think not. Those divisions are essential to the efficiency of the system. Take the city of New York: The dangerous classes are now hemmed in by the police organization, which embraces with the metropolis, Brooklyn, Staten Island, and a portion of Westchester county—the suburbs of the city. The machinery works harmoniously and with efficiency over the whole district. If the police power were confined to the city proper, it can readily be seen that the suburbs, which are directly identified with New York in business interests and social relationship, and do virtually constitute a part of the great metropolis, would have no adequate protection against the raids of criminals and rowdies. One significant fact may be stated in this connection: The pugilists who make New York city their head-quarters, and whose disgraceful demonstrations and shocking brutalities have been so frequent during the past two years, have not dared to select any portion of the metropolitan police district as the arena for their criminal indulgences. They have gone outside the district to fight it out on their line. This fact in itself is a tribute to the efficiency of the system, which has not only preserved order in the city, but protected the suburbs that are linked to it as a part of one great whole. Why seek to disturb a policy that works so well, and essentially weaken the police organization by destroying the district plan and limiting the field of operations by municipal isolation? Police protection is often necessary on the ferry-boats. One member of our Committee on Cities [Mr. Law], states that he was induced to dispose of his interest in the ferrying business while the old police organization, which was confined to the city, was in force—and how inefficient it was in the city, all know—because there was no proper protection against outrages upon the boats and at ferry landings. All this is changed under the district system of metropolitan police, whose powers are extended over adjacent waters and territory. There is now a power at hand to enforce order and arrest criminals at the ferry landing places and upon the boats. Again, at Staten Island an adequate police force is stationed to protect the river front, and so prevent the incursion of rowdies into the country back of it. My friend [Mr. E. Brooks] may say that he seldom or never sees a policeman in his neighborhood some distance from the river, yet he is taxed heavily for police protection. Well, he has that protection at the river front; the rowdies are not permitted to break through the lines and depredate upon the country in the rear. So my friend does not see policemen where they are not needed; but I venture to say that where their services are required for the protection of himself and neighbors, there they may be seen in the faithful discharge of their duty. Now, then, suppose that Staten Island was without this protection—and the same may be said of other suburbs of the city—would any local police likely to be organized be adequate to protect the place from the gangs of rowdies and law-breakers that are liable to invade it? Is not my friend better satisfied to enjoy protection, even if it costs heavily, than to incur the risk of unchecked lawlessness and unpunished crime?

Digitized by Google

CAPITAL POLICE DISTRICT.

The argument I have attempted to set forth in favor of the district plan of police, as opposed to what I conceive to be the ill-judged recommendation of the chairman of the Committee on Cities, is equally pertinent to the capital police district. Here are villages clustering about two principal cities. Our police has jurisdiction over the cities and their village suburbs. The latter are thus assured of protection which they otherwise could not enjoy. The weaker has the full benefit of the stronger power, whenever it may be necessary to employ it for the arrest of criminals and the protection of persons and property. The district for most part is densely populated, and all have a common interest in maintaining good order and upholding and vindicating the laws. So they are united for this purpose under one system, most efficient and thoroughly administered we know it is, though in other respects distinct from each other as regards local government. It enables the prompt concentration of all the police force of the district, if needs be, to put down riotous proceedings in any one locality therein. It affords protection to the smaller places against raids by the criminal and disorderly classes from the cities. It permits the pursuit of criminals throughout the extent of the district, without interruption to hunt up a justice and secure the indorsement of a warrant if the offender has fled across the river from one county into another. All this red-tapeism is cut away under the district plan, and the old forms of law which delayed and oftentimes defeated justice are put aside for a system that is worked directly to a purpose, and that purpose the maintenance and efficient enforcement of law.

MAJORITY REPORT—PLAN FOR LOCAL DESPOTISMS —VINDICATION OF POLICE COMMISSIONS.

But the main point, the vital feature, of the article reported by the chairman of the Committee on Cities, is contained in the eighth section. It proposes to sweep out of existence our police and all other legislative commissions for cities, and to vest in the mayors unrestricted power in appointing heads of departments, and in removing them "at pleasure." Thus, it will be seen, the one-man power is invested with despotic authority for the government of cities; the mayors are to rule as kings in their respective municipalities; their will according to the article under consideration, is to be the supreme law during the period of their reign. Authority yielded up by the State—its sovereignty abnegated under the specious plea of allowing the cities to govern themselves—and then conferring almost unlimited powers upon mayors to govern as individual will shall prompt them! That will may be influenced by passion, inspired by unworthy ambition, subject to fitful caprice, or directed by a spirit of reckless partisanship—no matter; it is the local king's will, and neither the State with its remaining authority, nor the people in their majesty, can interpose to check the one-man power, nor baffle the will of these our reigning city potentates. There they are, secured in their places by the Constitution of your State, wielding the departments of cities without limitation, and exercising power as their individual will shall dictate. Their agents, the heads of departments, are to be mere machines in their hands, and may be displaced "at pleasure!" This is the sort of self-government it is proposed to be given to cities; this is the plan gravely recommended to this Convention for the "uniform government of cities." I can conceive of no policy more despotic—none more objectionable in form and application—none that would involve dangers so grave to the common welfare of more than a million and a half of people, and to the integrity of our republican system of government. I was struck with inexpressible amazement when the plan was first proposed, and I cannot for one moment believe that it will receive the sanction of this body of intelligent representatives.

MR. MURPHY'S MINORITY REPORT.

The plan proposed in the minority report submitted by Mr. Murphy, from the Committee on Cities, seems to me indefinite and unsatisfactory. All the matters set forth in the two sections presented are proper subjects for legislation, embracing mere detail that should be decided by legislative action, and not by constitutional policy. But in proposing that all city officers shall be elected by the people, or appointed by the mayor with the consent of the board of aldermen, it is designed to destroy the police and other State commissions—in other words, to deprive the State of all power to give protection to persons and property in the cities, all power to enforce sanitary regulations for the purpose of repelling pestilence, all power to assert its own sovereignty within the jurisdiction of these municipalities, however imperious the necessity for its action in the premises. I earnestly protest against this proposed abdication of power by the State, as objectionable in theory and a dangerous innovation upon the policy of our government. The cities derive their corporate authority from the State; these local governments are organized under State laws to promote the convenience and subserve the common welfare of the people of cities. I say it would be impolitic and dangerous to nullify the sovereignty of the State in this respect, and strip it of the power to modify and amend organizations of its own creation.

MR. OPDYKE'S MINORITY REPORT.

The plan proposed in the minority report submitted by Mr. Opdyke, possesses substantial merits; still the one feature which the honorable gentleman recognizes as vital, is in my judgment impracticable. It is contained in the third section, wherein it is provided that the members of the board of aldermen in New York and Brooklyn, shall be chosen by such electors as shall have paid during the preceding year a tax on property officially valued at not less than one thousand dollars. I do not propose to argue this question upon its merits; I only say that, in my opinion, the scheme is impracticable for the very good reason that it cannot be carried out. Besides, if its success were possible, why confine its application to New York and Brooklyn? The same reasons that commend its acceptance for those cities, prevail in a degree at least in behalf of other cities of the State, and would certainly have force in respect to the larger cities of the interior, such as Albany, Troy, Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo. Again, in section 10, it is provided that "the right to provide for the preservation of the public health and to appoint and control the police force of the State shall remain with the State Legislature;" while in section 12 it is provided that the mayor and common council shall determine the amount to be raised by tax, "including police and sanitary expenses." This would render the police and sanitary commissions to a large extent dependent upon and subservient to the municipal authority. The mayor and common council would hold the purse, and dispense and withhold money at their pleasure, and so the State agencies named would be practically under their control. Every commission should have the power, under proper regulations, of raising or requiring the common councils to raise such amounts of money as it requires to carry out its objects. This is vital to the success of the system. Many of the provisions contained in the article of the minority report under consideration strike me most favorably as proper subject-matter for legislative enactment, and I should be glad to join my friend and others in urging the passage of a law by the Legislature to secure that object. But all this detail of policy for city government is, in my opinion, out of place here; it cannot properly be embodied in the fundamental law. Wise as this Convention may be, it cannot anticipate the public wants and necessities for twenty years to come so as to justify its action in settling the details of city governments into permanent systems that legislation for all this period of time cannot in any respect change. Cities are not stationary machines to be worked in one way only. They are constantly changing; they possess the elements of rapid growth; new interests are constantly being developed within them; new policies of government and measures of administration are required from time to time to meet recurring necessities. So I say an irrepealable system, and especially one that forbids the application of State authority when its exercise may be required by the highest considerations of the public good, would be a most dangerous experiment.

Digitized by Google

LEGISLATIVE COMMISSIONS—THE POLICE.

In reference to the policy of legislative commissions for the administration of some important departments of city government, I have this to say: we have tried the police commission and know that it works well. It has been in operation many years in New York, and who shall say that it has not been a success? Who believes that, under any municipal organization, the people of the metropolitan district, and the hundreds of thousands who are temporary sojourners in the great city every year, would have enjoyed the personal safety and the protection of their property interests that have been afforded them by this commission? Who believes that New York city would have been saved from sack and perhaps utter destruction during the reign of mob terror in 1863, if the well-trained, fearless and efficient metropolitan police had not been in service to resist and fight down the infuriated criminals? Who believes safety and good order would be assured in New York and throughout the metropolitan district to-day if this State institution were abolished, and a police of partisan municipal appointment were substituted for it? This State organization is the power that protects New York to-day, and without it there would be no adequate protection afforded. The stubborn facts of the situation cannot be ignored under any pressure of partisanship; they must be seen and recognized. A police power to be thoroughly efficient and always reliable, must be independent of local political influences. The members of the force must be placed in a position where they may defy those influences, and where they cannot be controlled by them. They have to deal with the dangerous classes—an element that has become formidable in the politics of our larger cities—and they must not feel beholden to these classes, either directly or indirectly, for favors received or rewards expected. And for this reason it is absolutely essential to the safety of New York and its interests, embracing to a large extent the interests of the whole State, that the police commission, deriving its powers directly from State authority, and entirely free from the paralyzing entanglements, and oftentimes corrupt combinations of local partisan cliques and associations, shall be maintained. It is a marvel to me, in view of the records of the past, the exigencies of the present, and the necessities of the future, that any good citizen, whatever his party predilections, can be found to favor a return to a system of municipal police control, by which the safety of vital interests would be constantly imperiled, and the worst criminals be encouraged to ply their vocation with the assurance of old-time immunity from punishment. I have conversed with democrats of New York city—representative men of the party, too—and they have conceded the efficiency of the metropolitan police; they have declared that the public safety would be jeopardized by a return to the old system, and yet, while saying so much, they averred that Governor Fenton had not observed good faith with them in putting a republican upon the commission, when, as they alleged, a democrat was, under precedent, entitled to it; their friends were incensed because of this, and now they could no longer resist the demands of party in opposition to the system, which was in fact opposed to the democratic idea of self-government. I put it to you, representatives from New York, and to you, representatives of the country districts that are so intimately connected in business relationship with the metropolis—are these good reasons, such as should have weight with candid minds, for striking down a system that is approved by experience as the best that can be devised for the police protection of a great city and its environs? Shall mere party passion override the great public interests? Shall the petty partisanship of the hour, transient in itself, and often vicious in its tendencies, prevail over the higher consideration of the public good? Are we here to make a party Constitution? Should it not rather be our aim to make a Constitution for the good of the whole people—an organic law creditable to our imperial commonwealth, and promotive of the virtues that attach to a beneficent civilization?

THE CAPITAL POLICE.

The capital police law was passed by the Legislature three years ago, and the system went into operation two years ago last July. That it has furnished this district, and all parts of it, a more vigilant, reliable and effective police than they had ever before enjoyed, admits of no doubt. That its abolition now, and a return to the old policy of separate municipal police organizations for the several places embraced within the district, would be attended with a fearful increase of crime, and insecurity of personal and property interests, I think there can be no doubt. I do not simply express in this my own opinion, but the deliberate judgment of a great proportion of the most intelligent citizens and largest property holders of the district, embracing leading members of both political parties I have received letters on this subject from many of these, and propose to read extracts from the expressions of some of the more prominent. I earnestly crave the attention of the Convention to the proof and the argument which are here presented—all the more confidently asking your indulgence since I have occupied heretofore so little of your time in debate, and the subject now before us is one of transcendent importance to a large and populous district of the State.

ALBANY.

The distinguished and eminent President of the Mechanics' and Farmers' Bank, Thomas W. Olcott, writes:

"I should much regret to have our police commissions abolished. I regard an independent police as vital to its efficient and impartial action in the protection of persons and property."

Thomas Olcott, cashier of the same institution, says:

"By all means have the police commission and the police free from all political alliances."

Hon. Bradford R. Wood, late minister to Denmark, in an earnest letter, urges that the police commissions shall not be abolished, and forcibly adds:

"I know that a new and anomalous doctrine has recently obtained in some quarters that each locality, each city, has a right to a government virtually independent of all legislative influence, and I look upon it as more heretical than the doctrine of State rights as interpreted and carried out by the States lately in open rebellion. It is claimed, for instance, that the government of the city of New York shall be intrusted to the mayor, he to be held solely responsible to the heterogeneous mass that made him mayor, forgetting that he is the representative of a constituency who can and will re-elect him, no matter what he does, provided he does not act counter to the few who control it, and which includes a proletarian population of foreign births, unaccustomed to self-government or self-control, confounding license with liberty; but who, after all, are less culpable than the demagogues of native origin who hound them on and use them for their own purposes. A good and efficient government for our large cities we must have. The people of the State, individually and collectively, have a right to demand it, and the Legislature must see, by commission if need be, that it be done."

A. D. Shepherd & Co., leading merchants of Albany, write:

"In our opinion nothing could result more disastrously to the peace and good order of this or any other city than the placing of the police authority in the hands of the mayors. The growing tendency in our cities to rowdyism and crime is in itself sufficient argument for removing the control of the police entirely from the reach of those whom it is intended to keep in check. We believe the business community in general will look with distrust upon all efforts to return to the old system."

The thought here embodied that the police should be as far removed as possible from the vicious classes, and should, therefore, not be dependent upon the mayor whose election they largely influenced, is well worthy of the serious attention of the Convention. John S. Perry, a prominent manufacturer, writes that if the proposition would insure that the office of mayor shall be filled by men of capacity and strict integrity it would be for the public good. He proceeds:

"But as men of an opposite character are frequently elected to that office, I fear that such an experiment—for it can be nothing less than that—would be attended with great hazard to those who have any thing to lose. The project has my unqualified disapproval. I believe that nine-tenths of the men in Albany who pay an income tax to the government would vote against a measure so full of peril. I hope you may be able to defeat it."

The fatal defect of the majority plan is here presented. If, while giving all powers to the mayors of cities, it could only guarantee the election of good mayors, the objection to the proposition would be, to a certain extent, disarmed. As that is impossible, it is not strange that the plan is regarded with the greatest apprehension by men who have large interests at stake in the good government of our cities.

Dr. Peter McNaughton, an eminent physician of the city, says:

"I am opposed to any amendment in the Constitution whereby mayors in cities shall have the power of appointing the police commissioners or any other. If the Convention is determined to have the people vote the amended instrument down, they have only to retain this despotic clause and the thing is done."

Lemon Thomson, an active member of the common council, writes that in his judgment, where matters of expense are involved, the people should be left to decide for themselves, but that a different principle should prevail where the question is one of enforcing the laws. He adds:

"I should consider it a great misfortune to have the mayor of our city control the appointment and management of our police force. The man filling the office of mayor is so apt to be either a weak or a wicked man—so apt to pander to the worst passions of the worst men—so apt to be willing to sacrifice all that is right and just in order to obtain a little transient popularity, that I cannot consider it wise or safe to place such a large amount of power and patronage in his hands. Our experience as a city fully justifies such fears. It was but a few years ago that our mayor was the head of our whole police force. Witness the unquelled disturbance at the election of the Young Men's Association, and at the election in the ninth ward, when the polls were so blocked that only one party were permitted to vote, and the mayor and police force were present on both of these occasions. So palpable was the outrage in the ninth ward, that the Legislature, after a thorough investigation, declared the election void. Our present police system is a great improvement on the one which preceded it. It is well and ably managed. No one who has lived under the two systems and desires a non-partisan and efficient police that will preserve order and defend the right, would for a moment be willing to return to the old system, or any thing like it."

All of these letters are written under the inspiration of the contrast, plainly seen and felt by their writers, between a system such as that contemplated by the majority report and the system which now exists, and all express the same repugnance to a return to the former. Jared A. Post, a prominent merchant, writes as follows:

"As a member of the Committee on Cities, I hope you will exert all your influence to prevent the amending of our Constitution so as to abolish all commissions—the effect of which would be to deprive us of our excellent and efficient capital police, thereby placing us back under the old system of a partisan police, greatly to be deprecated by all good citizens, and every friend of order and good government."

Theodore V. Van Heusen, of the firm of Van Heusen & Charles, writes:

"We favor our police commission as a plan, and with regard to commissions in general, would never force one upon our people against their wishes intelligently expressed; but deem the city of New York an exception, where it is clearly the fact that the wealth, virtue, and intelligence of the people are outvoted and overborne at the polls, and they need to be saved from their own folly and wickedness."

L. & P. K. Dederick, leading agricultural implement manufacturers, write:

"The better personal character, and the greater efficiency of our present police, as compared with the old appointments by the common council, the greater security in regard to life and property which obtains among our citizens, and the universal satisfaction which prevails, are among the many reasons which can be given to prove the superiority of the police appointed by the police commissioners."

The Hon. Lymain Tremain says:

"The abolition of the police commission for this district I should consider a great public calamity. Since its organization a reform has been effected in this city which has been the theme of general public commendation."

In the course of his letter Judge Tremain cites the opinion of our supreme court, delivered by Judge Nelson, in the case of the People v. Morris, 13 Wendell, 331. The eminence of the authority, and the singular pertinency of the opinion to the subject now under consideration, should command great weight for it in the Convention. Judge Nelson says:

"It is an unsound and absurd proposition that political power, conferred by the Legislature, can become a vested right as against the government in any individual or body of men."

Judge Nelson proceeds to say that the power conferred upon corporations, upon the canal commissioners, the canal board, "together with hundreds of other offices in the State," are held by no other tenure than the will of the Legislature. And then he adds:

"The species of power thus conferred is the same as that bestowed upon the inhabitants of incorporated towns, cities and villages. Both are public trusts. The rights are the same to the extent of the power granted. It is obvious that the principle (that political power can become a vested right as against the government) would soon annihilate all government. Indeed, long before this time, if its authority had prevailed nothing would have been left in the administration of the government of the State, subject to the action of the law-making power. The plain solution of this whole matter is, that political power conferred by the Legislature is a public trust to be executed not for the benefit or at the will of the trustee, but for the common weal. How long it shall exist, or in what manner it shall be modified, are questions independent of these depositaries and belong exclusively to the people to determine, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution."

So far as the right and power of the State are concerned, it seems to me that this is conclusive and unanswerable. In this connection I quote from that eminent jurist, Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, Vol. II, page 320, in language confirmed by the supreme court of this State, a familiar truth:

"Political corporations are such as are created by the government for political purposes, as counties, cities, towns, villages. They are invested with subordinate legislative powers, to be exercised for local purposes connected with the public good; and such powers are subject to the control of the Legislature of the State." 13 Wendell, 225.

So we here see what the fundamental principle of our government is in respect to the powers of cities, as enunciated by the highest judicial authority. It has always been held that the State may exercise supreme control over all parts of its territory, over all its citizens, for the good of all. If the opposite doctrine of municipal independence had prevailed, as remarked by Judge Nelson, "nothing would have been left in the administration of the government of the State, subject to the action of the law-making power," for if cities may have independent powers, and exercise authority above the State, there is no reason why counties, towns and villages should not be invested with like privileges. R. P. Lathrop, in a letter carefully comparing the operations of the police under the present system and under that which preceded it, says:

"I should consider any interference with the capital police a grave public calamity. The proposition to vest absolute control of it in the hands of the mayor, I regard as especially dangerous. Our city has had ample and conclusive experience on this subject. Our police was formerly under the exclusive control of the mayor. At that time its administration was so partisan and corrupt, and the force itself became so utterly inefficient as to be absolutely unendurable. Men of all parties revolted against it: * * * We have now altogether the best police we ever had, and I should regard a return to the old system as a fatal step."

Hon. Emerson W. Keyes says:

"The citizens of the present capital police district, embracing the cities of Albany, Troy and Schenectady, and populous villages and other contiguous and intervening territory admirably adapted to consolidation for police purposes, can bear testimony, from a very bitter experience, to the utter inefficiency of a police system administered by local or municipal authorities. Your own memories here will be more impressive than any suggestion of mine; and recalled with the fervor which a sense of personal peril must impart, will powerfully appeal to the Convention to pause before striking down systems of police organization that have served to bring to populous communities, after years of violence and misrule, a sense of security and peace."

TROY.

The letter which I here present is signed by a large proportion of the business men of Troy, including representatives of all the banks of the city and the largest capitalists of the place. Among the names attached to this paper are those of prominent and influential members of both political parties. The list represents property in the city amounting to more than twenty-two millions of dollars. The letter is addressed to myself and reads as follows:

"Hon. John M. Francis, Constitutional Convention, Albany:

"SIR: The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication in relation to the report presented by the chairman of the Committee on Cities in the Constitutional Convention, and now pending in that body, proposing the abolition of all commissions for cities, and that all heads of departments shall be appointed by mayors.

"In answer to your desire, therein expressed, to learn our views upon the subject, we have to say in reply that, as residents of the city of Troy, where the capital police commission has been in operation for the past two years, and, in its beneficent administration, has given protection and security to life and property, and afforded the peaceful citizen immunity from assault and injury in attempting to exercise his rights at the polls, and has maintained the public order inviolate, and secured the approbation of all good citizens—the proposition seems strange, reactionary and dangerous; and we respectfully ask that our unqualified disapprobation of it may be made known to the Convention, as the testimony of those who have lived under both systems, and have practical knowledge of the operation of each. We deprecate a police appointed by local municipal authorities, partisan and inefficient, and condemned as good for nothing. We approve of the present capital police, created by legislative authority, demanded as a measure of public safety for the city, not subject to the dictation or caprice of party, or to the turbulent classes whom, from necessity, it was created to control.

"As between the two systems, we cannot contemplate a return to the former without serious apprehensions. Besides, it is not asked for; and may not we, the people, have, or retain, a system which all lovers of good order approve of, demand as a measure of security, and are themselves willing to pay for?

"We would not abate a jot or tittle from the just rights or powers of the people. But in the government of cities the claim for and on behalf of the people of the 'right of self-government in all matters' is more specious and plausible than well founded and practicable. It has never been successfully carried out and accomplished.

"We hold it to be the duty of government on this subject, in the first place, to guard and secure the rights of the good, true and law-abiding citizen and his property, and to maintain good order, before it becomes tender and compassionate toward the vicious and disorderly.

"We do not regard the creation of police commissions as a departure in principle from what has always been the law in this State, but only a more efficient method of executing and carrying out that principle. Out of regard to private rights, the law awaits an overt act of violence before it acts, and then it calls upon the Governor or sheriff to repress it. But it is always better policy to prevent than to cure any disorder. A good police is a preventive remedy for public disorders in cities.

"It is not too much to say that had the capital police been in existence at the time of the July riots in 1863 those scenes which, under our old police system, disgraced the municipal government of this city, and not only spread alarm and put life and property in peril, but, with the uncontrolled fury of a riotous mob, actually demolished the establishment of the leading press of the city and wasted and plundered the private house of a prominent citizen, could not have occurred.

"We do not wish to return to a police which, if it did not sympathize with and make up a part of the mob, was at least utterly without efficiency to repress it.

"No; let us have order and security to life and property and the pursuits of industry and peace—considerations above all partisanship and political ascendency. Let us have a police independent of the vicious and disorderly, who, in cities, make up a large voting class of controlling influence in elections. These are not attainable in our judgment, by giving to mayors, who are necessarily partisan officers, the appointment of heads of departments who will also necessarily be partisasn.

"Our present system is the growth of time, the demand of necessity; and until a better one is proposed than that which puts us back under an odious and inefficient system, we shall be pardoned for adhering to the present. And we think that the Legislature may be safely trusted to act either in the retention or abolition of the present system, as the wants of the people of cities may require.

I have, in addition, received individual letters from large numbers of the prominent citizens of Troy, and will read expressions from a few of them. Messrs. Saxtons & Thompson, largely engaged in the milling business, write:

"As owners of real estate (flouring mills and residences) in this city, we do most earnestly protest against any change of police or police regulations. Our desire for the maintenance of the present capital police is far above any political or personal likes or dislikes, and is founded on the great law of self-preservation. We believe the fair fame of Troy depends upon its continuance."

Jonathan W. Freeman, a lumber dealer and large property owner, writes:

"The capital police was organized as a matter of necessity. It has worked well, and law and order men of all parties support it. I would rather see all the good your Convention may propose voted down, than to have our only means of safety—the capital police—destroyed by your action."

Uri Gilbert, late mayor of Troy, and one of the most eminent of its citizens, says:

"No agency contributes so much to the safety of the lives and property of our citizens as the capital police. I do most earnestly request you, in behalf of your constituents, to persevere in opposing the article reported to the Convention by the chairman of the Committee on Cities, the adoption of which, as a part of the fundamental law would, I believe, prove most disastrous to the interests of this city."

E. F. Bullard, who has recently taken up his residence in Troy, says:

"I would not have moved into the city, or invested a dollar in real estate therein, if I had supposed that the police commission would be abolished, and the State withdraw its protection over the lives and property of those within cities."

R. H. McClellan, late surrogate of Rensselaer county, writes:

"The capital police has been approved by public sentiment, without distinction of party, and should be sustained."

Potter, Paris & Co., prominent stove manufacturers, say:

"We are decidedly opposed to any action that will make any change in our efficient capital police organization."

Harvey J. King, a prominent citizen and lawyer, refers to the inefficiency of the old police system which the present plan superseded, and says:

"Then, alike under the rule of either political party, we had an inefficient and unreliable police force, composed as it was of partisan appointees, whose continuance in place depended upon political chances. Now, it is quite different, and we have daily and constant evidence of the intelligent, faithful and efficient performance of the duties devolving upon the police organization. Our citizens feel a degree of security and confidence never realized under the old system. This marked and gratifying change is the result of placing the appointment in other hands than those of a mayor or aldermen whose popularity and chance of further political promotion must be looked to in the making of appointments."

George Gould, late justice of the supreme court of this district, and formerly mayor of Troy, writes as follows. I give his letter complete, as it presents the argument of the case in a concise and forcible manner:

"In regard to the proposed amendment, relating to the government of cities—I am surprised at its introduction; and I should be very much grieved to find it adopted. After thirty-seven years' residence in Troy, I feel myself fully qualified to speak of the government of the city and of its vicinity. And you need not hesitate to assure any and all members of the Convention, that this part of the State, never, at any time, had what deserved to be called a police force, until since the creation of our present commissioners. And there is not a shadow of doubt that nine-tenths (if not all) of our respectable citizens, without distinction of party, are more than satisfied with our present system, and would be very sorry to lose it. The legal idea in regard to laws is not to change them unless there is found an evil to be remedied. And now, while we have an organization which was adopted to remedy the intolerable evils of our former position—when no one thinks there is any evil of moment enough to call for a change—to be thrown out of a good condition merely to try an experiment is both an unheard-of innovation upon principle and an unwarrantable trifling with the good order, the well-being of a large and important portion of the people. The security of persons and property in all this thickly populated region is at stake in this proposition; and we are entitled to demand that no experiment be tried at our expense. We care nothing for fine theories; we ask for tried facts; and we know that we now are well taken care of. Therefore we insist that we are entitled to be let alone, unless, indeed, the Convention would do us and others the favor of giving its sanction to our commission. It was not this part of the Constitution which the people cared to have touched when they voted for a Convention. The principle involved does not require, and indeed hardly admits of suggesting a political point; but in justice to those who have conducted our present system I would add that it has not been managed as a partisan matter, and great fairness has been manifested in the selection of members of the force."

Rev. Peter Havermans, the well known and venerable pastor of St. Mary's church, whose parishioners number several thousands of adopted citizens and others, writes thus emphatically and earnestly:

"I beg leave to say that, from observation and knowledge, I am satisfied that the capital police system has subserved a most beneficent purpose in this city. It has given us good order and security where, under the municipal plan, crime was alarmingly frequent, and our community felt that there was safety for neither property nor persons. The capital police is superior and efficient in this: that it is independent of all the bad influences of the popular elections. The men do not feel that they are dependent on politics or partisans, but rather that they hold their offices upon the tenure of faithful service and good behavior. So I have seen, in common with our citizens generally, that they have done their duty with fidelity; they have protected us from crime and furnished us a safeguard for our rights and property that otherwise we should not have enjoyed. I feel deeply on this subject, and should regard it as a great calamity if we were forced back to the old order of municipal police, either by the action of the Constitutional Convention or the Legislature. I entreat you, as I do the members of the Convention generally, to vote and use your influence against any and all propositions that contemplate any change of our existing capital police system."

Ingraham, Phillips & Co., proprietors of the Washington stove works, say:

"We regard the present police system as efficient and economical—a necessity in fact for a city largely engaged in manufacturing like ours. We have safety now, while formerly there was constant danger and frequent crime."

P. H. Baerman writes:

"I would regard the abolition of the existing police system a public calamity."

Alfonzo Bills, a leading miller and flour merchant—one of the most prominent business men of Troy—writes:

"You know I meddle very little with politics, and as a general rule I consider my duty discharged to my country when I go to the polls and vote against the radicals; but I was not able to do even that satisfactorily until our present police system was adopted—a system I should be very sorry to see disturbed, as I consider the practical working of it in our city a great success. I don't think it can be bettered. I certainly think the proposed one man power for three years very objectionable, and I do hope your Convention will not put it in that shape should they decide to touch it at all, the expediency of which I very much doubt. I think the maxim to 'let well enough alone' a good one."

Alexander McCall, one who has had much to do with city affairs, and a large owner of real estate, says:

"I am decidedly in favor of the present police system of our city, and should deem it a calamity to return to the old system of watchmen, or the old or a similar mode of appointing them."

Elias Plum, once mayor of Troy, and widely known as a capitalist and business man, writes:

"I much prefer our police system as it now is, and know of no change that can be made for the better. We never enjoyed as much security as we now have. I feel it would be a calamity to have it all thrown back into the political cauldron again, and subject to be changed at every election of mayor, and to be held out as an inducement for such change."

C. B. Russell, a banker and intelligent citizen, says:

"We now have an efficient and well conducted police force, and one which does great good Better not change it."

Giles B. Kellogg, an old citizen and able lawyer, referring to the article reported to this Convention by the chairman of the Committee on Cities, says:

"I am amazed that a system of such concentrated and intense despotism should have been recommended. The effect of the plan, I have no doubt, would be to depreciate property in our cities at least fifty per cent, and our experience shows that peaceable citizens would have to remove from our cities, or else remain in constant danger of losing their lives."

G. V. S. Quackenbush & Co., among the heaviest dry goods dealers in the State, write:

"As you know, we have suffered too much by burglaries under the old system to willingly return to its insecure protection. We feel satisfied with the police as it now is, regarding it efficient, and, for the service rendered, economical. The Convention may be sure it works better than it would to be mixed up with local politics."

Wallace & Vaughn, wholesale druggists, write as follows:

"We refer with just pride to the record of our capital police, and insist that we cannot spare these guardians of our lives and property. We urge you to resist with all your powers the proposition to return to those evil times when peaceable citizens hardly dared to walk the streets after nightfall, and lawlessness and crime everywhere abounded."

J. M. Warren, a citizen of high character and great prominence, an ex-mayor of the city of Troy, expresses his views in the following strong language:

"My opinion is, that the capital police system works most admirably, promptly and efficiently. It does much to prevent crime and is a great security to property and person; and until our present system was inaugurated our city had no reliable police. I think our citizens generally greatly value the institution as it is. The wit of man may invent something better, but is more likely to fail in the attempt. Pray let well enough alone."

Ex-alderman Charles Eddy, who for years held responsible positions in connection with the government of this city, says:

"I cannot contemplate the proposition for the abolition of the police commission with any other than feelings of real alarm. Its usefulness and necessity have been demonstrated. In behalf of myself, and I think of all other order loving citizens, I do most solemnly protest against the change recommended by the chairman of the Committee on Cities."

Joseph Fales, who has also had a large experience in connection with city government, says:

"We have now in this city a reliable police, and I hope the day is far distant when we shall be remanded back to the old plan managed in the interests of local politicians."

J. C. Osgood, for two terms a member of Assembly from Troy, a heavy tax payer and a representative democrat, speaks thus plainly and forcibly:

"You know that I am an old-fashioned man, and believe that when a thing is well enough it is better to let it alone. When the law was passed establishing a police commission for New York city, I felt that it was an outrage on the citizens of that city, because I believed it was done to take the power out of the voters' hands and to perpetuate the rule of the republican party in this State—which was wrong; but the law worked well for the peace of the city, and the same law has worked admirably in this city. Our citizens have become used to the present police system, and I believe are perfectly satisfied with it. My opinion is, that if the old plan were restored, or power given directly to the mayors of cities to appoint the police, the rowdy element would control, as that element would nominate and elect men to such office as would give to this bad class the naming of the police and then they would have full swing for mischief. Therefore, I say, leave well enough alone."

E. Waters, a prominent business man of Troy, says:

"I cannot believe that intelligent and well disposed delegates will sanction the proposition to destroy the police commission. It is absolutely necessary to our safety in cities, and I pray you to do all in your power to preserve the system."

Irving Brown, a lawyer of marked ability, and a citizen of excellent judgment, writes as follows:

"We have now as good a police as can be found in this country. Human life and private property are no longer subject to such raids as disgraced our city in the summer of 1863, when our jail was broken open, thieves and murderers were set at large, and houses and places of business were sacked and destroyed. If a vote of our citizens could be taken to-day on this subject, no doubt it would be largely in favor of retaining this system."

Willard Gay, Cashier of the National State Bank of Troy, says:

"All the law-abiding people, without respect to party, are well pleased with the present system of police, and would feel alarmed if it were done away with, by going back to the corrupt municipal plan of appointment. As far as this bank is concerned, we willingly pay our part of the tax necessary to sustain the system, and would pay more rather than return to the old one. Pray use your best endeavors to save us from such a plan as that proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Cities."

Charles H. Jones, proprietor of the Troy House, thus speaks of the capital police:

"I should very much regret to see this important arm of our protection abolished, and this I believe to be the sentiment of a large majority of the intelligent and respectable portion of the citizens of Troy, irrespective of party, as they have seen the workings of the old system under which their peace, property and personal safety were at the mercy of thieves, incendiaries, and even murderers."

G. W. Cornell, late sheriff of Rensselaer county, writes as follows:

"I regard the present police system of vital importance to our citizens, and the only one that has ever given us security in our persons or property."

J. Thomas Davis, clerk of Rensselaer county, says:

"The present police system met with some opposition when it was first put in operation, but I believe all good, orderly and respectable citizens now not only concede its excellence and efficiency, but present it as a model in protecting the personal rights and securing good order and the peace of the community. I do most earnestly urge you to oppose with the utmost of your ability the proposition to abolish the system."

William H. Young, a reputable merchant and a large tax payer, who has been for many years a member of the board of education of the city, writes as follows:

"As a tax payer. I feel that the money expended in the support of our police system is more than trebled in the saving of property from fires alone, as can be proven by the number of fires that have been discovered and extinguished by the police force. For one, I would rather submit to a double tax than that the present police system should be abolished."

Winnie, Ford & Clark, dry goods merchants, write:

"Any change involving the abolition of our present excellent police system, and calculated to return our city to the danger and misrule of the past, would be very undesirable."

J. H. Willard, principal of the Troy Female Seminary, expresses his views as follows:

"It seems to me that the breaking up of our present police arrangement, and a return to the old system, would be most unfortunate for the good order of our city, and something that I think ought to be opposed most vigorously."

D. Thomas Vail, president of the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank, of Troy, a large property owner, and most influential citizen, writes as follows:

"I was a witness of the efficiency of the metropolitan police in fighting down the mob in New York city, in 1863. The very next day I saw the mob in our city, unopposed by any police power whatever. I am sure it could never have occurred, had we enjoyed the protection of our present police force. We now enjoy a sense of security never before realized, and which no municipal system could secure us. I should deeply regret any change."

John B. Gale, a lawyer of distinction, and a large property owner, writes:

"If police authority were vested in the mayor I should regard it as fatal, and as involving a speedy return to the former state, when police was a mere fiction."

Wood, Willard & Prentice, wholesale boot and shoe manufacturers, write as follows:

"The business community, and indeed all law-abiding citizens, are more than satisfied with our police system as it now exists. There is no tax which we more willingly pay than that which goes for the support of this commission. Reposing the power of the appointment of the heads of departments, including the police, in the hands of a mayor, even if a good man, it seems to us would be despotic; and we cannot estimate its evils in the hands of a bad man. We sincerely hope we may be saved from such a fate."

Jared S. Weed, who has occupied many responsible positions in connection with city government, is a large owner of real estate and president of the Troy Savings Bank, says:

"I should regard the abolition of the capital police as a great injury to our city, an event that would be deeply deplored by nearly all our law-abiding population."

Ex-alderman Hugh Rankin, a large tax payer and sound business man, holds the following language:

"I am decidedly opposed to the 'one-man power' system for the government of cities recommended in the article submitted to the Constitutional Convention by Mr. Harris. It is contrary to the spirit and genius of our people. It may do for Russia or France, but it never will take with American citizens. It is dangerous in the extreme. The capital police is one of the finest improvements that could be devised, and ought not to be interfered with. It gives us order and security where before crime prevailed and danger menaced us at all times."

Starbuck Brothers, the well known manufacturers, write as follows:

"We should regard with alarm a return to the old municipal police system, by which policemen would be appointed by those just elected to political offices, and who would of course reward those who worked hardest to give them positions. Troy has suffered under the evils of this method of appointment, and we hope it may never again be thus afflicted. Now, our policemen are appointed because they are good and true men, and we feel safe under their guardianship."

COHOES.

A. S. Baker, proprietor and editor of the Cohoes Cataract, writes:

"I think the capital police commission absolutely essential to the proper government of such a community as is embraced within the district, and I trust that the good sense of the majority of the Convention will sustain the principle upon which it is established."

J. H. Masten, long a resident of Cohoes, and perfectly familiar with the interests of the place, writes as follows:

"I believe that a very large proportion of our citizens, irrespective of party, are favorable to a continuance of a commission that has contributed so much to the security of property and the peace and good order of society."

LANSINGBURGH.

Albert E. Powers, a large tax payer, and one of the most useful and influential citizens of Lansingburgh, says:

"No tax is paid so freely as that for the support of the capital police, the usual comment being that there is pleasure in paying it, for we realize the worth of the money paid. It has maintained good order and saved us from crime. I truly believe that the whole cost of the force to this village has been covered by the difference to citizens in the prevention of fires alone. I have no doubt that the representatives of three-fourths, if not of nine-tenths, of the taxable property in this village, desire the continuance of the police under its present government. The fact that the officers and men are in no way amenable to the offenders against the laws, adds constant efficiency to their action and discourages resistance to their authority."

D. H. Flack expresses his earnest opposition to the plan proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Cities, and his support of the capital police as essential to the protection of the community.

Alexander Walsh, cashier of the National Bank of Lansingburgh, writes with equal earnestness in favor of the police commission.

Horace W. Day says:

"Our tax payers in this village are almost unanimously in favor of the capital police."

Joseph Fox writes that in his opinion the abolition of the capital police would "prove disastrous in its influence upon the peace of society."

WEST TROY.

M. R. Peak writes as follows:

"The police as now organized is satisfactory to the public, is free from the bad influences of party control, and is most efficient in service. A change of the system I believe would prove disastrous—especially such a change as that proposed in the Constitutional Convention by Mr. Harris. I trust it will be defeated."

James D. Lobdell, of West Troy, speaks of the insecurity and danger that prevailed before the present police organization was put in operation—that "there was no adequate protection against raids of vicious and evil disposed persons who came from the river and canal, and from the adjacent cities; but since the introduction of the present police, night brawls seldom occur, burglary and arson have been less frequent, and a state of security has been felt by our citizens such as we had not enjoyed for many years previous."

Thomas Richardson writes that "under the old system no protection was afforded; under the plan reported by the chairman of the Committee on Cities we should certainly have no protection. Under the present capital police commission safety and good order are guaranteed us. We beg that your Convention will do nothing to put us back to the tender mercies of the dangerous classes."

COMPARATIVE EXPENSE OF OLD AND PRESENT POLICE.

In this connection, I have before me a statement derived from official sources, showing that the expense of supporting the capital police in Troy—an organization that affords reliable protection to our citizens—exceeds what would now be the cost of the old system of utterly inefficient and worthless municipal police which it superseded only $3,658.91. And it is believed that in discovering and extinguishing fires alone, as stated by Mr. Young, the capital police has saved property of larger value than the amount which our police cost the city during the year—$65,181.85. I present the statement complete, as follows:

The actual amount of money charged to the city of Troy for expenses of the capital police for the year ending September 30th, 1867, was,	$65,181 85

This sum paid for 1 superintendent, 3 captains, 12 sergeants and 60 patrolmen, or a force of 76 men, and includes all charges for salaries of commissioners and clerks, for office rent, light, fuel, etc., etc.

The average amount paid by the city for the services of these 76 officers for the year was, therefore, each,	$857 65
And estimating the inhabitants of the city at 45,000, each inhabitant paid for the support of the police system not quite,	1 45

The expenses of the old police system, for the year 1864, were as follows:

Amount paid night watchmen,	$19,578 19
Amount paid directly by the city of Troy to constables for the service of criminal process,	13,523 04
The amount paid by the county of Rensselaer to constables, for the service of criminal process, in that part of the county now embraced in the capital police district (including the amount paid for attendance at courts), was $15,819. Of this the city of Troy paid 52 3-10 per cent. or,	$8,273 34
Under this old system, nearly all the persons arrested were taken directly to the jail, and there detained until taken to court for examination—an expense being thus incurred for two or three days board of each person arrested, as also an expense for a mittimus in each case. The expenses for board and for these writs averaged, yearly, about,	6,000 00
The actual cost, therefore, of the old police system for the year 1864 (while a large part of this cost was indirect, and, at first glance, covered up) was,	47,374 57
But in case the old system had continued to the present time, the pay of night watchmen must certainly have advanced considerably, with the general advance (of about 100 per cent) in the pay of persons in all vocations. But estimating the advance of the cost of these night watchmen at only 50 per cent, it would be necessary to add to the actual amount given above,	9,789 09
In addition to this, the bills of constables for criminal service were annually increasing, and any estimate that could now fairly be made would call for an addition of at least 20 per cent to the amount paid, in 1864. But an addition of 20 per cent would be,	4,359 23
It thus appears that the cost of the old police system, if that system had been in existence in 1867, would have been,	61,522 91
The difference between the cost of the capital police system for 1867 and that of the old force (if it were now in existence), appears as,	3,658 91
Or 8 1-10 cents for each inhabitant.

But the foregoing estimate of the increase of pay of night watchmen is exceedingly small, and it will readily be seen that if this estimate were increased in proportion to the actual increase of the cost of living, the old force would cost more than the existing system. The towns in the county of Rensselaer, which are outside of the capital police district, as well as those in it, reap a large and peculiar benefit from the existence of the present system, as will be seen on inspection of the following data:

In 1864, the county paid for the service of criminal process and court service in the capital police district,	$15,819 00
Of this amount the city of Troy paid 52 3-10 per cent, or,	8,273 34
And the towns consequently paid,	7,545 66
In 1867, the county paid for the same service performed in the district, (as per bill presented by the board of capital police to the supervisors of Rensselaer county, 52 3-10 per cent of this amount, which must be paid by the city, is,	2,314 67
	1,210 74
The county towns must therefore pay in 1867,	1,103 93
Instead of (as in 1864),	7,545 66

The police force, under the old system, consisted of seventy-eight men, twenty-six of whom were on duty each third night alternately, no duty whatever being performed during the day. It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to prepare an estimate of the duties performed by this force, from any preserved records. The capital police force of the city of Troy consists of seventy-six men, as above stated, who are required, by the capital police act, to give their entire attention to police duty, serving both night and day. The last annual report of the deputy superintendent shows the following as some of the principal duties of the force during the year ending September 30, 1867:

Digitized by Google

Arrests made during the year,*	4,316
Destitute persons provided with lodging,	1,912
Lost children restored to their parents,	101
Fires attended, to preserve order and secure property,	51
Fires discovered by policemen,	6
Fires extinguished in their inception by policemen,	6
Persons preserved from death by fire,	1
Stores, dwellings, etc., found open at night and secured,	403

It is proper to state that during the year 1867, the pay of capital police officers was increased by act of the Legislature. During the first six months of the fiscal year, the expenses of the force, as given above, were in accordance with the pay of patrolmen at $725 each, per annum; and, during the last six months of the fiscal year, these expenses were in accordance with the advance of pay to $850 per annum. It may also be proper to state that the $65,181.85 (the entire amount of the running expenses of the system for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1867), does not include the interest on the amount which the city holds, invested in station-houses. In comparison with such investment under the old police system, the city pays, in effect, $1,750 (or seven per cent on $25,000) more than in 1864.

THE CONTRAST.

I believe I utter the almost unanimous opinion of the law and order people of Troy, without respect to party, and of a large proportion of those in the other places in the district, when I say that the abolition of our admirable and efficient police system would be regarded as an unmixed and terrible calamity. It would remit us and all our interests of property and life to the insecurity, the constant peril and the criminal depredations of the past, when crime was rampant in the city and there was but little power to check or punish it. The plan to give the mayor all powor, clothing him with authority to appoint police commissioners and remove them at pleasure, is a plan for local despotism; a plan to enable that official during his three years' term to organize and operate a political machine that shall ride rough-shod over the interests of the people and to build up a partisan power for self-promotion or to advance the sinister purposes of faction, that would become tyrannous in itself and defiant of the rights of the people. It is a plan to consign the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and the cities and villages of our police district, to the perdition from which they were rescued by the existing police organizations. Better, a thousand times better, that the Constitutional Convention should at once disperse than that it should incorporate in the fundamental law a feature so sure to undermine all the safeguards of protection, threatening us with the old carnival of crime and striking a severe if not fatal blow at our prosperity. Nor would a change of the system so as to secure the appointment of the police commissioners by the common council, or their election by the people, prove much if any better, as experience has abundantly demonstrated. King caucus in this case would prove quite as dangerous as king mayor in the other. Local partisan influence would dictate the police appointments, and the dangerous classes who have votes would have a voice in the selection. We must, to insure protection, have a police entirely independent of municipal politics, and this is insured under the State commissions of the metropolitan, capital and frontier police organizations. In this connection I wish to state that in the last interview I had with our late colleague, the lamented David L. Seymour, he declared to me distinctly and with earnest emphasis that he should oppose with all his power any proposed action by this Convention for the abolition of our capital police system; that although he did all he could to defeat the enactment of the law authorizing the organization and spoke earnestly and labored zealously before the Senate committee for that purpose, believing the principle to be anti-republican and wrong, yet now he was perfectly convinced of the necessity of the organization for such cities as ours. And if he were alive and here to-day, party or no party, he would raise his voice in earnest protest against abolishing the system of police absolutely essential to the protection of our city and the safety of its citizens.

THE FRONTIER POLICE.

The frontier police, now in operation in Buffalo and adjacent places, was organized May 6, 1866. By an act passed in April, 1867, the police commissioners were constituted a board of excise. The amount received for licenses was $38,870, of which $37,710 was contributed to the police fund, and $1,160 to the poor fund. The receipts from fines imposed by police justices during the year, amounted to $28,637.51; while the average from the same source for eight previous years under the municipal police, was $3,522.44. This one fact shows the great superiority of the existing police system in arresting criminals and bringing them to punishment. I have before me a table showing the annual cost per capita of the members of the police department of Buffalo, from 1861 to 1867, inclusive, by which it appears that the cost for each in 1865, under the old system, was $724.80; in 1866, under the commission, $542.31, and in 1867, $650. I append the official facts relating to the frontier police organization, as follows.

Chapter 484, Laws of 1866, provides for the organization of the Niagara frontier police district, viz.: Three commissioners, one clerk, one superintendent, one surgeon, two justices to the police, six captains, one hundred and forty patrolmen, twelve doormen. Total, one hundred and sixty-six.

Date of organization, May 6, 1866.

By act passed April 1, 1867, the police commissioners were constituted a board of excise.

* The arrests for the higher crimes, the expense of which is directly paid by the county, are of course included in this number; and all police expenses connected with them, which belong to the city of Troy are included in the $65,181.85, charged to the city for police expenses during the year 1867. The bill referred to above, as presented to the board of supervisors, is collected of the county simply that the amount may be divided among the localities of the capital police district, according to the work done by their several officers.

I have a large number of letters from leading citizens and property owners of Buffalo, all but two or three of which speak in terms of unqualified commendation of the frontier police. From these I beg leave to quote a few brief expressions:

P. W. Wagner writes that "financially and morally the community cannot afford to dispense with the present system."

Pratt & Co., extensive hardware dealers, "think that a change to the old system would be a great detriment to the city."

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser declares "the present a more efficient police than we have hitherto enjoyed, and we should deem it a great misfortune to return to the old system." It may be added that the Advertiser was originally opposed to the passage of the act.

Richard Bullymore "is satisfied that the present organization is doing a good work and would be very sorry to have it broken up."

Silas Kingsley "looks upon the present system in principle, organization and practical working as a grand success."

John Wilkeson "heartily approves the present commission, that it works well, and deems its continuance absolutely necessary to the good government of the city."

N. P. Sprague "would deeply regret a return to the old system of appointment by the mayor," and says that "the present force are a fine body of men and a change now would be deplorable."

D. Ramson & Co. says "it will be a gala day for all vagabonds when a return to the old system is made and that the present force has the approval of all good citizens."

R. Dunbar says "that the frontier police have worked well and are altogether the most efficient agency for the preservation of the public peace we ever had in the city of Buffalo."

L. & D. J. White "think that candid men will unite to continue the present system in preference to giving the selection of the police force to political demagogues."

Jno. S. Losdrick "had some doubts about the working of the system at first, but is now fully convinced that a return to the old system would be fatal."

E. D. Holman "is decidedly in favor of the present system and opposed to all change."

Joseph Churchyard "would deeply regret the destruction of the present commission."

Thomas Blossom says that "all men who are not controlled by party feeling will bear testimony to the high character and efficiency of the present police."

David S. Bennett, that "the continuance of the present force is absolutely necessary for the security of life and property."

Harvey & Wallace "would regard a return to the old system a great public calamity."

Howard & Chappel "prefer the present system to any thing we ever had."

Carley & Co. "would deprecate a change to the old system as loaded with danger to the interests of the city."

A. L. Griffin: "The abolishment of the present force would be of great detriment to this city, and the loss would be felt by every lover of good order."

Scatherd & Belton: "Our observation is greatly in favor of the present plan."

Nine members of the common council, with the president of the council, city attorney, treasurer, surveyor, clerk and street commissioner, state that "the system has the confidence and approval of all good citizens, who heartily and earnestly protest against its abolition."

Cassel, Rathbone & Co. "are unwilling to see the present commission disturbed."

Dr. C. W. Harvey: "It is the best system ever in force in our city."

W W. Peabody trusts "the force will not be abolished."

Henry W. Box: "The opposition to the system is entirely partisan, and although in the first instance I was opposed to the passage of the act, should now deeply regret its repeal."

J. D. White "implores the Convention not to abolish this valuable organization."

Lapp & Adriance "are in favor of the present and opposed to any political police organization."

Shaw & Kibbie "would much regret to have the commission abolished."

Digitized by Google

Cutler & Scroggs "are in favor of the retention of the present organization and opposed to giving the appointment of the police force to the mayor."

Adrian R. Root "regards the present as a most efficient organization, and would greatly regret a return to the former system."

P. A. Balcom & Son: "We are well satisfied with the present police force, and the city cannot well afford to do without it."

Seymour & Wells: "It would be a great disappointment to the people of Buffalo to have the present organization changed."

Dr. Thomas S. Rochester: "In common with all good citizens, I should be very sorry to have the present force disbanded."

D. P. Dobbins "hopes the present force will be retained, at least while he lives in Buffalo."

Sears & Daw: "Should not like any change."

J. C. Barnes & Co.: "Would regret exceedingly the transfer of appointments to the mayor."

P. J. Lewis: "The abolition of the commission would be a damage to good order and seriously endanger the security of life and property."

Rounds & Wall "think there is no comparison between the present and the old system. Public order is without protection if a change is made."

Thomas, Howard & Johnson: "We are in favor of retaining the commission."

G. Cande: "The present organization gives full satisfaction, and the people desire no change."

A. M. Clapp: "The police force now existing has given the city of Buffalo safety and peace."

Sage, Sons & Co: "The business men of Buffalo are totally opposed to the abolition of the present system."

Geo. R. Yau: "Beside the present the old force sinks into insignificance."

Farnham & Allen: "The present organization is efficient and conducive to the public good."

Pickering & Otto: "To take a step backward now would be a great public misfortune. We have a reliable body of men, and need no change."

Simmons & Crissey: "All order loving and law abiding citizens may well look with fear and trembling at the proposition for returning to the old plan of appointment."

E. Madden: "The present system is superior to any thing we ever had, and a change would be a great calamity."

L. R. Avery: "Judging only from results I am in favor of the organization."

Jason Parker: "I cannot too heartily express my preference for the present system."

We might multiply the above list, but enough has been said to demonstrate the deep feeling that exists in Buffalo on the subject, where the system has been tried with such good results.

STATE AUTHORITY, FREE CITIES, ETC.

So much I have presented—not my own opinions merely, but also the deliberate convictions and calm reasoning of many substantial and, I may say, representative citizens of the localities directly interested—in favor of maintaining the police organizations that derive their authority directly from the State, and are independent of partisan municipal influence and control. I need add no more to the argument. I cannot believe this Convention will give its approval to any plan that contemplates the abolishment of a system which is required as a safeguard against crime, and which is absolutely essential to the preservation of order and the enforcement of the laws. The cities to which we are often referred as being the defense and stronghold of liberty in the middle ages, were engaged in a continued warfare against the feudal system. The contest was between them and an aristocracy. At first the cities were more or less democratic in their forms of government, but they all became in the end oligarchies. In order to prevail against the feudal barons they allied themselves with the kings. Many of them obtained from the kings charters granting special and valuable privileges, but they have all, especially in France, England, Italy, Holland and Spain, been subjected to the national power. All the cities of England are subject to the omnipotence of parliament. In France the central power has for two hundred years controlled all municipal government. It is the same in Spain. In Italy, where for three or four centuries—from the year 1200 say to 1600—many cities flourished with great fame and power, all have finally succumbed to the national power. We can learn from history that very few of them ever had democratic governments. The most famous and powerful of them, Venice, Genoa, Florence, were oligarchies, in which popular rights and personal liberty were less regarded, and more limited, than under monarchies. For instance, in Venice, whose territory contained a population of several millions, not more than three or four thousand were admitted to any share in the government. In Florence, Sienna, and Lucca, altogether, not more than five or six thousand. In all Italy, in the fifteenth century, out of a population of fifteen millions, not more than eighteen thousand had any part in government, while in the fourteenth century eighty thousand had, and in the thirteenth one million eight hundred thousand. From this decay and downfall of the power and liberty of cities, we may learn that cities are not, at least, the only nor the safest depositories of power, defenders of popular rights, and protectors of personal liberty. The so-called free cities of Germany are any thing but free in fact, so far as recognizing the rights of the people are concerned. They enforce the most despotic rules for the government of trade, and apply the most arbitrary laws in all the details of industrial occupations and the affairs of commerce. The only cities in Europe that have retained their independence down to the present century are Bremen, Hamburg, Lubec and Frankfort. They are called republics. But the government never was popular, nor democratic. The government of Lubec is vested in the Senate and House of Burgesses. The former consists of four burgomasters, holding office for life, two syndics and sixteen counselors; and the latter of twelve colleges or companies, only seven of which have the privilege of voting. The House of Burgesses has the initiative in all deliberations relative to the public expenditure, foreign treaties, etc.; the Senate is interested chiefly with the executive duties, but its sanction is necessary to the passage of new laws. The government of Frankfort is vested in a Senate, a permanent Chamber of Citizens, and a Legislative Chamber. The Senate, which exercises the executive power, consists of forty-two members, divided into three ranks or branches, namely: sheriffs, junior senators, and State counselors. It annually chooses two presidents, from the first and second ranks. The permanent Chamber is an assembly of fifty-one members, chosen from among citizens of all ranks, and of whom at least six must be lawyers. The Legislative Chamber is composed of twenty senators, twenty members of the permanent Chamber, forty-five members chosen annually by the electoral college of Frankfort, and nine deputies from the rural districts. Citizenship is a personal distinction not obtained by birth alone. Neither domestic servants nor foreigners enjoy the rights of citizens, and foreigners have to pay for permission to exercise any calling in the city. Such was the government of Frankfort. The city has passed under the rule of Prussia, and what change of city government has been made is unknown to me. The executive government of Bremen is vested in a Senate, consisting of four burgomasters, two syndics, and twenty-four counselors; but the principal legislative authority is in the hands of the assembly of burgesses, composed of all resident citizens that pay a certain amount of taxes, without regard to their religion. The Senate chooses Senators for life, from a list of candidates proposed by the burgesses. The government of Hamburg consists of a Senate and three colleges of citizens. The Senate is composed of four burgomasters and twenty-four Senators, with the addition of four syndics and four secretaries; three of the burgomasters and eleven of the counselors must be lawyers; the remainder are merchants. The qualification for becoming a Senator is, that the individual be born in Hamburg, be about thirty years of age, and a member of the Lutheran church; no Calvinist or Catholic being permitted to sit at this board. The citizens of Hamburg are divided into "great" and "small." The former alone are eligible to places of rank and honor, and can buy and sell without restriction. The latter can neither import nor export goods wholesale in their own names, nor transact business on the exchange. The affair is altogether a matter of money, the expense of becoming a grosse burgher being one hundred and fifty marks, and that of a kleine, forty marks. The right of citizenship is not hereditary, nor can any foreigner transact business in Hamburg without becoming a citizen, nor carry on any kind of manufacture or handicraft, without entering one or other of the guilds or corporations, of which twenty-three exist Jews are wholly debarred from the last mentioned privileges. If great cities are not, as Thomas Jefferson said—undoubtedly applying the remark in a political sense—"eye-sores upon the body politic," they cannot be regarded, either in the light of history or from the experience of our own day, as the defenders and promoters of well regulated liberty.

PLANS OF CITY GOVERNMENT.

As to plans for city government, my own judgment is, after having given the subject much earnest attention, that no uniform system is practicable for that purpose. The interests of different cities are not at all in common as respects methods of municipal administration. We see in the article before us that much of its polixity of detail comes from the enumeration of powers and duties applicable to New York and Brooklyn as distinct from those which are named for other cities of the State. And yet, Albany may desire provisions which would be unacceptable to Troy, and so of other cities. No two cities are alike; interests and views of municipal policy largely differ. Each has derived its municipal authority from the State, and as any one of them desires to change its policy of administration, the way should be left open for the accomplishmant of the object by legislative action. We cannot, with propriety or justice, bind down the cities of the State to a particular and detailed plan of government, by permanent constitutional enactment. I would, therefore, go not one step further in the way of action here, with reference to the government of cities, than to adopt substantially the language of the Constitution of 1846, as applicable to cities. It may be found in the eighth article of that Constitution, section 9, in these words:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and in contracting debt by such municipal corporation."

Also article 6, section 18:

"All judicial officers of cities, and all such judicial officers as may be created therein by law, shall be elected at such times and in such manner as the Legislature may direct."

And article 10, section 2:

"* * * * All city officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people or appointed as the Legislature may direct."

At the proper time I shall propose to substitute these sections for the article reported by the Committee on Cities, satisfied that, doing so much, this Convention will have fully discharged its duty in this whole matter.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Perhaps in the order of discussion, it might have been more appropriate in some respects to have allowed a resident of some other portion of the State to have carried forward the debate, rather than to have continued it at the present time from the residents of the capital police district; but inasmuch as the interests and history of affairs in this district have occupied the attention of the committee to some degree during the forenoon, it may, perhaps, not be inappropriate that I should continue the discussion at the present time, with especial reference to the state of things here at the center of the State. Perhaps it is not improper for me to avow here, that I have had much to do with the procuring from the Legislature the enactment of that police law under which the city of Albany, the village of Greenbush, the town of Watervliet, including West Troy and Cohoes, the village of Lansingburgh and the city of Troy, are now governed, so far as police is concerned. A state of things had existed in that district just previous to the enactment of that law, such as could not be endured by the people, who were accustomed to civilized life and the protection of civil law. Some of us had read something upon the subject of law, and those of us who had read, had learned this fundamental principle, that allegiance and protection were correlative duties; that where one owes allegiance to another, whether that other be a State or individual sovereign, the correlative duty of protection arises. Such has been the history of law for the last thousand years in the civilized world. Knowing and believing that these duties were correlative, we felt it necessary to come to the State to which we owed and practiced allegiance, and ask protection from the State for our persons, for our families, and for our property. In this district we were voters under the law, and made so by the Constitution of 1846, and confirmed in our rights as voters by the Legislature. We found throughout this district that a portion of the voters were, to a great degree, deprived of the privilege of voting; that this denial of the right occurred in the city of Albany, that it occurred in the city of Troy, and that it occurred in the villages constituting this district; and we came to the Legislature, and, among other things, asked that a law might be created under which we might have the power of exercising the right of suffrage. And the reason why I came, sir, was from my peculiar situation. I lived in a ward having from ten to eleven hundred voters. There were in that ward about two hundred and fifty voters who wished to vote upon the same side with myself. The whole of the remainder of the voters voted upon the other side. The law guaranteed to us the right of challenging a man who came to the polls to vote, in regard to whose right to vote we had doubts in our minds. In 1860, in 1862, and 1864, no man wishing to vote as I voted, was allowed to stand for one moment within thirty feet of the polls after he had cast his vote. Men voted all day there without it being possible to challenge their votes, or to know who was voting; aye, without knowing what name a man who presented himself to vote chose to call himself by.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I would ask the gentleman whether the party represented by the gentleman [Mr. M. I. Townsend] had not a representative among the inspectors of election?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—They had not. Our democratic friends in that ward were too cunning to allow the minority in politics to have an inspector of election, because they run always two tickets for that purpose, and the democrats possessing a great deal more than two-thirds of all the voters in that ward, the minority have never within the last ten years, at any time, been able to elect an inspector of election. Thus the work went on, a farce upon the exercise of the right of suffrage. In 1864 this state of things culminated in the introduction from the city of New York of some thirty "roughs," who went from one poll in the city to another, and as we had five of the polls of the city (just one half of the whole) controlled as that in the eighth ward was, these roughs voted as many times as they pleased, and under just as many names as they chose to use. I am speaking of facts; and to-day the marks of the bludgeons of those "roughs" are upon the heads of our citizens, and will remain as long as these citizens remain upon the face of the earth. In 1860 the violence was so great in that ward that we went to our supervisors and asked them to throw out the votes of that ward on that occasion, for at that time there were less than a thousand voters in the ward, and yet there were cast over fourteen hundred votes, exceeding the entire number of voters of all sorts in the ward by over three hundred. But it was not believed by the supervisors that they had the power of interference, and of course the evil was unredressed. In 1862 we had a renewal of these scenes much worse than they had ever occurred before. On that occasion a riot occurred in that ward, and the result was that instead of the vote overrunning it fell short. The political majority of that ward failed to cast their vote by about one hundred, because there were feeble and quiet men of the political majority who dared not come to the polls. The Rev. Father Havermans, among others, presented himself to vote, approached the polls, but left at once, fearing the consequences of appearing there on that day. Sir, on that occasion we had the old police. To so great a height did this riot run, that the mayor of the city himself came to the polls and took his place in an upper room of the grocery where the polls were held and looked out upon the voters; and when he winked with one eye a voter came up and voted, and when he winked with the other eye the voter was not allowed to vote. I ought to say that the mayor of the city then was a candidate for member of Congress. Oh! we had a lovely time that day! [Laughter.] The views of my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] were illustrated in the city of Troy on that occasion in the most beautiful form possible to be conceived of. The law then did not emasculate the power of the mayor which was so necessary to his respectability. In 1863, when the gentleman who was elected by the majority of the people of this State in 1862 was holding the office of Governor, and when the riot broke out in the city of New York, the city of Troy followed in the same wake. We had the old police, and the mayor was the head of that police, and, in the absence of the mayor, the recorder of the city. The riot broke out at ten o'clock in the forenoon. The mayor was absent. The recorder came forward in the middle of the street at the head of the police, but said not one word, but stood and looked on while the mob was destroying the office of the Troy Daily Times—certainly one of the most respectable newspaper establishments in the State. This mob followed Mr. Demers, who was acting then as one of its editors, and who is now the editor of the Albany Evening Journal, not knowing that it was Mr. Demers, and threatened that if they caught Demers they would hang him on the first post they could find. The recorder of the city stood perfectly still and never uttered a loud word. He is not a bad man—he did nothing. Had he held a high office in the literary interest of this State, he could not have been more useless than he was on that occasion. [Laughter.] That mob went then and broke into the jail of the county and not a word was said by, and no action taken on the part of, the police to prevent it. They allowed this outrage to be perpetrated, and the alleged perpetrators of four different murders to go at large—indeed, every person confined in the jail was released except two negroes, who were left undisturbed in their cells. The mob then went to the house of a citizen who need not be named here, but who was in no way connected with office himself, and who had never been in the receipt of the profits or fees of office, directly or indirectly, and who had not been in the city for three days. His wife was compelled to leave her comfortable and quiet home at the bidding of the mob, and to take refuge in the houses of her neighbors, and yet not one word was said by the authorities to prevent the outrage. Private individuals and good men were addressing the crowd and trying to induce them to keep away, but the city authorities were silent and powerless. Again during the day the same infuriated mob presented themselves before the same mansion, and the same scene was re-enacted. Then they went to the other parts of the town, attacking those who were feeble and unprotected, destroying property, and threatening lives, until one o'clock at night, utterly unrepressed. Citizens, however, went to the recorder and to the mayor and volunteered to take up arms, to take up clubs, to do any thing to repress this violence; but in vain; their offers of aid were rejected—and why? I will not say. But I will state a fact, and leave the Convention to judge for itself. The very next year the man who was mayor at this time ran as a candidate for Congress. Not one effort was made to control this barbarian band of desperate men. About nine o'clock at night application was made on the part of the citizen whose habitation had been so often threatened during the day, to the mayor, to send the police to protect that house, as it was still publicly avowed that that house was yet destined to attack and destruction. The mayor refused the request with derision. A few dear friends, whose kindness that individual can never forget, were generous enough to take the most valuable part of his furniture, the keepsakes of his life and family, under the protecting shade of evening, across an alley into the basement of the Episcopal church in the neighborhood, and stored them there. At one o'clock at night the mob came, and instead of the mayor of Troy being there to protect the property, he was at his own home, as unconcerned as if profound peace had reigned in the city. When it was found that this mob was there, when it was found that the authorities did not propose to offer the citizen any protection whatever for his family or property, one hundred private citizens organized themselves at the arsenal into a military company, and, with a swivel gun, ran down to the scene of disorder and outrage. When they arrived there the house had been gutted from turret to foundation stone, and then, when this military organization appeared, the mayor of the city himself came upon the scene. He harangued the crowd, said that they were doing wrong and that they ought not to do so any more. They said to him, "Send away the military, and then we will go." He went to the military and utterly forbid them taking any action whatever, and ordered them to return to the arsenal, and they submitted to a public order in a manner which did honor to their respect for authority, however galling to their spirit as men. They wheeled about and marched to the armory, and on their way they were pelted with mud from their point of departure until they were sheltered by the walls of the armory from further insult. The mob then betook themselves to the mansion of the Hon. John A. Griswold, situated in the immediate neighborhood of their outrages, and told him that they understood that he had his kitchen full of negroes, and that he must turn them all out of his house, and must agree to discharge his colored coachman the next day, or they would make an example of him. Mr. Griswold said, "I have been over in Second street, and I have promised you every thing if you would desist from the destruction of my friend's mansion. The owner of the house was absent and his family without protection. You refused me there, and now I refuse your demand; I am prepared to defend myself, my family, and my property." The miscreants slunk into their holes and dens. That was the state of things in the year 1863, in the city of Troy. In 1864, when our election took place, we had renewed at the polls of the eighth ward of the city of Troy, and in four other wards, as I have before stated, the precise scenes that were enacted in 1862, except that the man who was a candidate for Congress then, was not himself mayor of the city at the time, his office having previously expired. The citizens of the eighth ward went to a meeting of men that assembled in a republican hall that night to hear the returns from the election, when every body—I will not say every body—but a great many good men were rejoicing that the choice of the people had again fallen upon that eminent patriot, Abraham Lincoln. They said to their fellow citizens, "We have in 1860, we have in 1862, we have in 1864 been trodden down in our attempts to exercise the rights of freemen, in our attempts to vote in the same direction that you think you ought to vote. We have suffered what we cannot suffer again and what we will not suffer again. If you will not give your aid to us, to create a state of things that shall give personal protection to the voters of the eighth and ninth wards of the city of Troy, we must cease our attempts to vote. Will you do it?" Our fellow citizens said they would do it, and a committee was appointed to wait upon the citizens of Albany, to see what should be done. I was chairman of that committee, and I came to the city of Albany. I resorted to the office of one who for more than thirty years I have loved as an elder brother [the gentleman from Albany,

Mr. Harris], and I said, "Now we at Troy are in this condition (describing our condition as I have described it here to-day); will you at Albany stand by us in an attempt to protect our lives, our persons, our families and our property?" That friend said "Yes, we have the same state of things here in the city of Albany that you have in Troy, but peculiar circumstances, that is, the presence of national troops, saved us from riot in 1863; but we have all the dangers that surround you. They proposed, in July, 1863, to hang Judge Johnson upon a tree before his own house in State street, because he was supposed to have written certain articles in the Evening Journal, in regard to a distinguished individual, who was supposed to be the 'friend' of the outbreaking classes" Said he, continuing—"That is not the only trouble we have had in Albany. It was but a few months before that the president of an important incorporation in this city, the New York Central railroad, employing a large number of hands, was designed to be treated with violence, because the pay roll was not put in precisely the same shape that certain turbulent spirits wished to have it put in." I see before me to-day [Mr. Corning] the gentleman who was named to me by my friend as the one whose life would probably have paid the forfeit, except from peculiar circumstances, several months before the outbreak in July. My friend said also on the subject of the elections: "In the ninth ward of Albany, yesterday, we had the same scene that you had in 1862. The mayor of the city was present during the turbulence and violence and riot which existed in the ninth ward, and if our friends are right in their notions he aided the disturbance instead of trying to quell it. Certainly, we will join with you heart and hand." Thus encouraged, I went to others; and if I meet that friend to-day, battling to destroy the system under which I have been protected for the last three years, he may well pardon me for saying that I am "amazed" to see the position which he occupies. Now, sir, that law was carried through. It was carried through by such representations as this—that crime of every kind was unpunished in this district, and especially in the city of Troy. I did not speak of the city of Albany before the Legislature; I only spoke of what I had seen and heard at my own home. I told the Legislature that within three hundred feet of my own residence, in the preceding fall of 1864, a young man by the name of Sargent, the treasurer of the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad company, at eight o'clock of a moonlight evening, was stricken down and murdered by a bludgeon, and his pockets rifled, and the perpetrators of that robbery and murder were never discovered, and were never punished. Let me say to my friends who are not acquainted with the city of Troy, that three hundred feet west of my street is the most valuable and ordinarily the most quiet portion of the city. In that street we are removed from the ordinary haunts of the "roughs." Mr. John L. G. Knox, one of our best citizens, early in the winter of 1864 and 1865, was knocked down and garroted before the First Presbyterian Church in that same street; and at a still later period, before the enactment of this law in 1865, Mr. Gurden G. Wolfe, one of the most respectable residents of Troy, was thrown down on Sunday evening before the post-office and brutally treated in the street, and yet not one of the perpetrators of these outrages and crimes was ever punished. My colleague [Mr. Francis] has alluded to the robbery of Quackenbush & Co. in that city. Not one of the perpetrators of that robbery has ever been discovered or punished. We thought it was time for something to be done, and the Legislature of the State was kind enough to do it for us. Now, I say to my republican friends—pardon me if I say republicans—I would not say republican as distinguished from democrat were it not from the necessity of the political positions in this State, for I suppose that the democrats are compelled to support this report as a political necessity, and not from what are their convictions of right and wrong in regard to the police of this State—I say there is a power over them that is greater than the power of individual opinion, and I say to my political friends living in other parts of the State that I claim, through the exercise of the power of the State, protection for myself, protection for my wife, protection for my children, protection for my grandchildren, and protection for my habitation. If the State does not protect my property, it must at least protect our lives. You have a right to do it; it is your duty to do it. If you do not do it there is a Power above that may forgive it, and poor human nature must try to submit. I say, sir, as I have said before, that protection and allegiance are correlative duties. It is so. I will appeal as well to republicans as democrats in this Convention, who know the history of my life to bear me out, that I have not fattened upon political advantages. I prefer to procure my subsistence by any conceivable form of honorable industry to feeding from the public crib. And, sir, I wish to say in regard to the capital police, when my friend speaks of it as a "political machine," that I do not exactly understand those words as he uses them. As I understand the use of the term he has adopted, it means that this law was passed as a means of getting fat jobs and political favor for political friends. I hope my friend [Mr. Harris] does not mean to include in his denunciation my respected friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], who, on the other side, when the metropolitan police bill was passed, voted for it as a member of the State Senate, whatever may be his views when his political relations have changed. [Laughter.] I hope he will not include himself among those who have adopted that measure to secure political advantages. But it is "a political machine," is it? I call the attention of such republicans as are afraid that our republicans are going too far in regard to this subject, to this fact, which cannot be disputed. Of the police in the city of New York to-day, I am informed that nearly two-thirds, certainly vastly beyond a majority, are democrats. I know that in the city of Troy a majority of the policemen, who have a compensation of eight hundred and fifty dollars a year, which certainly is a very desirable compensation for a laboring man, are democrats, were appointed as such, and continue to vote as such, notwithstanding they hold their position in the police. I was told last year (I do not know how it is now) that a majority of the police of the city of Albany were democrats. I hope that my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris], who led off in this debate is not so strong a partisan as to wish to destroy the police, for this reason, if it happens to be true. Now, sir, my friend from Albany answered me a question which I put to him during his remarks, with very great adroitness, but I do not know now what his answer could have meant. Am I doing injustice to my friend when I say that he dwelt long and earnestly upon that portion of his remarks in which he regretted the manner in which the mayor of the city of New York had been shorn of his power over the police of that city? When I put to my friend the question, do you think it was a calamity that Mayor Wood had not the power over the police of the city of New York, at the time he sent a telegraphic communication to the Governor of Georgia, that if he had the power to send on the arms and munition of war purchased by that State to battle down the government of Union, he would send them forward?—

Mr. ROGERS—I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. I would inform him that Mayor Wood sent forward the Mozart regiment to the war, having equipped the regiment himself.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—There was a time when Fernando Wood was convalescent. [Laughter.]

"When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
But when the devil got well, the devil a monk was he."

After he had done all he could to bring on the war, after he had done all he could to aid the rebels, it seemed to be popular to sustain the government for a time, and for a time Wood did sustain the government. But the exigencies of the time changed and the devil was no longer a monk, and now Fernando Wood has the affrontery to stand up and deny that he ever had any thing to do with loyalty at all. Now, sir, my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] would not answer the question I put to him. He could not answer it, for he knew he was talking political nonsense.

Mr. ROGERS—I would like to ask the gentleman—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I decline to give way to the gentleman now; at another time he and I can talk this matter over. I say that my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] knew that he was talking political nonsense. Let me see if he will dispute the position I take now? Will he dispute that if Fernando Wood had had control of the police of the city of New York, on the 13th, 14th and 15th days of July, 1863, instead of the police commissioners, in all human probability, what was then a riot would have resulted in a rebellion. Let me tell my friend that he is handling edged tools when he proposed to put into the hands of the worst men that God ever suffered to live in a civilized country, a power even greater than the power of the State itself. Sir, I have lived in those days and I shall not soon forget them. These policemen at that time were under the control of loyal men, and they did their duty nobly—democrats as they were. They went into these disloyal crowds, which were burning orphan asylums and hanging citizens to lamp posts, and murdering men and women here and there in the streets of the city, to speak nothing of arson and robbery which was rampant in nearly every part—and, democrats as they were, they most nobly did their duty. But, sir, if those who had command of the police on that occasion had wished to see rebellion succeed, had given commands, not only to make rebellion succeed, but had sent men to beat and kill the negroes as they were fleeing from one part of the metropolitan district to another, had sent the police to arrest those that were putting out incendiary fires, had commanded the loyal regiments of that district to disperse or confine themselves to their armories, while incarnate fiends were doing their work of destruction and rapine, every arsenal would have been in the hands of the rioters, every fortress about the port of New York would have been captured by these rebels, and we in the rural districts might have learned too late that we had committed a folly by leaving power in such unworthy hands, which ought to have sent us and which had sent us to political perdition. The power of those who do not know enough to govern the State as it should be governed, ought to perish. If the republican party do not know enough to govern the State as it should be governed, I hope that somebody who does know enough will be put in its place. There is no use in being squeamish about this thing. There is no use in making mistakes. We are not at liberty to make mistakes. Intrust the local powers of the large cities created and controlled by the populace with the police, and the state of things that existed on the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth of July, 1863, is liable to exist again in full force. The rebel army, it is true, had been at that time defeated at Gettysburg. But the power of the friends of the rebellion was yet supposed to be overwhelming. Every body knew many things which were not known by the distinguished public functionary who harangued in favor of the rebels on the fourth of July, at the Academy of Music, in New York, for he had not yet heard whether "there was any Holy Ghost." But still, sir, a large portion of the people of the cities supposed that the rebels had been only checked, and not defeated, and this riot was but the refluent wave of feeling from that ocean of disloyalty that welled up in aid of the rebellion in Pennsylvania and New York on the third and fourth of July, 1863. Now, forsooth, my friend [Mr. Harris], who has told us this morning, and told us truly, that he loved this country so much, and had manifested that love so much, proposes not only to turn over his friends in the cities to the tender mercies of the uncivilized spirit that gets up mobs, but to put power in the possible executive of the city of New York greater than that possessed by the Executive of the State itself. Ah! is there no danger in such a power? My friend tells us that we are four millions of people, and that a million and a half of those four millions are in our cities. Shall the State have no control over that million and a half of its citizens? Shall the State have no power of repressing disorder in all the vast realm occupied by them? Shall the State have no powe of protecting the good people who live there? Shall the State have no power of wielding that million and a half of people that are constantly increasing, as the gentleman says—wielding them to save the life of the State, when they may be wielded by local power to throttle the State? My friend must pardon me. This whole thing is neither more nor less than political nonsense. What country has set us an example? I ask it here that it may be answered during the debate. What State or country has set us the example of intrusting to its cities this imperial rule which the government cannot control? My colleague [Mr. Francis] has referred to the case of the free cities in the middle ages; but those free cities were States. They were not cities in States—they were States. They possessed the power of States, and when Hamburg spoke, it spoke for the State of Hamburg. When Hamburg displays her only city on her flag in the port of New York to-day, she shows all there is of her State. So it is with the other free cities of Germany, and still more was this true of the Italian cities. Take the government of France. In France the central government appoints the mayors, and it appoints, either directly or indirectly, all who hold power in the cities of France. When the minister of police sends out his fiat upon the wires to the different departments of the empire, he reaches every man intrusted with any authority in regard to police matters throughout the entire empire. How is it in England to-day? She has what we have got to have at no distant day. The people of England are men of practical common sense. You cannot put your foot in a village, in any part of the three kingdoms, without seeing men in the uniform of the police, owing their appointment to the government, and charged with the preservation of order in the municipality. And if the municipality or the village wishes to join itself with the enemies of the country, wishes to join itself with the enemies of public order, the policeman says: "I get my authority from a higher power"—it is the "lion and the unicorn that is emblazoned on my shield—they are the emblems that I look to for my authority." In the early stages of society, when there were only a mass of small villages throughout the State, the state of things which now exists was wisely adopted. But, sir, the State has immensely expanded, and if it was not wrong in the former days for the State to keep control over the preservation of order and the protection of its citizens, or the protection of its property; it certainly cannot be wrong to retain that control to-day. For, instead of time showing that the fathers were wrong, time has shown that the State not only must keep the right to control, but at no distant day must take absolute control of the means of preserving the good order of a State in all its departments. My friend says that a policeman is a local officer. He is a local officer; that is, he is called to act for a locality, and he is to that extent a local officer. My friend says that to be consistent with our institutions the policeman should be elected. Sir, those men who put on the "blue" in the days just past by, were policemen. Those men in this capital district who carry a club, and those men in the frontier district who carry a club, and who, thank God, on extra occasions carry something a little more effective, and those men who in the metropolitan police district carry a club, and those men in "blue" who went to the defense of their country and took the sword and the musket—have not held and do not hold their places subject to the caprices of local elections. Did we call on the sixth ward in the city of New York, and the eighth ward in the city of Troy, and the ninth ward in the city of Albany, to elect their soldiers who were to go and battle for the life of the Republic, and thus send rampant, hot mouthed politicians, many of them grossly disloyal, to defend all we held dear? No, sir, we sent such men as would take the oath of fidelity, and upon examination satisfied the enrolling boards that they were proper men to be sent. It is all a mistake, it is all a fallacy that you cannot have men protect your houses unless you elect them from the very men against whom you want to watch and guard.

Mr. ROGERS—I move that the Convention adjourn. [Laughter.]

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the chair, and announced that the Convention would take a recess until seven o'clock in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock.

The Convention resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris], to the first section of the bill.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Before our adjournment to-day I had taken occasion to look somewhat at the question under discussion before the committee. I had reviewed the state of things existing in the capital police district in the neighborhood of Troy, Albany, Cohoes, West Troy, Lansingburgh and Greenbush, to which locality the powers and duties of the capital police apply, previous to the adoption of the law creating a capital police in this district. I had shown, sir, that the creation of that body in this district did not grow out of any partisan feeling. I had shown that it did not grow out of any desire to create offices for political friends; I had shown that the capital police had not been wielded for any political purpose; that a commission consisting confessedly of commissioners, all of whom were republicans, had appointed a board of policemen, whose salaries were valuable, being eight hundred and fifty dollars for laboring men, a majority of whom were of a political faith entirely diverse from that of the commissioners to whom they owed their appointment; I had alluded to the fact that the operation of the police in the city of New York was so far forth non-partisan in its character, that it was alleged, and I believe truthfully, that two-thirds of that police against whom gentlemen make such a terrible outcry, were to-day of the same political faith with the voters of that city; I had alluded to the state of things in 1863, when the streets of the city of New York ran with blood, when the torch of the incendiary was active throughout that entire city, and when, as I believe, but for the fact that the police of the city was in loyal hands—and for that matter let me say that if on that occasion the police of the city had been under the control of the then mayor of the city it would have been in loyal hands, for my neighbor, Mr. Opdyke, from the city of New York was then its mayor, and not that high-flown patriot, Fernando Wood; but from the fact that in the city of New York the control of its police was in loyal hands, in all human probability, what was a mere mob, continued for three days, employed in riot, arson and bloodshed, would have been a revolution, and we should have had to fight with the elements of rebellion here upon our own soil, as well as at the South. I stated in the course of those remarks, that when the citizens of Troy appointed a committee to see whether a police that should furnish us protection should be created upon this locality, I came as that committee from the city of Troy, and consulted with my most respected friend from the city of Albany [Mr. Harris], from whose lips were heard to-day these terrible denunciations, which he poured forth upon his party in the State, his party in the city of New York, and the men with whom he has acted, in all times past—consulted with him, and that the plan of the capital police was adopted under his advice, and under consultation with him, and under the announcement that but for fortunate circumstances Judge Johnson would have been hanging upon a tree in State street; that but for fortunate circumstances the life of Erastus Corning would have been taken by an infuriated mob in this city, and that the police in this city, instead of being able to protect the public, were, on election day, prevented from preserving order by the action of its mayor, in whom, by this proposition, all power is sought to be concentrated—for it was gravely suspected that the mayor himself had given his aid and assistance to the violaters of the law, instead of giving his aid and assistance to those who upheld it. In speaking of my friend from Albany I ought to be a little more explicit, that this Convention may understand our relations even more perfectly than I stated them to-day. For four and thirty years I have been the personal friend of that gentleman. He never had a public aspiration that I did not aid. I stepped out of the ranks of my party to vote for him for judge when he and I differed in politics; I sustained him when he was elected to the United States Senate; I sustained him when he sought to be re-elected to the United States Senate; and ten days have not passed over my head since, in a quarter where I hoped it might be useful, I pressed the name of Ira Harris, though unknown to him, for a most important public position, so that nothing but kindness can rest in my heart toward my friend. But that gentleman to-day has read to us a lecture upon the enormities committed by the men who stayed up his hands—because it was upon the Legislature of this State that the attack was made—upon the enormities committed by the men that have stayed up his hands during the last six years, in the terrible struggle in which this country has been engaged. He tells us to-day that these laws have been passed by men combined together through "the cohesive power"—and there he dropped the quotation; but what my friend meant was "the cohesive power of public plunder;" and so, sir, it will be accepted, and when we next go down to the polls and engage in the canvass in this State, the powers that wish that the law should not be enforced, the powers that wish there should be no Sunday, the powers that wish there should be no good in this world or the next, will quote the speech of my distinguished and benevolent and religious friend from Albany, to show that when the Legislature of this State enacted that the brothels in the city of New York, and all its holes and dens of infamy, should cease to be publicly offensive after twelve o'clock on Saturday night, they did so through the influence of "the cohesive power of public plunder." My friend did not learn that lesson in the churches. My friend did not learn that speech in the house of God. "The cohesive power of public plunder!" These commissions created for the purpose of aiding in schemes of public plunder! I have told you, sir, and my friend sat silent when I told you, that the scheme of the capital police that protects us in this district, was planned by Ira Harris and myself, and I can rely upon this Convention, I can rely upon this State, to acquit me and him from entertaining the idea of public plunder when we conceived the idea of a police that should protect our citizens. Public plunder! Has the hand of my friend been crossed with gold growing out of the creation of the capital police of the city of Albany? Has my hand been crossed with gold growing out of the creation of the capital police for the city of Troy? "The cohesive power of public plunder!" Why, sir, all the salaries received by the capital police commissioners in this entire district, operating in a region that has a population of about two hundred thousand souls, all the salaries together are less than ten thousand dollars for Albany, for Cohoes, for Watervliet, and its thirty thousand people, for Lansingburgh, for Troy, for Greenbush, are all together less than ten thousand dollars in the year. When my friend and myself sit down to concoct a scheme of public plunder we shall ask more than that, although I trust we shall not get so far out of the track of genuine republicanism as to concoct any scheme for such purpose. We have never done it, and this Convention will not believe that we have done it. But my friend, in his zeal to vindicate what he considers constitutional right, has fallen into a most singular mistake. My friend has included among the commissions which he says have been created by the Legislature, under "the cohesive power of public plunder," street commissions, i. e. commissions for opening streets. Now, my friend is a good lawyer. He has been a good lawyer for years. I begun my acts of friendship in supporting him for the office of judge. I ended—the last act of kindness I ever did toward him, although he knew nothing about it, by recommending him for a similar position. Now, my friend will remember, the street opening commissioners are not created by your Legislature. The corporation of the city vote that a street shall be opened. They tell their lawyers to go to the courts and nominate commissioners. The commissioners are appointed by the court on the nominations of the officers of the common council. Aye, well might my friend talk about the cohesion of public plunder, as evinced in cases of street opening commissions; but unfortunately for his argument, he got the saddle upon the wrong horse. It is this local legislation; it is this local power, that is so clearly defined by the gentleman from Albany, which committed the plunderings that have been committed in the opening of streets in New York. Why, sir, and I want my friends in this Convention to put down the numbers, because I am going to compare certain other things with these numbers, the fees of the commissioners, in the opening of Church street alone, exceeded one hundred and twenty thousand dollars; and I shall show you that there has been no year when all the salaries of all the commissioners holding the republican faith have amounted to one-half that sum. Men sometimes get very much excited about matters without looking at them. As I said to my friend, and to another friend in this Convention, I do not go to New York very often; I do not know much about what is going on there; but there are a great many things that I do learn, incidentally, about that city. Now, among the commissions in the city of New York I find the emigrant commission. I find that that commission is filled by half republicans and half democrats, and that the commissioners have no salary. Is there much cohesion of the power of public plunder in such a commission? I find that there is a commission called the Central Park commission. I find that the majority of that commission are democrats. I find that those commissioners have no salary. Public plunder was the object of their creation, was it? Making fat offices for political friends was the object of creating the commission, and republicans committed this enormity through the cohesive influence of public plunder! No, sir. The enunciation of such an idea would be simply ridiculous. I find, then, that there is what is called the police commission; that there are four commissioners—that those commissioners are elected by the Legislature; that three of them are now republicans, and one a democrat; that the term of one of the republicans expires the present winter, and in all human probability that office will be filled by a democrat, so that the board will be a tie—half republican and half democrat, and that three-fourths of those holding office under the commission are themselves democrats. In connection with this commission I find that there is what is called a health commission, consisting of the four police commissioners and four additional commissioners, called health commissioners simply, and the health officer of the port; that the health officer of the port has no salary for discharging his duties upon this commission, and that these same police commissioners are also commissioners of excise. I find that for the three commissions, the members of the police commission, one of whom is a democrat, and two of whom will be, receive salaries of seven thousand dollars each; that the commissioners who are merely health commissioners receive salaries of four thousand five hundred dollars each. Now, is there any gentleman in the Convention that can tell me what amount of money these commissioners, as excise commissioners, have received the last year? I am ignorant, myself. My friend, Mr. Hutchins, says that this board, as commissioners of excise, have, for the city of New York alone, collected, the last year, about twelve hundred thousand dollars, and that for the last year before this power was intrusted to this commission, there was but twelve thousand dollars collected—paid for licenses in the same city! Now, does not my friend from the city of Albany feel that here is taxation without representation? that it must be an enormous burden upon the tax payers to have twelve hundred thousand dollars paid into the treasury, when the city government the previous year collected the enormous sum of twelve thousand dollars? It is a burden under which the tax payers ought to groan, and they must groan—at all events when they read the speech of my friend from Albany in their behalf. In addition to these, there are the fire commissioners, five in number, who receive three thousand five hundred dollars each, as a salary. I find that, taking this statement, these commissioners that I have named receive together $70,500, and that the republican members of that board receive less than $60,000, a sum, let it be remembered, scarcely twice what the mayor of the city receives from his various salaries and perquisites every year. Does not my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] know that the great cry against the commissioners of the police is raised because they have done their duty? Does not my friend from Albany know, and do not my friends from the country by this time know, that the difficulty is, that the cause of this enormous outcry is that when Saturday night comes vice must hide its head, and keep it hid until twelve o'clock on Sunday night—that if my friend happens to be in the city of New York he may go to the house of God without having his way blocked by the reeling, drunken maniac, in the midst of the Sabbath? It is not taxation, sir, that has made the trouble. It is not the denial of local governments that has made the trouble. It is the check that, for a moment in the seven days, is put upon the open exhibition of vice; and my friend should know it. He occupies a position before the moral and religious world, that makes it criminal in him not to know it. There is not a house where God is worshiped in the city of New York, or an inmate of that house, a frequenter of that house, that does not know that the trouble with the police commissioners in the city of New York, and the excise commissioners in the city of New York, and the health commissioners in the city of New York, is that they put a little check upon unblushing, barefaced, brazen vice. Here is another grievance that the city of New York has sustained in this immediate connection; a terrible grievance. They did not have the privilege last year, when the hand of God struck so many portions of the country, of having a visitation of the cholera, and it was a terrible grievance. Here is John that ought to have died, Patrick that ought to have died, James that ought to have died, Charles that ought to have died, and the little families gathered and nestling in the tenements of the city, ought to have been killed off; and it was cruel, it was wicked in the Legislature to see that the pestilence was kept from those doors. Oh, my friends, can it be wondered at that there should be weeping and mourning over the wickedness of that Legislature which prevented that most glorious result of self government, to wit. the bringing of cholera to the doors of the chosen population of the city of New York. But, Mr. Chairman, this is taxation without representation! Ah! it is! Well, if it is, we must stop it. It is our duty to stop it. Albany county and Saratoga county join. They have got a large river constituting the dividing line. The public want a bridge from Albany county to Saratoga county. Saratoga sends her two representatives to Albany. Albany sends her four to the capitol. Those six men represent the two districts. The Legislature vote that there shall be an expenditure of money for bridging that river. They appoint commissioners to see the money expended. The money is expended. The counties are taxed for it, and my friend from Albany look over this act, and says, as a statesman and jurist, that here is a terrible piece of work. Here is taxation without representation. Sir, there is no such meaning to the old time honored phrase of dissent against oppression, called "taxation without representation." Take the metropolitan district of the city of New York. The city of New York had twenty-one representatives who sat in the Assembly that passed all these laws. The county of Kings has nine representatives who sat in the Assembly that passed these laws. The county of Richmond has one, and the county of Westchester has one—I mean in the metropolitan police district—making exactly thirty-two; that is, exactly one-quarter of the entire house of Assembly represent the district in which this legislation is to operate. And yet, forsooth, we are told here, and we republicans are asked to give countenance to it, that there is no representation. There was representation in that Assembly; and I say to my friend that I think every member of either house, whether Senate or Assembly, that created these commissions, who thought and acted with him upon the subject of public politics and stayed up his hands during the time that he held the important position as representative of this State in the national Senate, every man of them at all times voted for these measures. And what shall be said of such men? Are all the men living in that district who think as my friend thinks, who have thought as my friend has thought, who have acted in public places as my friend himself acted, are they to be stigmatized as having so acted through the influence of public plunder? I, for one, do not think so of the men with whom I have acted. I do not believe it; I utterly repudiate any such idea. I put it to the men in this Convention who dare to let their minds work in favor of good order; I put it to the men in this Convention who dare to give their influence to protect the quiet, the morals, the order of the citizens of this State; I put it to the men who would protect the wife and children at home from harm, rather than the brawling, drunken father, fighting in the street; I put it to that class of men to know if the time has come in this State when it is oppressive to a people to preserve their lives—if the time has come when it is oppressive to a people to preserve them from the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and the destruction that wasteth at noon-day? A friend of mine in the Convention, whose sympathies, as far as I have ever seen, are always on the right side, and whose heart wells up with the impulses of benevolence and right feeling, said to me to-day, when my friend and colleague from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] was reading the announcement that men representing twenty-two millions of property in the city of Troy—three millions more than is shown upon our tax lists—that men representing twenty-two millions of property in the city of Troy, had expressed their wish that they and their families, and their properties might have the protection of the police system that exists here—my friend said: "Why give so much force to the opinions of rich men; why call on them merely; why not ask the poor of the State how they feel about it?" Now, to that query, if it rises in the minds of any other individual, let me make this answer. The cry is that this system was instituted for the purpose of drawing money out of the tax payers for the benefit of political favorites; and that collection of recommendations was obtained for the purpose of showing that those who paid the taxes in the city were willing to bear their burdens—anxious to bear their burdens if they might have protection for themselves, their property and for those that they loved better than their lives. Now, how do the poor feel about it? What has been the result in this city? I do not go to New York; I do not know what happened in New York about election time; but I will tell you what happened in my own city—in the eighth ward of the city where I live. If a man belonged to one of these classes, above all, if a man of a particular nationality and religious faith ventured to vote differently from his neighbors, his windows were stoned out the very next night after the election, or he himself knocked down in the street the first dark night he was out, and his family were insulted and maltreated wherever they appeared. As gentlemen here have somewhat indulged in instances, let me illustrate it by a single occurrence that happened to myself. On the morning of the election in 1862, Michael Riley, a man who had voted with me every year for ten years, came to me in the morning and said: "Mr. Townsend, I can't vote with you to-day; I will stay at home; I won't go and vote; I believe you are right; but I can't vote with you to-day; there is such a state of feeling to-day that if I go and vote with you they will poison the cows or kill the children." And I tell you, in the sixth ward of New York, that my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] has characterized, and not I, if a man of a particular nationality and a particular faith had voted the republican ticket in the fall of 1862, they would have "poisoned the cows or killed the childer." That is the condition of our laboring men. That is the condition of the poor; and there is not a man of all that class that does not pray God, if he ever prays to his God in any form whatever, that he may be protected from this state of things. But my friend from Albany says that if the people in these cities do not elect men that will protect them, they must suffer the consequences! Now, gentlemen, take that sentence and weigh it. If I happen to live in a ward, or in a town where the temporary majority is controlled by the riotous and the outbreaking, and if the riotous and the outbreaking elect the persons that hold the offices, and the officers are controlled by those men, my friend gravely says that I must bear it. Gentlemen, is that to be the condition of the cities of this State? Take the sixth ward of the city of New York, if this provision shall become constitutional, just as my friend puts it, because I have not said a word about it; suppose, now, in the first place, the sixth ward elects a constable or police officer, and the same district elects a police magistrate. My friend going to the city of New York to attend some of the religious anniversaries in which he takes an interest, is compelled, from the location in which his boarding-house is, to pass through the sixth ward. In full view of the constable elected by the local authorities—by the "sovereigns" whom a friend of mine in this Convention has often talked about—elected by the sovereigns who have not yet lost their sovereignty, in plain sight of that man thus elected, my friend from Albany is knocked down in broad daylight. The man who knocks him down is a constituent of the constable, and he will not arrest him. But my friend happens to recognize the man that assaulted him, and goes before the magistrate elected by this redoubtable neighborhood, and makes his complaint. The complaint is heard, and the accused is discharged, or the accused is discharged without a hearing. Suppose, now, a quiet citizen of the ward approaches my friend and says: "You ought to be protected. We used to be protected here, but you have had a great State Convention, and in that Convention you had a very experienced member. I think he lived up in Albany, and bore the name of Harris. He told the State that if the sixth ward would not elect proper men, we should have to sweat under it. The Convention adopted his views, and you see what a fine time we have of it. We have to sweat under it, and as you have come into the sixth ward, I do not see but what you must sweat under it." What could my friend answer if, under such a state of facts, such a statement was made to him? If there could be any answer to it I would like to hear it, if not now, at any future time.

Mr. COLAHAN—I would like to ask the gentleman what these suppositions and imaginary instances that he is relating have to do with the principles of republicanism and municipal government?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—So far as republicanism is concerned, it is a matter that my friend does not understand. I cannot explain it to him to-night.

Mr. COLAHAN—I am trying to understand it.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—My friend has sinned away his opportunity, and at this late day I shall be hopeless of making him understand it; but if he did, he would certainly fall in with us, unless driven off by believing the doctrines of my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris]. I have told this Convention the state of things in this district that preceded the creation of our capital police. I told the Convention of the burglaries and garrotings in the public streets of my own city. I told them of mobs on occasions other than election occasions, and others on election days. I told them how the lives of the best citizens of this State had been threatened and endangered. Now, let me state to this Convention what is the condition of things produced by the adoption of the capital police system. Crime has not ceased to exist either in Troy or Albany; but the amount of crime coming under public notice during a single year is not one-third now what it was before the establishment of this police. The amount of property lost by fires is not one fifth now what it was before the establishment of this police. The police have either prevented incendiary fires or, as vigilant men walking night and day, have discovered the first indications of the destroying element, and thus prevented their spreading, until the number of fires is now not one in five to what they formerly were. Citizens are no longer garroted in the public streeets. Burglaries of any considerable amount have not occurred for the last three years. Possibly a single thief has crept into a hall in the day-time and sneaked off with an overcoat. A single thief has crept into a house and carried off a small amount of property occasionally in the night; but these large burglaries such as the great Quackenbush store robbery in our own city, are unknown for the last three years. And let me tell my friends in this house who care for good order whether that good order be democratic or republican in its character—let me tell them that when in the silent nights of summer a man walks abroad in the city of Troy there will be no hour, even of the silent watches of the night, when the listening ear will not detect the foot-fall of the vigilant, ever active and faithful policeman. And when we lie down at night, and when we rise up in the morning, we feel that this police surrounds us next to the providence of God. And let me say to you that the feeling with which our lives pass, is a very different thing from what it was at a time when we feared to walk abroad even in the day-time, lest we might be knocked down possibly by a policeman himself, and when we felt that it required two private individuals on active watch to render any locality safe from the political hangers-on and loafers that were yclept police. I ask pardon of my republican friends for the zeal that I have manifested, because I have been talking especially to them. There is not a shot meant to reach over to the other political side of this house. I have been talking to the men that I have stood up shoulder to shoulder with; and who have stood shoulder to shoulder with me. I have been talking to the men who profess to act in the interests of good order, whether that good order be secular or religious, of any faith, of any order, of any denomination. In conclusion I will express the hope that the men in this Convention whom I have stood by in troublous times, now happily gone by, and with whom I have so long acted; men whose hearts have beaten responsive to mine, beat for beat for so many years, will not now leave me and my family and my neighbors and their families, to the chance influences that may temporarily control the populace of the cities in which our lot is cast.

Mr. DUGANNE—I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the first section:

"The Legislature may enact, modify or repeal laws for the government of cities containing more than 30,000 inhabitants, and for the appointment or election of their local officers, and may provide for the assessment and collection of taxes, the audit of claims, and the preservation of public health, order and security in such cities."

Because of the importance I attach to the subject before us, and because I have heard expressed in this Convention, from time to time, certain views and opinions that I believe to be based on false conceptions of the relations that our State, as a State, bears to its own citizens, as well as to the national Union, I propose to occupy a few moments in discussing the amendment which I have had the honor to submit. It is an amendment bearing upon its face an assertion of the supreme authority of the people of the whole State over any part and over all parts of the State; but it does not presume to deny that municipalities ought to be secured in the enjoyment of such charter privileges as may not be opposed to a wholesome jurisdiction of the commonwealth over its parts. Our republican system of checks and balances in government is not more identified with the relations of State and nation, than it is incorporated with the political life of towns and counties within a State. The spirit of representative republicanism, emanating from the people in mass, is to devolve as much power and responsibility upon each subordinate locality as shall be consistent with the entire preservation of equality before the law, in that locality, but at the same time to preserve the supreme authority of the whole people, acting through State and national representation, as the great balance wheel and regulator of that delicate machinery which we call society, and which is based on individual liberty and the greatest good of the whole. In the operation of this system, the State, the city, the town and the village are each clothed with its due share of the supreme power, and is constituted an agency of the central government or authority of the whole nation. But this delegated power, vested in local agencies, is never relinquished by the superior body whence all power in our republic must emanate; and hence, whenever expedient or proper, it can be reassumed by the State or nation, and must be yielded by the subordinate locality. There is no difficulty in my mind regarding the nature of republican society, whether it involve the quality of so-called natural or individual rights, or the power of government to extend, limit or abridge those rights. I confess that I have a very trite, it may be a very commonplace, way of satisfying myself concerning the source of law; for I simply go back—and I say it with reverence—I go back to the Almighty Creator of all law, and recognize in Him the founder of society, the sovereign of government, the owner of this created world, with all its lands and seas, and charters and usufructs, now held in fee by nations, states, and individuals. Content with this retrospect, and this belief, in which, I suppose, all of us share, I see no reason why I should not accept humanity—and by humanity I mean the race of human beings organized in society—as the immediate vicegerency of God on earth—the transmitters of divine authority through nations, tribes, and families of men. What does it matter to me, entertaining this simple belief, whether God's creatures be comprised in a single family with Noah at its head, or in twelve tribes, with Moses for their chief, or in all the human species, with its numberless divisions of nationalities and clans? I accept the original, primal authority, as descending through the race, in its aggregate, because I know that if all whom "God has made of one blood" could be gathered into one vast homogeneous assemblage, in them, at once, or in their representatives, would lie the authority and power of a universal republic. M. Garnier Pages, in the French legislative chamber a few months ago, said "that if sovereigns, ministers, and diplomatists could not come to an understanding to preserve the peace of Europe, the people themselves should appoint international delegates to form a European Confederation; and then," continued the French orator, "what was termed a Utopia would become a happy reality." M. Pages, in uttering this sentiment, suggested, in effect, a simple restoration to the peoples of Europe, as a whole, of those original rights of sovereignty to which they, as a whole, are entitled by the right of their humanity, and from which governments and kings, in all ages, have derived their representative authority and delegated power. The entire race, then, I maintain, becomes, in theory, the sovereign depositary of authority on earth, no matter what varieties of Caucasian, Mongol Caffir, Hottentot, and Esquimaux that race embraces. Unpalatable as this theory may be to modern democracy, I ask its opponents what revelation from heaven—what prescript of nature—can instruct me to set apart a single nationality or a single tribe, as the ruling class over all the remainder of God's creatures? What divine intelligence, or human reasoning, on the other hand, can empower me to cut off and expel from the commonwealth a single division of the species, and say to it: "God ignores you, and therefore I reject you!" The historical and admitted fact that the universal people have never exercised power as a commonwealth, since the days of Adam and the patriarchs, does not invalidate their just claim to such sovereignty, any more than the immemorial fact of despotism, ages ago, could furnish an argument against republicanism in the present age. Proceeding, then, from the undeniable postulate of an original sovereignty vested by God in our whole race, I reach naturally the sequence that each human nationality, by whatsoever name, derives its authority from the universal people, and that the people of each nationality, in their turn, may delegate portions of their derived authority to States, colonies, or other subdivisions of the nation. I reject altogether, as a heresy alike anti-republican and subversive of just relations—the so-called democratic dogma enunciated more than once in this chamber, that individual rights are the basis of government, and that authority flows upward through society from the parts to the whole, from the integer to the mass. Sovereignty, I maintain, is inherent only in society, and must be exercised by society, as a unit, or be delegated by society to its parts or to the representatives of those parts, who represent likewise the whole. "The government of the people, by the people, and for the people," can never belong to an individual, was never derived from an individual, and can never, in a true commonwealth, be yielded to an individual. It is society that makes law, keeps law, gives law. Outside of society no human being exists, except as a vagabond, like Cain. The human monad may have rights and may claim individual sovereignty; but the human monad is not known to law—he has no place in society—he has nothing to do with government. Accept this dogma of individual sovereignty, this derivation of strength from the fragment, the atom, instead of from the concrete mass, and the heresy of State rights or State sovereignty springs logically out of it, and the rebels were correct in maintaining that States are the sources of national authority, yielding or delegating certain rights and powers to the general government and withholding certain other rights as "reserved rights." I regard as a political sophism the entire hypothesis of "reserved rights" claimed to be held by subordinate bodies politic such as States or municipalities. Reserved sovereignty ought to belong alone to the whole nation; and it is an unfortunate and confounding phraseology which, in article 10 of the constitutional amendments of 1789, assumes that powers not delegated to the United States or prohibited to the States "are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." How are you to interpret such a collocation of words—"to the States respectively or to the people?" It cannot be the people of the States respectively or of any single State, which should be understood by the term "or the people." It must be to the people of all the States or the nation that powers not delegated are reserved. How, then, can such powers be reserved to respective States? Sir, I reject this doctrine of "reserved powers" in a single State, by whomsoever it be advocated or admitted, whether it take form in the blatant speeches of a Vallandigham or be more speciously inculcated by a republican editor in his declaration that "if the slave States, the cotton States, or the Gulf States only, choose to form an independent nation, they have a clear moral right to do so." No, sir. The underlying and interpenetrating principle which comprehends the recognition of all human rights—that principle which we understand by human equality—forbids the usurpation of independent action through which any part of the nation may destroy the integrity of the whole. There is a national guaranty of human rights inseparable from a commonwealth or republican society. It is a guaranty not to be abrogated by the people of a slave State, a cotton State, or a Gulf State. It is a guaranty, sir, that the rights of each and every State shall be secured by the power of all the States, and that the rights of each and every individual, whether black or white, poor or rich, shall be secured by the power of the nation. Ignore this national guaranty, and the republic departs from its faith and declines toward despotism or anarchy. Sir, were it possible for all the people of the world to establish a universal republic, the basis of their government would be a union or federation of the nations—its principle the equality of representation enjoyed by each nation, and the equality of the people of all nations before the universal law. It would be, in fact, on a broader scale, the principle of our own Federal Union manifest in the equality of representation enjoyed by each State, and the equality of the people of all the States before the federal law. Descend to our State government, and we find the same principle—an equality of representation enjoyed by every county, township, municipality or other political district, and the equality of the people of all districts before the State law. So, in the very ultimate subdivision of authority, we recognize the same vital republican essence permeating the political life of each village or ward, through the equality of representative manhood enjoyed by every citizen and the equality of all human beings before every law. I reject, then, the abstractions that are called natural rights, as well as the dogmas of State or municipal independence, and accept only the substance of equal and exact justice to all men. Human equality is the guaranty of all guaranties, and the right preservative of all rights. Its principle is the soul of that body which we call a republic; to enshrine and perfect it the commonwealth exists; to guard and perpetuate it representative government has always claimed to exercise its functions. Parts of a nation cannot guarantee this human equality — fragments of a body-politic cannot secure it — independent and conflicting States cannot maintain it intact. It is the sovereign power of a whole people that alone can insure to every human being under it an equal place, in his sphere, and an equal representation with every other human being, before the law that he helps to make and agrees to keep unbroken. But, it may be asked, if the original authority of human beings, in the mass, or a family, be conceded, what becomes of the claim to independence asserted by single nations or tribes—or cities like Palmyra or Carthage—a claim coexistent with the history of human communities? I reply that tribe life, however distinct and independent, was only an offshoot of that universal government primarily exercised under the patriarchal form. If the sons of Shem, of Ham, and of Japhet, wandered from their family tents into tribal independence, they did not the less derive their authority so to do from the patriarchal dispensation or polity. When the sons migrated from the father's pastures they took with them the paternal blessing, and received for themselves a portion of the authority, which, by consent of the whole family, had reposed in the family head, whether his name was Adam, or Noah or Abram. They went forth as colonists from the parent State, and thereafter, however wide might be the migration of a tribe, its members exercised their derived authority, combined with the independence which strength, isolation or remoteness of location might endow them with. The independence of the tribe thenceforth existed—just like the independence of the individual—on conditions inseparable from all independence. So long as the tribal body politic remained distinct and able to control its own members, and strong enough to resist any encroachment by another tribe, just so long it might claim independence; but whenever a more powerful tribe could subjugate it, or a more numerous tribe absorb, it must needs merge its independence in the authority of the enlarged body politic, whether that authority be manifest under despotic or democratic form; whether it claim to rule through Egyptian governors, Levitical priesthoods, Assyrian princes, Persian satraps, or Roman pro-consuls. Hence the claim to tribal or national independence is perfectly compatible with the principle of derived authority, or of sovereignty delegated or assigned by the whole to its parts. The very assertion of independence supposes the cessation or abrogation of some condition precedent of dependency—the emancipation or liberation from some claim to control. And the independence of a tribe or nationality has always been measured, just like its government, customs, laws and franchises, absolutely on the character of its people and their ability to resist the influence or encroachment of other tribes or nationalities; precisely as the independence of an individual, his fortune and his happiness, depend absolutely on his personal character and his ability to resist exterior influences. But is there no individual independence or personal sovereignty? Yes, sir, I am independent in my thought and sovereign over my action in all things pertaining to myself alone. But, if I am a free agent, I am also a responsible one—responsible in all my relations to other individuals. The single man in solitude may be a law unto himself, but once placed in partnership with one or more of his fellows—once become a member of society, he must submit to the laws of society, and renounce his uncontrolled independence and sovereignty of self. So with the smaller community when merged in the larger; so with the State polity comprehended in that of the nation. Inasmuch as the relations of society, of States, of nationalities, demand from the individual a surrender of his personality, the individual must yield, and his sole guaranty, his sole compensation, is equality before the law. There is no danger, sir, that individual rights will ever be invaded, or that State governments can be overthrown in a republic constituted as ours. When a great people have agreed to form a commonwealth, it is really of little moment what political or geographical subdivisions they adopt; since all these subordinations of popular power may be mere conveniences. State burdens and State Constitutions are but instruments of the aggregate sovereignty—the means and appliances of subdivided authority. Never do the whole people abdicate their supremacy; never can they alienate their responsibility, as the nation, to preserve a sovereignty of domain and an integrity of dominion. I have no apprehension that the instinct of State independence will ever fail to assert itself, any more than that the instinct of individual or personal independence—the attribute of manhood—can fail to make itself felt. The instinct of independence is a natural force, and is the balancing force as opposed to the power of aggregate or numerical popular authority. The natural independence of a man, the natural independence of a community, is, in political science, what the centrifugal force is in our solar system as opposed to that centripetal power which governs and regulates all fugitive action. The beautiful checks and balances of a true commonwealth—of our own model republic—correspond, in effect, to those admirable heavenly adjustments which direct the motion of planetary bodies, and compel "Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades" to swing in harmony with the earth and her moon. Absolute authority, without independence, would arrest motion and paralyze system. Entire independence, without authority, would disrupt order and result in chaos. The instinct of individual independence is to fly off—the law of social government is to attract and restrain. Sir, when I liken the republic, with its checks and balances, to the harmony of the spheres, I would that I might conceive of it in likeness to that eternal Providence which reaches down through creation, from the whole to its parts, from the infinite to the atom, from the movement of a universe to the fall of a sparrow. Such a government may not be possible in our fallen estate, but the sad truth that it has never been emulated in our administrations, cannot weaken my faith in it as a model to which we may humbly aspire. I yearn for no Utopias. I contemplate no impossible Atlantis or Arcadia. I am content to accept nationalities as they exist, regarding each, be it large or small, as a political and social microcosm. I only ask that, as each human nationality is a type of the human mass, it may acknowledge its derivation of power from that mass; and that it jealously guard this power and confide it to subdivisions only as a sacred trust from the whole to its parts. So, I believe, we shall best maintain the faith of republicanism, by securing a government wherein the instinct of individualism is qualified and exalted through love of family, of kindred, of country, of race, of humanity; and where all authority, however vested, shall contribute to that perfect political equipoise which we understand by human equality before the law. How, then, in this obvious sovereignty of a whole nationality, like that of our whole American people, can you interpolate the sovereignty of a State or its irresponsible independence, or the independence of a city, however great may be its numerical strength? It is the entire nation, by its delegated power in Congress, which creates States out of territorial communities. It is the entire State which gives name, form, and power to municipalities. On what is based the authority of the United States, to declare the boundaries of new States, or to admit them to the nationality, or to dictate a republican form of government to them? On what, indeed, but the sovereignty of the whole people, which, in a delegated form, resides in Congress? Can a State divide itself into two States, or two States unite their territories, without sanction of the nation, expressed representatively by Congress? It is the sovereignty of the whole, not of parts, which must make valid any agreement to divide or unify the subordinate and delegated authority vested in those parts. Assert the unrestricted domain or dominion of a State, in itself, and you assent to the doctrine of rebellion, of secession, of war against the republic and the Constitution. Acknowledge, on the other hand, the supremacy of all the people of our national commonwealth, and you maintain the equality of every citizen, in every State, to all the rights and immunities enjoyed by every other citizen in every other State. Recognize the responsibility of all the people of our Union to secure republican government to the people of each State, and you, at the same time, affirm the responsibility of all the people of a State to secure republican government and social order to every county, city, town and village of the State. It is for the common weal that all government, whether supreme or subordinate, exists. It is for the public good that Constitutions, laws, charters, and every instrumentality of authority are framed in a republic. And because this whole public good is the supreme good, all authority and instrumentalities for conserving that public good must come down from the sovereign whole and be distributed through the subordinate parts. Constitutions and charters are merely documentary evidence of delegated power. They cannot alienate the responsibility of the people, they cannot abrogate the supremacy of the whole over its parts. Nominations, ballots, majorities, elections, are but the cogs and wheels of such political machinery—the simpler the better—as is necessary to the service of the res publica—the commonwealth. Despotisms, and autocracies, and oligarchies, and aristocracies, have circumscribed the limits of the common weal, but even these have made pretense of representing it. No tyrant, unless he were also a lunatic, like Nero, or a madman, like Russian Paul, could place himself above and beyond all responsibility to rule for the class which he represented. Conquerors, like Alexander and Tamerlane, have assumed to represent their soldiers, Cæsars their empires, the Egyptian his priesthoods, the Mongol his tribes, the Brahmin his caste, the aristocrat his order, the monarch of Europe his "grace of God," held, as he asserted for the good of his people. But what is this divine right of monarchs but a recognition of authority delegated by God through men? The princes who claimed to rule by the grace of God were right in their claim, but no more than the Cæsar who claimed to be Pontifex Maximus was right in his. The arrogant and blasphemous mistake that both kings and Cæsars make is, that they claim a direct vicegerency from the Eternal Sovereign, and deny that the people stand between them and the Deity. Rebellions, conspiracies, revolutions, civil wars, have, in all ages, protested against the arrogance of kingcraft; and the republic, wherever it exists, is the reclamation of popular sovereignty from the hands of its despoilers. I was pleased to hear, during a former debate, the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Brooks], express his desire to pay proper respect to ancestral wisdom. I was glad to hear his quotation from Burke, that "to innovate is not always to reform." Sir, I will retrace the beaten ways of ancestry as far as he desires; I invite him to go back, if he will, to ages anterior to all innovations, and to witness, with me, the principle of human freedom and equality, asserted and made practical in the simple government of rude but robust tribes, in all ages and countries. I will show him that the earliest innovations were made by the spoilers and invaders of human equality; that the usurping forces of war and tyranny were the first real innovations upon the peaceful repose of patriarchal countries, or the democratic independence of tribal life, and that such innovations, whether incarnated by a Nimrod or a Saul, a Cecrops or a Romulus, have always encroached upon, always assailed, the natural equality which God ordained for his intelligent creatures. Talk to me of innovations, sir, and remind me of ancestral wisdom. I go back to the independent health of an aboriginal tribe, before the disease of kingcraft or classcraft has smitten it; I go back to a pastoral democracy, unimbruited by war, undemoralized by land owning, and I find the unwritten law of human equality recognized and obeyed. I seek for that law of human equality under a despotism and find it not. Despotism has innovated it out of existence. I explore an oligarchy for this law—it is not to be found. I look for the principle of human equality in an aristocracy—it is trampled under foot. I demand it of the pagan in his temple, of the heathen in his sacred grove. I demand it of modern democracy, which would create a pariah class in this representative republic—a class identified by the hue of its skin, and branded by the law of its native land as alien to equality, and unworthy of representation. Sir, I cannot discover the law of equality recognized by any of these innovating powers and forces. They ignore, they disdain, the kinship of humanity, they deny and contemn the oneness of manhood in God's image. Where, O disciple of Burke! shall I escape the innovating principle of despotism? Where shall I seek for the reclamation of human equality if I find it not in an enlightened civilization? Where shall I demand the recognition of manhood under God unless I claim it in a gospel-reading, Christian commonwealth? I ask, then, two essentials of republican society—first, the sovereignty of the whole people or republican unity delegated downward through whatever forms may be convenient; and, secondly, the equality of all persons and all classes of persons before the republican law. Do the representatives of democracy on this floor confront me with their dogmas of inferiority in this race or that? Does the learned gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] assert that the Caffir, the Hottentot, the Ashantee, the Japanese, the pink-eyed Albino, the almond-eyed Chinaman, the stunted Esquimaux, the squalid Digger Indian, the blue-spotted Pinto, are all, more or less, inferior to Celt and Saxon in the scale of humanity, and therefore unfit to participate in the primary duties of citizenship? I answer, that all these representatives of races and families are souls in the sight of God, and men in the eye of law—portions of that great composite manhood to whose original types the Creator delegated authority on earth, placing every race and tribe, each with its nearest kin, to assimilate with that kin on the soil and under the sun of its nativity. If there has been any invasion or violation of the laws of race and soil, whereby Hottentots, Ashantees or Mongols appear to be displaced and transplanted, it is not God's innovation, but man's, which has accomplished the result. It is not the inferior human being who has infracted any law of nature which might seem to fix him on his native soil and under his native sun. It is we, who claim superiority of civilized and Christian development, who have plucked up the African or Asiatic plant and made it an exotic on the soil of America. Be these strangers within our gates inferior or not, the lot of their manhood is cast with us, and we must accept it and make the best of it. It is we, who arrogate superior extraction, who become responsible when we press onward the march of emigration, absorbing the birth-places of Indians and Esquimaux. The presence of the African on our soil is not his choice. Our presence on this continent is not the choice of its aboriginal remnant. The lot of our national manhood is cast with these races, I trust for wise and good purposes. Be, for good or ill, however, equality of manhood cannot be denied to them. I assert this, sir, as a republican—not merely in the party sense, but in the broadest meaning of the term. Republicanism is the government of the people for the common weal, for equality before the law. Democracy may be the government of the people for oppression of minorities and individuals. A democrat may be a despot, and opposed to equality before the law. A republican must be an advocate of equality before the law. Democracy may rule by a mob and by force. Republicans can only rule by representation and balances. Democracy may have its Helots and its chattel slaves. Republican government must be "of the people, by the people, and for the people," or it is no longer republican government. Hence, sir, I claim to be a republican; for while, as an integer of the nation, I acknowledge my subordination to the economy of the whole, I also assert the obligation of my nation to obey those radical human laws which existed anterior to nationalities, and which represent the goodness as they do the majesty of God. "Homo sum! humani nihil a me alienum puto!" I love my commonwealth, the noble State of New York. I revere our national republic—the limit of political sovereignty over me as a citizen. But I listen always to the universal heart-beat of my species, admonishing me to respect the manhood of all men and the consanguinity of all nations. Deriving sovereign authority from the universal people down through nationalities and their subdivisions, I come now to consider the assumed rights and privileges of cities. Nurtured with and outcropping from the heresy of reserved State rights, is the modern dogma of municipal sovereignty, which finds champions in this chamber, a dogma never met with in any national theory of government, ancient or modern. In the days of Enoch, the city builder, a town or city may, for aught I know, have claimed and exercised the authority of an imperial state. It is probable that such cities as Babylon or Tyre and Carthage, the mothers of colonies, were each a great center and source of government, and that Rome, in the plenitude of her power, as a city, claimed civic sovereignty, and regarded all communities and districts beyond her walls as mere provinces that could only be approximated to her, in a degree, by receipt from the Roman Senate of the name and franchises of municipium. So, likewise, Athens and the other Greek States, as well as the later municipal republics of Italy, were each a city, with outlying and dependent villages. But in no ancient or mediæval nationalities have cities ever been more than the capitals or centers of provinces. During the feudal ages they were sometimes the seats of episcopal dioceses, sometimes the appanages of royalty. Municipal strength grew up out of the efforts made by members of populous neighborhoods to defend themselves against the aggressions of predatory barons, by surrounding their dwellings with walls, and organizing armed forces to guard them. Afterward, during the struggles which arose between monarchs and their powerful vassals, the nobility, the former sought to enlist the devotion of citizens by conferring on their towns certain chartered privileges, held on the condition of service to the crown, and liable to be reclaimed at the pleasure of the sovereign. In no case did cities ever assert municipal independence, unless they claimed to be sovereign States, in addition to their municipal character; like the Republics of Italy or the free cities of Germany. Never, while acknowledging itself to be an integral part of a nationality, did any city presume—under any charter whatever—to dispute the original and ultimate sovereignty of the national power which chartered it. Never has the municipal status constituted, per se, a right of sovereignty or independence. What, then, is the province, what is the duty of the people of this commonwealth, the State of New York—occupying her place in the Federal Union? It is to represent, within her limits, the sovereign power of the nation; and as the national authority guarantees to her and to every State a republican form of government, so must she guarantee to every municipality and township, and to every citizen within her borders, a full equality before the law, and all charters, rights, and immunities necessary to that equality. It is the res publica, the common things of the people, which the State authority must defend and protect. It is the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that must be guaranteed to every human being in the State. And as the national authority is bound to interpose whenever a republican form of government may be jeopardized in any State, so, likewise, is the State authority bound to interfere whenever the rights of citizens may be threatened under any form or operation of local government in any town or city. Show me a State of the Union where a majority may oppress a minority, where class distinctions shall be set up, where the republican form of government shall be abrogated or invaded, and I will show you the occasion for interposing the national and constitutional power, in order to conserve the republican form of a State. Show me, in like manner, a municipality where, through the schemes of demagogues, or corruptions in office, the equality of individuals before the law is overborne, the people oppressed by taxes, the public health endangered, the public security infringed, the public decency outraged, the public peace threatened, or the public morals contaminated, and I will show you the occasion where State or commonwealth authority is bound to interpose, and is necessitated to guarantee relief and reform to a suffering population. It is here that the jura publica surmounts all municipal rights or claims. It is here that the State resumes its full sovereignty, and reclaims whatever subordinate power it may have delegated by charter or law. It is here that the commonwealth re-enters upon original jurisdiction, and may redelegate the local government to officers of its own selection, charged with the duty of reforming abuses and redressing wrongs. This right of governmental re-entry is not to be disputed. It is a right inherent in the republican polity—a right never alienated except by expressed constitutional provision. It is, in effect, the sovereignty of the commonwealth over all its parts, for the good of each part and of the whole. What, indeed, is the pardoning power of the Executive, but a re-entry of the public sovereignty, through which the verdicts of juries and the judgments of courts are annulled and made void by the "higher law" of the people? What is the reading of the riot act, in case of civil disorder, but the announcement of an arbitrary authority resident in the whole body politic, and operative over the liberty and even the life of any member of that body politic who shall refuse to obey its mandates? What is the posse comitatus but a standing popular force, to be used in the name of the commonwealth, against every individual who shall oppose it? I ask, then, simply for a constitutional assertion of the right to re-entry by the people of this great State upon their original jurisdiction over whatever portion of the State is abandoned of official virtue, and abused by local misrule. I ask that the State proclaim her sovereignty over any municipality which may persist in denying good government to its citizens. I ask that power shall be constitutionally vested in your Legislature, by which it may, in spite of cavil or injunction, supervise the public good—that hands shall be bestowed upon it, by which it may stretch out the power of the people and reach whatever local abuse and whatever local wrong shall persist in aggrieving and injuring any local body politic. I ask that our legislators shall possess the means of access and influence upon local abuses, and thereafter be held responsible for their correction, to the people whose representatives they are. Do I ask more than a republican commonwealth ought to grant? Do I ask what is not needed? Do I ask before alarming evils cry out for a prompt and permanent remedy? I leave it for the Convention to decide. But, sir, in demanding a constitutional declaration of the paramount authority of the State, I deny no municipal privilege and oppose no legitimate charter or franchise. Our municipal system, founded as it is on the noble corner-stone of the old Saxon commonwealth, identified as it is by the checks and balances of true republicanism—cannot be bettered by modern theory. I cling to the American structure of village, of town, of county, of city, with their courts and councils, as to a perfected form of the ancient tithings, and hundreds and shires, with their juries, their gavel-kind, and their gemotes. I would not abate one jot of the delegated power wisely intrusted by the commonwealth to its smaller divisions, whether they be villages, towns, counties or cities. Nay, sir, I would confide much more local authority to counties and to towns, and relieve the State at large of over government. But I would provide that, howsoever we delegate and disperse the power of the whole people, it can at any time be reclaimed by the State, if abused or disputed by its local wielders in town, city or county. Hence, while I am content to clothe the municipium with all the State authority—granting it, in effect, by power of attorney—I desire to retain in the whole people a sovereign and summary right to revoke that power of attorney whenever it shall be used against the public good instead of for it. Mr. Chairman, it is from those who ask a constitutional grant of complete independence for the city of New York—an independence which for twenty years shall place her local authorities above the Legislature of the State—it is from these champions of municipal sovereignty that I demand satisfactory proof that the voting population of our great metropolis can be safely intrusted with self-government. I demand a guaranty, sir, that the commonwealth shall take no hurt by such a grant of permanent sovereignty, and that the equality of all citizens before the law shall not be jeopardized by it. Are the opponents of State jurisdiction, and the claimants of municipal independence prepared to give such guaranty? The past of New York city admonishes me to the contrary. Her future I will trust only as I trust a strong and mettled steed, whose beauty is my boast and whose strength I exult in, but who bears me best and most safely with my curb, however gentle, in the mouth, and my grasp, however light, upon the silken bridle.

The question was put on the substitute offered by Mr. Duganne, for the first section, and it was declared lost.

Mr. LANDON—I move to amend, and insert after the word "cities," in the first line, the words "whose population exceeds or shall exceed fifty thousand." It does not seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that this system is at all applicable to our small cities. I speak, however, only of the little city in which I live, and I think I speak the sentiments of the people of that city when I say that they much prefer the present system of government to the system which is proposed in this article. The present system, sir, is flexible, and we can come to the Legislature and get such amendments as experience suggests or necessity requires; and I can see no principle upon which this rule proposed here is to be made applicable to the small cities. Those cities differ only in name from large villages. They need no hard, iron rule by which they shall be governed, and I think they ought to be permitted in the future as they have been permitted in the past, to regulate their own domestic matters in such way as the Legislature may allow them to do.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Landon, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Morris, to strike out all of the section after the word "office" in the ninth line.

Mr. ALVORD—As one of the Committee on Cities who have reported this article for the consideration of the Convention, and I beg leave at this time to take advantage of the privilege which I stated in acceding to the report, that I should take the liberty to except to certain portions of it. This is one of those portions. I am not in favor of restricting the mayor of any city to one term of office. I believe that if you get a good officer of that kind, one who performs his duties faithfully and acceptably to the people, he ought to be re-elected if the people desire.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The report which has been under consideration during the day, has received so many blows from its opponents that I ventured to hope it would not receive any from the members of the Committee on Cities, who concurred generally in the provisions of the report. Sir, the discussion which has taken place this morning and evening, reminds me of a good fruit tree which in the course of the season gets so stoned and thumped and beaten by the boys in pursuit of its fruit, that long before the fruit comes to maturity it is robbed of all that is palatable. This report has been assailed upon the right hand and upon the left, and now, before I take my seat, I wish to say a few words in its favor. The question was put to me privately, by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] this morning, whether I was not one of those gentlemen who in the Senate of this State voted for the police bill which passed in 1857, and I said to him very frankly that I was, and he, as promptly as the opportunity presented itself, communicated the fact to the Convention. Sir, it is very immaterial how I voted then, and perhaps it is quite as immaterial how I shall vote now. I do not belong to that class of persons, politicians or citizens, who live for ten or twelve years in the world without seeking some opportunity of doing better in the present than in the past, nor to that class who are not willing to learn something in the school of experience; in a word, sir, I am not one of the school of the Bourbons who never learn any thing and who never forget any thing.

"Old politicians chew on wisdom past And totter on in blunders to the last."

I trust, sir, that I shall never be numbered among such a class as this. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did take a very active part in favor of the police bill which passed the Legislature in 1857. At that time I represented one of the largest senatorial districts of the State and of the city of New York, numbering, even then, nearly 300,000 people, and composing nearly three congressional districts. I was asked by a majority, as I thought, of my constituents, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, and at that time satisfactory to me, to favor the bill which was then introduced, and I did so; presenting at one time a memorial signed, as represented, by at least 12,000 people, a memorial so cumbersome that it literally enveloped the desk of the presiding officer, and almost hid him from public view. At that time there was very great excitement in the city of New York, in reference to the manner in which the city government was administered, and one of the largest meetings which I have ever known was held at the Broadway Tabernacle, where there was a petition signed by citizens almost irrespective of party, for a change in the administration in the city government, and in conformity with what I believed to be the wishes of my constituents, and the wishes of if not a majority, an approximation to it, of the people of the city at large, I took an active part in advocating the passage of that police bill which has been alluded to here by my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. Under like circumstances I should do the same thing again. Whenever I can have presented to me what is a better state of things than that which exists, or what promises to be such, then sir, trying always to be practical in my action, I will do what seems to me likely to accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number of the people. In that spirit I voted for the police bill. In the same spirit, after ten years observation of its operation under its various ramifications and amendments by the Legislature from that time to the present, I shall vote for the report introduced by my honorable friend from Albany [Mr. Harris]; and, as a citizen from the sea-board, I ask permission here to thank him for the very able, masterly and exhaustive argument with which he presented the subject to the Convention to-day. I desire, now, sir, as far as I am able, in the few moments of time which I mean to occupy, to strip the assaults made upon this report of all extraneous matter and to come directly to the issue presented by the report. The gentleman from Troy, who first spoke [Mr. Francis], endeavored, as I think, to excite the prejudices of the Convention against the report of the majority of the committee, by alluding to what he was pleased to say was the marked absence of those physical conflicts between persons, which formerly occurred in the metropolitan district, of which the city of New York is a part. He says that there are no pugilistic fights there now, and and that there had been none since the metropolitan police bill was made a law. Sir, I think my friend is mistaken in his facts. I think, indeed I know, there have been pugilistic encounters in that district since that bill became a law. But, supposing that he is entirely right in his conclusions, and that there is an absence of those conflicts between man and man, prize fighting, if you please, and all other similar encounters which are offensive to most gentlemen, what does it prove? Simply, sir, that these persons pass beyond the confines of the district, and go to those portions of the State where the State itself has more supreme control than it has in the metropolitan district. Now, this is a fact, and it is the only conclusion to be drawn from the argument of the gentleman. It was stated here over and over again, by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis], that before this metropolitan police bill became the law of this capital district, a large number of burglaries were committed from time to time, and that there has been a decrease in the number of such crimes since that time. Well, sir, all that may be true. I am not here prepared to dispute its truth in regard to the capital district, for I know very little about the administration of authority here; but I do say, for the metropolitan district, in which I live, that there are as many crimes committed to-day, and I make an allowance for the increase of population, as were ever committed before the police bill became a law; and no gentleman who is cognizant of the crimes committed in that city from day to day will doubt the truth of the assertion. I will add, sir, and I am very sorry to have to add, that in my judgment the demoralization of the people never before in the history of our government, reached a point equal to that which it has reached during the two or three years past, and this remark applies as well to the rural districts as to the city of New York, or the counties of Kings, Queens, Westchester, and Richmond, which are embraced in the metropolitan district. Sir, I object to the appeals which have been made against this proposed measure—appeals to men's passions and not to their judgments, such, for example, as bringing up various isolated cases of crimes in the city of Troy and elsewhere. I do not believe, sir, that such arguments become a subject of so much magnitude and importance as the one under consideration, allusions, for example, to garroters, to pugilists, and highway robberies, in order to prejudice and direct our action here. It was said, also, sir, by the gentleman from Troy [Mr. M. I. Townsend], in order to excite the feelings and prejudices of members of this Convention against the city of New York, and against the chairman of the Committee on Cities, that at the commencement of the war, the then mayor of the city, Mr. Wood, was guilty of attempting to convey certain amounts of army goods then on board ship in the harbor of New York, to the State of Georgia; these goods, he might have added, having been purchased and paid for before the beginning of the war. Well, sir, I believe what he stated of the fact is substantially true; and if the case were left just there it might perhaps tell effectively against the proper administration of justice in the city of New York, considering that we were then upon the eve of a civil war, but in his party zeal the gentleman forgot to carry the matter to its conclusion. He forgot to say that under the administration of a governor of this State [Governor Morgan] that was done which Fernando Wood, the then mayor of the city of New York, was not permitted to do. The goods referred to were sent to the State of Georgia; so that under the republican authority of the State, which was appealed to upon the occasion, the very offense was committed which the gentleman is pleased to charge upon the mayor of the city of New York. This, sir, is my recollection of the transaction, and I think I am not mistaken. And now let me say, with more justice to the Governor of the State than the gentleman displayed toward the mayor of the city, that at that same time there were vessels laden with cargoes of cotton bound to New York, held at the port of Savannah, and that Governor Brown of Georgia, and Governor Morgan of New York, compromised the difficulty by acquiescence, or by correspondence, I forget which, by allowing the vessels to pass each way to their respective destinations. Sir, I believe that is about the history of this transaction, and as it is always important to get at the truth, it is well to carry facts to all their conclusions, instead of leaving the facts half stated. The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has also said, in this Convention—and I consider it a very harsh, if not a very unparliamentary remark—that "of necessity, democrats could not vote their convictions." Sir, what right had the gentleman to say this? (and I regret very much his absence upon the present occasion.) What right had he to say of any member of this Convention that he could not vote his convictions? Why not vote according to our convictions as well as the gentleman according to his? Who gave him authority to speak for any other member of this Convention in the discharge of a solemn duty, assumed under the Constitution of the State, and under the law by which we are convened here to-night? For one, I intend to vote my convictions in voting for the report under consideration, and I give to all other members the expression of my sincere belief that they, too, will vote their convictions, whether they vote for or against the report, or for or against any provision in it. Now, sir, in regard to some of the more important provisions of the report, and the discussion upon it which has transpired here to-day, I do not think that gentlemen have treated the report with fairness. It was stated by the first gentleman who spoke against it that we were proposing to make the mayor of the city of New York a king, as it were; to clothe him with royal power, and to give him, in that city, all the authority which is exercised by the king upon his throne. Sir, we do no such thing. We clothe the mayor with precisely the power which this report clothes him in. We make provision that he shall be elected by the people of the city. We say that the great money power of the metropolis shall be in other hands than those of the mayor. We make provision for the election of the higher branch of the local Legislature, upon a general ticket, by the people at large, and we make provision, also, for the election of the board of assistant aldermen by the people of the respective wards. What resemblance is there between the powers conferred by an article like this, and the authority exercised by a king? What resemblance is there between those powers, to even the authority exercised by the Governor of the State? All that this article does, all that it contemplates, is to give to the mayor of the city of New York and the mayors of other cities, powers under its provisions which shall continue for three years; and in order that the mayor may not use his authority during his first three years to secure his re-election, he is made ineligible for a second term. It was also said by the gentleman from Troy that it was professed to make the cities of New York and Brooklyn independent of the State, and in order to excite still further the prejudices of the Convention against this report he went on to say that we proposed to carry our local governments back to those dark days of the middle ages, far back even almost to the time of the feudal systems. And he made reference to the free cities of Germany. Sir, it is true that about six hundred years ago there was a combination of German cities, some eighty or eighty-five in number, leagued together mainly for commercial purposes and to carry on commerce with those islands in the Baltic and with the commercial towns and countries in more distant lands—it is true, I say, sir, that for commercial purposes these cities did form leagues and combinations with one another. But, sir, there is no more resemblance between the local governments of these Hanseatic towns and the government of the city of New York and other cities in the State, as proposed to be regulated by the article before us, than there is between light and darkness. Take the city of Hamburg, or the city of Lubec or of Bremen for examples. The city of Hamburg is one of the most enlightened of the three. It is a free city, with a free flag and an almost independent government, and one of its laws is that no Jew (and there are ten thousand of them in that city) shall hold office or even be regarded as a citizen. They can pay taxes, but nothing more. The same is true of the city of Bremen. I say, therefore, that it is unjust to attempt to excite prejudices against an article like this by making such comparisons. Why, in some of these cities strangers cannot even hold real property or follow any civil profession. We have, thank Heaven, no such restrictions in this State or in the United States. Now, sir, I did not like to hear my friend who introduced this report to the committee [Mr. Harris] make the allusions he did to the city of New York. I have no doubt that a great majority of the members of this Convention look upon the city of New York as a sort of pandemonium. The very illustration used by my friend from Troy, made here to-night, that the chairman of the committee, perchance, could hardly go along the streets of New York to attend some religious anniversary without being knocked down by persons holding political or official relations with some one in authority, shows to what strange and extreme means gentlemen from other parts of the State will sometimes resort in order to excite prejudice against the city. My friend spoke of the city of New York as a "lower deep." Sir, that city is undeserving of any such abuse, and inasmuch as gentlemen upon one side have seen fit to draw these dark and dismal pictures of the city of New York, let me, in a few brief sentences, show the Convention another picture of city life and manners, and one which presents it in an aspect in which, as gentlemen know, I have taken considerable interest. Sir, I will put the light of the city against all their darkness, and, subtracting the one from the other, I am ready, after stating the result, to appeal even to the prejudices of gentlemen in this Convention to acknowledge at least that a great many good things can come out of Nazareth. The institutions for public charities in the city of New York alone (I mean public charities supported by the city, and for which the State contributes nothing) number some twenty-seven, and during the last year they relieved 81,592 people, besides 38,928 of the "out-door" poor, at an expenditure for this alone of $983,845.74. Sir, this is one of the items of local expenditure which contributed to the twenty-two millions to which allusion has been made. Before I take my seat I will demonstrate to this Convention that of the twenty-two millions and upward of expenditure in that city, a very large sum is the product of this police bill and of the other commissions that have been created by the Legislature of the State. But passing from public to private charities, let me also mention a single society in the city of New York, the society for the improvement of the condition of the poor, which in twenty-three years has relieved 58,579 people, at an expense of $958,271; of which not a dollar was contributed by the city or the State. There are also in the city of New York some fifteen hospitals, and there is one in course of erection which will cost nearly a million and a half of dollars. Another is soon to be erected from the noble generosity of the late Mr. Roosevelt of that city, which, though it may not cost so much money, will be one of the grandest institutions in the Empire State, or in the country. There are also some eleven dispensaries for giving medical attendance to the sick poor, and the oldest of these dispensaries, during the past seventy-seven years, has aided 1,311,000 people; often 39,000 or 40,000 a year, and all the fruit of private contributions. There are also in the city of New York eight orphan and half orphan asylums, where shelter, comfort and instruction are provided for the poor. There are twelve industrial mission schools; there are forty benevolent societies; there are one hundred and twelve organizations for the circulation of religious information; there are fifty organizations of masons and sons of temperance, secret but benevolent in their character; there are fifty trades associations for benevolent purposes; special endowments were made in one year to the extent of $2,500,000, while the private benevolences in this much abused city have amounted to more than a million and a half of dollars. In 1834 there were but twenty-five of these private charities in the city. In 1867 they numbered three hundred. Sir, I put these plain facts against all the assaults which have been made here upon the city of New York, and which are reiterated so currently and so commonly that I am not surprised that they find such general credence among the people of the State beyond the city. Now, Mr. Chairman, in reply to some questions that have been put here, I may ask what virtue is there in a local commission over properly constituted city authorities, as provided for by this article—over, for example, such a mayor as the present mayor of New York, who has been recently re-elected by the people against combinations of his own party, and in spite of the united opposition of the large and powerful party opposed to him in that city? Why may not a commission be just as partisan as a mayor? Why, sir, they are, certainly, with exceptions, but these exceptions are as numerous upon the one side as upon the other. The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has had to conceal as best he might, the fact that the police commission in the city of New York to-day is controlled by commissioners not at all in sympathy with the people of that city. He has said that prospectively this commission may be politically equal. Sir, why should it ever have been otherwise than equal, if there was a disposition to fairness on the part of the appointing power, or upon the part of those controlling the commission? Now, sir, upon another subject. We all know the political character of the city of New York. It was very well perhaps in a personal view to conceal the fact that the commissions complained of are not of the same character as the people of the city. But I maintain, that the majority of the police commission in the city of New York, and the gentlemen who are at the head of it are in the largest sense party men. I mean to say in direct terms, and to defy contradiction in what I say, that when two men present themselves as candidates for appointment to the position of patrolmen, one a republican and the other a democrat, in a majority of cases, notwithstanding the immense democratic majority in the city of New York, patrolmen are selected from those not in sympathy with the people of the city. Such, at least, is my information. We have one commission, I believe, created by the mayor and common council. To show its practical results (and I mean the commission of the Croton aqueduct board) I will say here that it is as well administered as any commission created by the State government. This is one of the few things in the administration of the affairs of the city of New York from which the people have received a large interest on the original expense of the work done, and amounting to between nine and ten millions of dollars, for this great public improvement. I do not know why all commissions cannot be like this one, and I do not think any gentleman has any reason to affirm that if a commission should be created by the mayor of the city of New York and the common council, or by the former alone, it would not be of the same character as the one in charge of the Croton aqueduct. It is said, and no doubt truly, that the police system before 1857 was greatly abused. Well, sir, the abuse of a thing is no argument against the use of it. As it was, it was capable of the same remedial improvements that we have seen in regard to the present police system. Now, sir, what has the Legislature done in the past, (I certainly shall speak with all respect for the Legislature) in reference to the administration of authority in the city of New York? It has, as was said by the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] increased our local expenses from eight millions to over twenty-two millions of dollars, which is an increase altogether out of proportion to the increase of population. The temptation for an increase of expenditures, when there is a divided authority, is so obvious, that no gentleman, it seems to me, can deny the evil effects of so much divided power. I wish to add, in this connection, and I appeal to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] and to the other side, if what I say is not true, that there is not a county in this State from which would not come the most solemn protest against the same interference by the State in its affairs by the Legislature, as the Legislature has from time to time made in the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn. Every man must feel this, and if a like thing were attempted in either branch of the Legislature, one loud, solemn, earnest protest would come up to the Legislature against any such action affecting the country districts of the State. Well, sir, the city of New York has to bear its proportion of all the expenses of the State. In the year 1867 you required of it a direct tax for the Champlain canal, and a direct tax, also, for the extension of the Chenango canal, and a third direct tax for canals generally. You took from the treasury of New York the sum of four hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the support of the common schools of the State beyond the city boundaries; and yet when it becomes a matter of political government (I will not allude to what may be the motives for this action, but I state the fact), when it becomes a matter of authority for the administration of justice, with the power of equal justice in some hands, in this abused city, you feel at liberty to appeal to the Legislature of the State, in order that you may control the entire administration of its local affairs. Under this rigid law you have made some nine or ten commissions for that city. But, says one, a gentleman from New York, these commissioners, these Central Park commissioners, for example, and the commissioners of emigration, for another example, do not receive any compensation for their services. So much the worse for them, and perhaps so much the worse for the State. The commissioners of emigration for the last twenty years have received as head money for the emigrants who have arrived at the port of New York, the sum of five millions of dollars, and all the patronage incidental to that immense sum is a great deal more than any salary which you could bestow upon the men holding the office. They all have a large local patronage; they all have great power and yet they are born of the State and not the locality where they exist. You also direct a taxation on the local trade, in the form of auction duties, and it has amounted in times past to the sum of seven or eight million dollars in the city of New York. I do not intend to enter into any argument whether it is a State tax proper, or whether it is a local tax. All I mean to say is that it is a tax imposed upon that locality, and that the effect of it is in a measure to diminish the trade of the city. I will add, however, that when the auction duty tax was imposed upon the business of the city of New York, the intention and the declaration of the State was that when the Erie canal was completed—I mean in its smaller proportions—that that tax was to cease. Well, sir, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], I contend that taxation without representation, in a republican government, is entirely at war with the principles of the government. Sir, to what end do you read in the Constitution of this State, "We, the people of the State of New York." This is the corner stone of the government under which we live. To what end did the fathers put into the preamble of the Federal Constitution these words: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, promote the general welfare, and provide for the common defense, do ordain and establish this Constitution?" Why, sir, every man feels and knows, who either lives under a republican government or has an innate sense of what a republican government is, that the supreme source of all political power is in the people. The people of the federal government act, as prescribed by the Constitution, for federal purpose; the people of the State, through like agencies, for State purposes, and the people of municipalities for municipal purposes. Sir, the distinction which has been drawn here—the wire drawn distinction—between the absence of the power of the people in the exercise of authority because they happen to live in one locality and not another, seems to me, with all respect to the gentleman who advanced the opposite argument, perfectly absurd. Again, sir, the people of Kings county and the people of the city of New York hold relations to the State authorities not to be disturbed by any such article as the one now under consideration. They have State relations for State purposes; they perform State duties, and federal duties. And then, what is left, relates to towns, counties, cities, and municipalities. They administer, or should administer, their own institutions, and are responsible to the powers that elect them for the manner in which their duties are discharged. Now, sir, I wish to say a few words—and I mean to talk plainly upon this subject—in regard to what has been said as to mob governments, and the allusion made over and over and over again in this Convention, from June last, about the "mob government" in the city of New York. As a gentleman doing business in the city of New York, and a resident there for thirty years, I feel pained, as every other citizen of the city must, a deep mortification at every excess and crime which may be committed in the community where I live. I do not wish to disguise any thing. Neither, sir, am I to sit quietly by and hear gentlemen make the remarks they do from time to time in regard to the excesses that exist, without entering my solemn protest against it. New York is not peculiar in regard to occasional excesses, such as have been alluded to here—such as, if you please, disgraced the metropolis of our State during the memorable three days of July, 1863. But, upon the authority of a gentleman in official place who was present when that mob commenced, I declare from him and for him, as an observer of what transpired, that there was not a visible member of the police guard of the city within sight or sound of the voices of those who commenced that riot in July, 1863. I have said once, and I will repeat it now, that one-third of the police of New York were cognizant—must have been cognizant—of what was to transpire; the knowledge which was brought home to every man's heart and house on Saturday and Sunday previous to the riot of Monday and with a proper organization of police at the various head-quarters where the draft was to begin, that bloody riot might have been prevented, the lives saved which were lost, and the million and a half of dollars saved which it has cost the city of New York to pay for the excesses of those three days of riot and of blood. Paint the picture as dark as you please, the repeated assertion that the city of New York is a commonwealth where negroes were taken to the lamp posts and hung, as if such was the practice of the city; paint it in all the colors you may, and yet, Mr. Chairman, there have been other excesses committed in other parts of the State and all over the Union almost equal to the riot in the city of New York, and without some of its provocations. Mr. Chairman, you remember, perhaps, the famous riot in the city of Philadelphia—the city of brotherly love, so called—which lasted for ten days, during six of which, up Chestnut and down Market street, through all the high ways and by-ways of that large city, the mob was the supreme master of the place, and there was no authority there efficient enough until the expiration of that time, and until the mob had literally exhausted itself, no power to arrest its mastery and control of the city. Sir, perhaps you will remember a mob in the city of Syracuse, in the State of New York also—I mean the Jerry rescue mob, where an attempt was made to overthrow the law of the federal government, and even the sovereign law of the State. And, sir, I have heard gentlemen in excited public assemblies, yet not as excited as my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], defend that transaction. I have even heard a defense made of it in the Senate of the United States and in the other branch of Congress. Sir, I remember two great mobs in the literary Athens of America—the city of Boston—where William Lloyd Garrison had to go to jail to save himself from the violent attacks of an excited and irritated people of that city, albeit without cause for irritation or excitement. And I remember the Burns mob in the city of Boston, where it became necessary to call out the military of the general government, and when Burns was borne off to the vessel which took him to the city of Savannah between armed men, artilery and infantry going down from Court street, through State street, and thence sent to Georgia. Why, sir, mobs have been more common in other cities of the Union than they have been in the city of New York—far more common—let me add—and I will add further, Mr. Chairman, that with a residence in the city of New York of thirty years and more there is not a commonwealth anywhere which for its flexibility to law—to use the word of my friend, [Mr. Hardenburgh] is so much under the control of moral and legal restraint, and of general order as the people of the city of New York. Why, Mr. Chairman, long before we had a metropolitan police, I remember when the recorder of the city of New York headed a few men at the time of the Astor Place riot, and compelled those there to disperse, giving them, first, what every mob ought to receive, a proper warning, and then the next proper thing, an order to fire into the midst of those who failed to obey the law, and chose to insist upon personal violence in the place of law. Sir, I remember mobs also in the city of Providence, mobs in Baltimore, mobs everywhere. Mobs, indeed, I admit, are quite too common; but they are not confined to any locality. At the commencement of the war to which allusion has been made, there was assembled in front of the New York Express office, in Park Row, from five to six thousand people demanding that the flag of the United States should be raised over that office. Sir, who composed that mob? It was made up of vagabonds and pickpockets, all crying out for loyalty, and yet in twenty minutes after they had dispersed some ten gentlemen had lost their watches and as many more had lost their pocket books. This, sir, is the general inspiration of a mob. But I remember even a more serious case in the city of New York, which took place under the excitement of the war when two democratic journals were closed up by military authority, the New York World and the New York Journal of Commerce, for publishing the celebrated forged proclamation, of which they were as innocent as you or I. The author of that forgery was a former attache of the New York Tribune and the New York Times, and these journals escaped all punishment, or, at least, the Tribune and Times were permitted to be published while the democratic journals were stopped. Sir, this is the history of the past, and since gentlemen have thought proper to discuss the matter of mobs I think it is but fair to hear both sides of the question. But, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to be drawn as far away in the discussion as I have been to-night. I hope the report which is submitted by the majority of this committee will be adopted. I believe it will result in a great public good. I confess frankly that I am not without some misgivings that the concentration of so much power in the mayor, and if you please, the common council, will be abused. I believe it will be difficult to make a local government wholly satisfactory, even if all this power should be restored to them; but let us try, and the grand motive is that all the attempts which have been made to improve upon the past, have made things rather worse than before. I say, also, that our expenditures increase, and must increase so long as the affairs which pertain peculiarly to the city of New York are administered upon by the State at large. Let me give a single fact in illustration of what I mean. The local legislature of the city of New York, consisting of a board of aldermen and a board of councilmen, are accustomed and required by law, to prepare during every session of the Legislature, to submit to it, what is called "the tax levy." Well, sir, it is as full as a nut of meat by the time it gets to the Senate and Assembly. Every appeal is first made to the local authorities to put in every item of appropriation, and I have known the tax levy thus composed by the common council and presented to the State Legislature, to have two million dollars added to it by the Legislature. What cares the State at large what New York pays for taxes? What can they know of the merits of these respective local appropriations? Why, only in 1866 the police appropriation was increased between four and five hundred thousand dollars for the police, and was increased by a proposition made in the State Legislature to add so much per head to each person serving on the police. The salaries which are fixed upon New York are made by the Legislature, or by boards created by the Legislature, very often considerably enlarged by interested parties, and, sir, in conclusion, I appeal to the judgment and common sense of the members representing the interior districts of the State, to know, if indeed it is possible for them to know the wants and necessities of the people of the city of New York in regard to streets, in regard to charities, in regard to the fire department, which is pre-eminently local, and in regard to any thing of this character, as well as the people themselves? Obviously it is not. Obviously, also, it is impossible for the State to administer any local government as wisely in regard to these local affairs as the people of the cities themselves.

Mr. OPDYKE—I desire to say a few words this evening in reference to the pending question, but as it is now getting late, and I am suffering from illness, if no other gentleman desires to speak, I move that the committee do now rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Opdyke to rise and report progress, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT pro tem., Mr. FOLGER, resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. RUMSEY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Cities, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had instructed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave to sit again, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BERGEN—I move that we now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bergen, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 23, 1868.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, at ten o'clock A.M.

No clergyman present.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. COLAHAN presented three memorials signed by medical men in Chautauqua, Niagara, and Steuben counties, asking for a uniform system of licensure of medical practitioners, and the establishment of proper pharmaceutical regulations, as proposed by the resolution presented by him.

Which was laid on the table at his request.

Mr. COLAHAN presented the following preamble and resolution from citizens of Oneida county;

"WHEREAS, In the proposed constitutional amendment presented by the Hon. S. J. Colahan, with a view to the advancement of medical science by elevating the standard of medical requirements, we recognize an instrumentality of great practical importance; therefore,

"Resolved, That we hereby respectfully request the members of the Constitutional Convention to support said measure, and favor its adoption in the form of an amendment to the Constitution of the State."

Which was laid on the table at his request.

Mr. HAND presented four memorials from physicians and others in the counties of Steuben, Madison, Washington and Fulton, asking for a uniform system of licensure of medical practitioners, and the establishment of proper pharmaceutical regulations, as proposed by the resolution presented by Mr. Colahan.

Which was laid on the table at his request.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Revision be instructed to strike out the word "sixty," in line twenty-one, section 18 of the article on the judiciary, and insert instead thereof the word "forty."

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—In my absence from the Convention, a day or two last week, I observe that the language in the original report of the committee on the subject has been amended by substituting the word "sixty" instead of "forty." The committee had reported that in counties where the population amounted to forty thousand the Legislature might, as it might under the Constitution of 1846, appoint an officer as surrogate to attend to the duties of that office in those counties. There was nothing compulsory in it, and there is nothing compulsory in it now. I believe that my own county, with a population of forty or fifty thousand, are in favor of retaining the article as it is in the present Constitution. I know, sir, that even now, with the limited jurisdiction of the county courts, the limited jurisdiction of the county judge in our county, it is almost impossible for him to do the duties of county judge and surrogate in the county. And it is so in the adjacent counties—in Clinton, for instance, with whose members I have talked; and as long as it is not compulsory I believe the wishes of the county will be better consulted if we leave it as it was in the Constitution of 1846; and especially now that we propose to increase the jurisdiction and powers of the county courts so much greater will be their duties, and so much greater will be the impossibility of their performing the duties of both offices. I ask unanimous consent to the consideration of the resolution at the present time.

Mr. ALVORD—I do not desire to debate the question, but I will suggest to the gentleman that this was referred by special resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I will amend by substituting "Committee on the Judiciary."

Mr. FOLGER rising to debate the resolution, it was laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. BICKFORD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Revision be instructed to add at the end of the article on future amendments and revision of the Constitution in substance as follows:

"But no new Constitution or amendment agreed to by such Convention shall be valid until adopted by a vote of the majority of the electors of the State voting on the question of its adoption either at a general election or at a special election, as shall be determined by the Convention.

Mr. RUMSEY rising to debate the resolution, it was laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. COLAHAN—I wish to call up the resolution offered by me yesterday, in relation to a system of licensure.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That there be a special committee of three appointed to consider and report to this Convention a system of licensure of medical practitioners, and the establishment of proper pharmaceutical regulations in this State.

Mr. COLAHAN—I hope that this Convention will see the importance of adopting this resolution. The measures that have been heretofore presented to the Convention in relation to raising the standard of, and protecting the medical profession in this State have met with almost universal approbation. Memorials have been presented here from more than thirty counties of the State, signed by some of the most prominent and respectable members of the medical profession, and many of our prominent citizens and representative men, asking that this Convention take action on the subject. I have also in my possession, and I believe that other members of the Convention have in their possession, several additional memorials from like sources, asking for similar action. Many leading journals in the State have considered this subject favorably. Several medical societies have adopted resolutions asking from this Convention early action in the premises. It is not a subject that belongs solely to the Legislature. It is one sufficiently vast in its features to command the earnest attention of this Convention. If it is passed by as a subject of legislation, then this Convention occupies a sorry position in setting up such an answer to the demands of our people. This Convention has done too much legislation already, and has established too many precedents, to try at this late day to shuffle off the responsibility with such an excuse. We cannot intrust it with safety or hope to the Legislature, because from the Legislature we can expect no satisfactory reformation, for the reason that those influences that have worked so injuriously and potently in the past will continue to operate injuriously in the future. School will be arrayed against school; fights will be made for the ascendency; and while these evils are progressing, the people will know little how their power of life is being shortened by the short sightedness of our State in not providing effective remedies. I trust the resolution will be passed.

Mr. HAND—I hope the Convention will grant this committee. It will certainly do no harm. There are many reasons why the Legislature does not act upon this subject, and it becomes necessary to act here. Unfortunately, there are various parties in medicine. The plan proposed is not in favor of any party, or any system of medicine. It proposes to require of every man who would practice medicine, a profession which is certainly of very great consequence to the community, a degree of knowledge which will enable him to practice it with safety to the community.

Digitized by Google

We have spent many days of the time of the Convention in organizing our judiciary system; but no one pretends that it is of more importance to the community than the system of medicine, which comes home to every household in the land, and yet that question seems to be regarded as a thing to be neglected. We desire that every man who practices medicine should be educated for the performance of those duties, and that the State should see to it that this is enforced. We do not ask that they should follow any particular system of medicine, but that they should make themselves acquainted with the elementary sciences lying at the foundation of all medical practice, that they should have a knowledge of surgery, a knowledge of the nature of disease, a knowledge of the nature of the medicines which they are to use, and their relations to the diseases which affect the human system. All this is important, in order that the physician should be a thoroughly capable man in his profession, and this is what the community requires. No particular system of the treatment of disease is to be required, but a knowledge of the elementary branches of medical science, and other branches of knowledge pertaining thereto, in order that a higher degree of intelligence in the profession shall be secured. There are reasons why the Legislature will refuse to act upon this subject, as they have done heretofore. It is the partisanship of different schools in medicine that has prevented its action, and the provision, year after year, has been lost in the Legislature. There is now hardly a county or a locality in the State where there has not been professional murder, the destruction of human life, from the ignorance of practitioners, abortionists and others, by whose acts their patients have been brought to an untimely grave. I have myself attended post mortem examinations developing a treatment, the enormity of which no one could doubt. The unwritten histories of such deeds of crime fill our communities everywhere. I think it is due to the interests of the State that a plan should be devised and placed in the fundamental law which will put an end to such criminal malpractice. I trust that members of the Convention will agree to the resolution, and that a committee will be raised.

The question was put on the resolution offered by Mr. Colahan, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT announced the following gentlemen to constitute the committee called for by the resolution just passed: Messrs. Colahan, Hand and Gould.

The Convention then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris], prohibiting the mayor from two consecutive elections.

Mr. OPDYKE—The Convention has referred to this Committee of the Whole, four distinct reports from the Committee on Cities. First, the report of the majority, signed by the chairman; second, a minority report, signed by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]; third, another minority report, signed by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis]; and, fourth, still another minority report, signed by Mr. Hand, Mr. Fullerton, and myself. The report of the majority proposes to confer on cities absolute powers of self-government, and to take from the Legislature all power of interference with their local affairs, other than to pass general laws to carry out the principles embodied in the article they present. The minority report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] concurs in the main with the views expressed by the majority, differing, however, in two important points; one as to the time of holding elections, and the other as to the absolute executive power it proposes to confer on mayors. The action, however, which he proposes is quite different from that proposed by the majority. The minority report presented by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] takes a position directly opposed to that of the majority. It goes to the other extreme and proposes to leave with the Legislature all power over the government of cities. The report signed by my associates and myself, presents a plan for the government of cities which may be regarded as a mean between these two extremes. It proposes to confer on cities powers of local self-government, so far as experience and the circumstances connected with them seem to render it safe, proper and useful to do so. The distinguished chairman of the committee favored us yesterday, with an elaborate argument in support of the proposition of the majority. He was followed by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis], with an equally earnest and elaborate argument in support of his proposition, which, as I have said, is diametrically opposite to that of the majority. My associates and myself, when we presented our report, accompanied it with a written argument in its support, brief, but carefully considered, and I had intended to rely on that in support of our proposition, but, inasmuch as the other reports have been accompanied by oral arguments in their support, I feel it my duty to state, as succinctly and clearly as I can without preparation, the reasons which persuade me that the article we have presented is the one that this Convention should adopt. Sir, our aim in this matter, as in all other questions that come before us, should be to secure good government. In truth, we are sent here to exercise whatever ability we possess to devise a plan, a fundamental law, which will secure to the people of this State, both in their aggregate capacity and in their local civil divisions, good government, in every department. The government of cities is confessedly the most difficult problem with which we have to deal. It is known that now, as in all past time, the population of large cities contains an element less enlightened, more vicious, more insubordinate, and more difficult to bring into co-operation in the support of order and law, than is to be found in other portions of the community. But, sir, I feel that if we divest ourselves of all prejudices, and look solely to the high duty devolving on us here, we shall be able, through careful deliberation, to devise a plan that will secure to cities much better government than they now enjoy. Having done this, if we shall then have the moral courage to act up to our convictions, relying upon the good sense of the people, as I am sure we safely may, for the indorsement of our plans, I feel that even in regard to cities we may make a change that will be productive of great good. The great question then is, Mr. Chairman, what plan will best secure to the cities of this State the boon of good government. In looking at this question as Americans, educated in a political atmosphere where popular government is regarded as the only proper government—where we live, move and breathe in that atmosphere, our minds instinctively turn to the expedient, so eloquently enforced by the chairman of the committee yesterday, of conferring on cities the right of local self-government. That is in accordance with the theory of our government. It is, in fact, the very essence of the principle on which our whole system of government is founded; and I hold that it is carried out in the Constitution of the United States absolutely, so far as that instrument is concerned. The government of the United States is prohibited from all interference with local interests. The principle is less perfectly carried out in our State Constitutions, but I hold that we shall act wisely in giving to localities, as far as circumstances will admit, all the power that prudence and safety will justify; for it is self-evident that any community, whether large or small, will manage their own affairs with better knowledge and more vigilance than others will do it for them. The smaller the community, the more certain they are to govern themselves wisely. I believe that the towns in this State, the smallest political division known, as far as population is concerned, are, as far as their local interests are concerned, better governed, more wisely, more economically, more justly, than any larger political division of the United States. Now, sir, let us apply this principle to the government of cities, or, rather, to the government of the metropolis, for it is in relation to that that I shall chiefly confine my remarks. It is there that the question is of deepest interest and we there find a type of all the other cities of the State with all its proportions magnified. Consequently, whatever will apply to that city, whatever may be safely given, whatever prudence requires should be withheld, will apply equally, with some modifications, to all the cities of the State. The metropolis is intimately connected with every part of the State by at least one of its interests, and in a large degree by two others. I refer first to commerce. It is known that the city of New York is the center of commerce, not only of this State but of the United States. It is known that commerce, through its interchanges of property and blending of interests, binds the whole community together by a chain of interdependence. Consequently, whatever will affect the commerce of the city of New York must affect the commercial interests of the whole State. It is clearly proper, therefore, that that interest, whatever we may do with others, should be left absolutely and entirely under State control. It is one of its prerogatives that it would be unsafe to take away. There is another interest, not so important, not so intimately connected with the interior, but still sufficiently so to dictate the propriety—nay, the necessity—of leaving that under the control of the State. I refer to the sanitary interests of the city. We know that many diseases to which humanity is subject are infectious, and others contagious; that through the constant intercourse of the people of the State with the metropolis the virus of disease which may be located there may be carried by railroads—yea, on the wings of the wind—to every portion of the State. Especially in the immediate surroundings of the city these means of propagating disease are more intimate than they are in more distant parts of the State; and therefore it is absolutely essential to the safety of the metropolis itself, since diseases may be brought to it as well as carried from it, that its sanitary authority should extend to its surroundings, and if need be to the whole State. Therefore I hold that that is another interest, in one sense local, but in another co-extensive with the State, which the public good demands should be left under the absolute control of the State government. The next is the interest of the preservation of law and order, which is enforced by means of a police force. While this interest cannot be said to extend so absolutely over the whole State as the other to which I have referred, yet it is known that the duty of arresting offenders cannot be properly performed unless that force extends beyond the boundaries of the metropolis. Finding that defect in the old system, the State has created, as the chairman of the committee told us yesterday, in violation of the Constitution—so strong the necessity—has created a metropolitan police district. Every citizen of New York, I am sure, will agree with me, that the result of that enlargement of the district has been most beneficial to the city of New York Therefore, whatever the present Constitution may authorize, whether it inhibit or permit it, I hold it would be exceedingly unwise in this Convention to deprive the State of that power. Again, I hold that it would be manifestly unsafe, so far as the interests of the city itself are concerned, to go back to the system which that police department superseded. Every one who has lived in the city of New York long enough to be familiar with the police department which preceded the present, to have observed its workings and results, and who has observed the workings and results of this force, I am sure will agree with me, that the improvement has been in all respects most marked. In every sense the present force is superior to that which preceded it. In fact, sir, I believe the present police force of the city of New York, whatever criticisms may be made upon it from any quarter, will compare favorably with any police force in the United States, or even in Europe. I will refer particularly to its fidelity, its courage and its endurance, in the riots of 1863. My friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] last evening told us that, in his opinion, if that force had been properly handled—if its action had been as prompt, as earnest and energetic as it should have been, that riot might have been much earlier suppressed, and much of the loss of life and property might have been avoided. I am constrained to differ entirely with my friend on that point. It was my official duty to assist in efforts to suppress that riot. I was in constant communication with the police board; and I feel bound to say—and, in evidence of my sincerity, I may remark that although a majority of the commissioners are of the same party as myself, I have never received their political support, yet I have pleasure in saying that their conduct and that of the force under them, throughout that trying period was most faithful, and in all respects praiseworthy. I think there was not a moment that it was possible for that force or those who controlled it to do aught in suppression of the riot but what was done with energy, with earnestness and with fidelity. And it is largely due to the efforts of that force, thus handled, that a riot, the most formidable and disgraceful of any with which our country has ever been cursed, was suppressed with such a slender loss of life and property.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him. He says a "slender loss of life and property." What does he estimate that loss of life to have been? A thousand or more?

Mr. OPDYKE—No one that I have ever met has been able to give an accurate estimate of the loss of life during that riot. The best information that I have been able to obtain puts it at something less than one thousand lives as the total loss on both sides. But when we consider that that riot was of a quasi-political character, that it received more or ess sympathy from a large portion of the members of the dominant party in the city; when we consider, also, the vast numbers engaged in the riot, and the blood-thirsty actions of which they were guilty, in seizing men as innocent as angels of any offense against them, men who had in no manner shared in ordering the draft which the rioters made the pretext of their acts—seizing them, hanging them to lamp posts, or taking their lives by cruel tortures that would disgrace a savage, for no other offense than the color of their skin; when we found them aggregated in masses of thousands and tens of thousands, patrolling the streets, threatening murder, arson, destruction on all sides; when we consider, in addition, that all the force that the military and civil authorities, by the most diligent efforts, could obtain to aid the police up to twelve o'clock of the first night of the riot, numbered less than one thousand, a large proportion of whom could not be relied upon for fidelity from their sympathy with the rioters; when we consider all these things, and find that within three days the riot was suppressed, order in a great measure restored, and, I repeat, with but little sacrifice of life and property; and when we consider that the police force, in the absence of the State National Guard, had to bear the brunt of the battle during the first two days, I feel that they are entitled to all the commendation that I can give them. My friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], in the remarks he made last evening, slurred over that riot as being a matter of not much moment, and one that had been equaled in magnitude and atrocity by many other riots in our country. From what I have said, I think the committee will agree with me that his remarks did not give it the prominence that its malignant and infamous character demands. I feel that when the historian comes to make a record of those dark days, in the history of the city of New York, he will have to be deeply imbued with the spirit of Christian charity before he can pass over them as lightly as my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has done. The majority report now under consideration proposes to give mayors of cities absolute, unlimited, executive power, the power both of appointing and removing all subordinate executive officers without the advice or consent of any other body. The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] in his minority report, very properly characterizes this as novel and dangerous. I was surprised to hear my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] the chairman of the Committee on Cities, declare yesterday that this was only conforming to this department of the government of the United States; that the power which he thus proposed to confer on mayors was no more than that conferred on the President of the United States. It seems to me that the gentleman must have become strangely oblivious of the facts in the case, or he could not have made that declaration. It is well known that the power of removing subordinates is the only power the President of the United States has ever possessed absolutely; the power of appointing has always required the concurrence of the Senate of the United States; and now, under the existing laws, both the power of appointment and of removal require that consent. The proposition of the majority of the committee is to confer on mayors the absolute power both of appointing and removing, without the concurrence of any one. Suppose the President of the United States to-day had the power which the chairman of the committee declared he possesses; that he has the power of appointing and removing all other executive officers—what do you think would be the present condition of things in the position of antagonism and angry discord existing between the President and the Congress of the United States? I feel, for one, that the peace of our country would be in great jeopardy. What will be the effect of conferring this power on mayors of cities? It embraces there the appointment and removal at will of the police force. I will look simply at that. The mayor will have the power of appointing the head of the police force and the power of removing him; consequently there will follow with that power the power of dictating the appointment of the rank and file of the force. We can readily imagine that if the commissioners should fail to comply with the wishes of the mayor in that regard they would be promptly removed and more pliable material put in their places. We should have then, under the proposition of the majority of the committee, a police force to arrest offenders which would be likely very soon to degenerate into the personal or political body-guard of the mayor. They would be an instrument to execute his will, and we might reasonably expect that in times of political excitement they would be liable to be wielded in a direction repugnant to public sentiment and contrary to the public good, and that riots, disorders and bloodshed would be likely to ensue. Nothing, in my judgment, could be more fatal to the order, peace and good government of the metropolis than a proposition like this. I trust that on this point, whatever we may do on others, the Convention will not hesitate an instant to reject the proposition. My own experience has satisfied me that it is important that the chief executive officer of the city should possess more power than is conferred by the present charter; but the most that I hold it would be safe to do, under the plan of city government proposed by the majority report, would be to confer on him, as was formerly conferred on the President of the United States, the right of removal; and even then I would only give him a lease of official life for one, or, at the utmost, two years. The majority report proposes three. It proposes to clothe him with executive powers altogether unlimited, and to keep him in office for three years. Why, he could wield a patronage almost twice as large as that of the Governor of this State, and if a bad man, he could wield it in the direction of perpetuating his own power. True, the committee propose to prevent his re-election for the ensuing term, but it is known that there are offices in the United States higher than that of mayor of any of our cities, and consequently he would be likely to use it either to elect his successor or to elevate himself to a higher office in some other department of government. It would not be likely to be exerted in the direction of the public good. If the Convention shall decide to give to cities increased powers of local government, I trust it will determine to restrict the power of mayors as I have suggested, and that it will reserve to the State the right of absolute control over the police force and over commercial and sanitary interests. The question next arises, will it be safe, prudent and beneficial to confer on cities the right of self-government so far as relates to all their other local interests?

Mr. VERPLANCK—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? In looking at the report of the minority of the committee I see that the same ground is taken which the gentleman now takes. Am I mistaken in supposing that in the discussion of the committee of which I had the honor to be a member, the gentleman did not approve of conferring this power on the mayor? I ask whether I am mistaken in supposing we had the concurrence of the gentleman?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I rise to a point of order. I understand that it is not in order to refer to the discussions before the committees appointed before this house.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. OPDYKE—I will answer with great pleasure.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I ask pardon of the committee and the gentleman if the inquiry I made is improper.

Mr. OPDYKE—I shall be very happy to respond to the question of the gentleman. It is true we had discussions in the committee—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I rise to a point of order. It is not in order for the gentleman to relate what has occurred in the committee of which he was a member.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. OPDYKE—I will ask whether it be not in order for me to state what I have done elsewhere, whether in committee or any where else.

The CHAIRMAN—It is undoubtedly in order for the gentleman to state what he has done elsewhere, but not what he has done in the committee.

Mr. OPDYKE—Then I will say that it has always been my opinion, since I have had experience in that department of municipal government, that mayors should have larger executive powers than are now conferred on them. I have advocated that, and I have advocated giving to mayors of the city of New York the power of appointment and removal, provided other things were made satisfactory, and provided that they be elected for a single year. That is all. I stand by that proposition still; but that of the majority is a very different proposition, and one which I have always opposed, whether in committee or elsewhere—the proposition to confer on mayors the absolute power of removal and appointment of their subordinates, and to hold office for a term of three years. I believe now, and have always believed and have always so declared, that it would be unsafe. I have not, in any regard, changed my views. When I was interrupted I was about to consider the question whether it would be safe, proper and useful, to confer on the metropolis, and on other cities, the absolute power of self-government over all local interests except those which I have endeavored to show should be excluded, for the reason that they affect the interests of the whole State. While it would be as unbecoming in me as it is foreign to my nature to say a single word in unjust disparagement of the community in which I live, a community which has conferred on me the highest office in its gift, yet I am here in the performance of duty to declare my convictions, truthfully, whatever they may be. In the first place, I join in all that my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has said in commendation of New York and the active benevolence of its citizens. I desire to say more—I desire to say that during the rebellion, while at least two-thirds of the voters of that city were politically opposed to the administration then in power, and that was conducting the war; while two-thirds belonged to that party which had been for many years in alliance with the party at the South which inaugurated the rebellion, yet I am proud to say, that that party, in spite of political ties and party prejudices, stood up manfully and earnestly in support of the government of the United States. There were, it is true, during the long struggle, periods when their political animosities led them into attitudes so unfriendly to the government that I sometimes feared they might eventuate in open antagonism to the war; but I am happy to say that that result never occurred. The only thing that approached it was, as I said before, this offshoot which ripened into a formidable riot. It may be proper to say that those concerned in that riot belonged almost wholly to the party opposed to the administration; and that the government of the city of New York during all that period, was mainly under the control of officials of that party. But it is due to them to say, that in every emergency, in every crisis, when there were calls to sustain the government, I always received the hearty co-operation of the democratic officials. But, sir, the vital question is whether we, in the city of New York, with the present extension of the elective franchise, are capable of giving to ourselves good local government. For one I am constrained to say that my observation and my experience have led me to the conclusion that it would be unsafe to make the experiment by constitutional provision. I fear that, instead of producing better government there, it would precipitate us from bad to worse, until the government became intolerable. I ground that conviction on the character of our population. It is known that more than three-fifths of our voters are of foreign birth. It is known that New York is the receptacle of much of ignorance and vice from all quarters of the world. Most immigrants of all classes, land there, and the worst portion of them remain there; and in due time they become voters. Add these to similar classes of the native born, which always abound in large commercial cities, and it gives them a preponderance in the present voting element of that city. With the present extension of the franchise, I feel that we cannot hope for the election of faithful and efficient officers so as to give us a good, economical and efficient government. The plan proposed by my associates and myself for overcoming that difficulty, so that the metropolis may have the benefit of local self-government, and its citizens the right of managing their own local interests in their own way, and to do it well through the election of capable and faithful officials, is to limit the franchise in regard to the election of a portion of the local officers. The proposition in our report is that the board of aldermen shall be elected by tax paying voters, possessing property to the value of at least one thousand dollars; that the Comptroller shall be elected by the same constituency; and that the board of assistant aldermen and the mayor shall be elected by the whole body of electors. This, it will be seen, will give a mixed government; a government in a part of which the whole body of electors will be represented, and in the other part only tax paying electors. They will serve as a check upon each other. If either class of officials should attempt to do that which was wrong or injurious to the interests of the city, the other would be prepared to hold them in check until the people would apply the proper corrective through the ballot box. The objection that will be urged against this proposition, is that it is contrary to the sentiment of the present day to have any limitation of the elective franchise, and especially one that is thus grounded. I am one of the last that would propose a property qualification for voters in matters purely political, where personal rights are concerned; but it is well known that municipal government relates mainly to the supervision and regulation of property. In regard to that, tax payers are most competent. Their acquisition and preservation of property proves that they possess proper qualifications, not only for voting for city officials, but even for acting in such official capacity themselves. I feel that the sentiment of the times is going quite too far on the extension of the elective franchise, and that it becomes us, when we consider that we are sent here to so revise the organic law as to secure good government, to be guided solely by our convictions as to the best means of securing that end. Now, if it were any wrong to the State or the city to deprive men of the right of voting for municipal officials because they do not possess property; if it violated any right of the citizens thus excluded; if it were an act of wrong toward them or of injury to them, I would be the last one to advocate it. But I hold, with a distinguished member of the Convention not now present, I refer to Judge Paige, that the right of voting is a franchise, and that it is the duty of the people, in the exercise of their sovereignty, to confer it where it is useful, and withhold it where it is injurious: and if we look broadly at the question we will see that this has always been our policy. To-day, not more than one-fifth of the whole community possess it. It is withheld not only from minors and women, but it is withheld from adult males wherever the public good seems to demand it. It is withheld, for example, from the foreign born who have been here less than five years, from those who have come from another State and been here less than twelve months, and from colored men without a freehold. No matter what the reason may be, if the public good will be promoted by withholding it, I hold that it is our duty to do it. For one, I am fully satisfied that if we want good government in the city of New York, that is the only means by which we can get it. I am persuaded that a majority of this body must concur in that conviction; and I should like to see the Convention face the question boldly. I feel as confidently as I can of any future event, that if we adopt the proposed limitation, the people will with alacrity endorse it. One of my associates on the committee [Mr. Law] from the city of New York, has frequently expressed the opinion that if that question were submitted to the electors of the metropolis alone, it would be as likely to receive a majority as a minority of the votes there. I could scarcely agree with him in so large an estimate; but I am satisfied that the aggregate vote in its favor there would be but little less than one-half of the whole. Now, if such would be the result in the city itself, what would be the result in the State at large? I am satisfied that the people would unhesitatingly indorse the proposition, and I think that in doing so they would be acting wisely, for I am convinced that it is the only possible means by which we can get good government in that city. If these safeguards, and the limitations to which I here refer be not adopted, then, for one, I shall feel constrained to vote against every proposed increase of governmental power to cities. I feel that the best interests of both the city and the State would then demand this action at our hands. True, the present government of the metropolis is as disjointed and as expensive as it seems possible to make it, consisting of not less than eight or ten administrative departments, each of which acts independently, gathering around it the paraphernalia of an administration almost as expensive as the whole would be if concentrated in a single head. Jealousies and antagonisms grow up. There is no unity of purpose or of action. One portion of the government emanates from the people of the city; other portions in the form of commissions, from the people of the State, through the action of the Legislature. All these things considered, we cannot, under the present order of things, hope for economical or good government in that city. Now, sir, what has produced this condition of things? Sir, it was produced by the fact that when the whole of the administrative departments of the city were in the hands of officials chosen by the electors of the city, it was found that the taxes for local purposes were rapidly augmenting, and the efficiency of the local government as rapidly diminishing. The citizens naturally looked to the Legislature for relief. The Legislature responded by creating these State commissions of which we have heard so much, and, for one, I am prepared to say that I think they have proved beneficial. Thus far they have been administered with general fidelity and good judgment, and if we look back at the administration of the corresponding departments of the city government, which some of them superseded, we must admit that there has been a marked improvement. But it is only an improvement. We cannot hope to have our government what it should be, and what it may be if our action here is wise, by any such discordant system as now obtains. I am opposed to legislative interference with our local interests because it is generally special and invidious, and often injurious. We do not always get good legislation from Albany, any more than we do from the City Hall in New York; and allow me to add, we do not always get justice from the representatives of the interior. I observed many years ago, when in the Legislature myself, and have often observed it since, that there is a want of sympathy, a want of desire on the part of many of our friends in the interior, to so legislate as to benefit the city of New York. On what that feeling is founded I do not pretend to say, but that it exists I feel certain. For one, I am most anxious that we should be left in the city to control our own affairs in our own way, if you will only give us a plan that will enable us to do it well. That plan I think is to be found in the minority article I have commended to the favor of this committee. But unless we can have the safeguards and limitations therein proposed I shall be constrained to vote to continue things as they are. But give us those, and what will be the result? We shall have, in my opinion, a local city government elevated in character, pure, efficient, looking to the best interests of the city, exercising due economy, with a single head, compact, symmetrical in all its parts, ready at all times to carry out the will of the people in all that relates to the general interests of the city, with a salutary restraint existing in a board of aldermen elected by tax payers, in regard to matters involving expenditure and taxation. This is the kind of government we need in the metropolis. I respectfully ask the committee's careful attention to the plan I have commended as likely to secure it, and also their support of it so far as their judgments approve.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris]. I think the trouble, the excitement, and perhaps the danger of going through an electioneering canvass for a new man to fill the responsible position of mayor of the metropolis of the State is a matter to be well considered before we approve of this amendment. Certainly, if we could have again a Havermeyer, an Allen, a Paulding, or to go back still further, a Coleman —or better still, a De Witt Clinton—for mayor of the city of New York, it would be a matter of regret that any constitutional provision should exist which would prevent his continuing in office for more than one term. Some remarks have fallen from the gentleman from New York last up [Mr. Opdyke] with reference to the circumstances of the great riot in New York (which was undoubtedly a portion of the rebellion), wherein he differed from my colleague from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] in his statement last evening that there was good authority for supposing that had efficiency on the part of the police existed in the elementary stages of that riot, or indeed at its outbreak, it would never have gone to the extent and degree to which it did go, and which we have all reason to lament. One duty of the police, as we have gathered from that institution in foreign countries (for it is only of recent years that the inquisitorial features of the police system have existed in this country)—one purpose of the police force, I say, and a very salutary purpose, is by a system of espionage, so to speak, to anticipate and guard against dangers that are likely to occur. Now, sir, when that draft was proceeding in New York on that eventful Saturday, and when men were seen reading from the list of names to see who of themselves or their friends were to be called to the front, those who were in the city on that occasion (for I had myself occasion to be absent at that time) tell me that it was evident that there was danger brewing, and that precautionary measures were necessary; and when the first outbreak took place at the provost-marshal's station in the upper part of the city I am satisfied that a decided demonstration of physical force on the part of the police, which, under the telegraphic system, then as now in existence, could easily have been concentrated there, would have destroyed the movement in its incipiency. It must be considered, sir, that in addition to the portion of the militia of the State of New York that had not gone to the front, there was also a very considerable United States force in the city ready to be associated on call with the militia and the police. I think that when the calm, deliberate history of the events of those riotous days is written, it will be found that there was a defect in the preliminary arrangements, claimed to be perfect in advance, by the provost marshal, but for which the riot would never have gone so far, or produced the deplorable results which we all regret, and which the police in the end exhibited a most admirable efficiency in suppressing. Now, sir, to give some little idea of how riots were formerly dealt with in the city of New York, if the committee will bear with me, I will detail some facts that occurred many years ago when I was a boy, too young, of course, to take part otherwise than sympathetically, with the disturbances that were going on. As long ago, indeed, as the year 1809—in the case of the riot known as that of Augusta street, when De Witt Clinton honored the station of mayor, I have been told, and in fact it is a matter of record that one of the marshals of the city came to that mayor and said, "Sir, I cannot execute this warrant of arrest, there is a turbulent mob that resists me, and resists the police force." But what did the mayor say, sir, on that occasion? He said, "Bring me my staff of office, call a carriage, and drive me to the spot." It was done, sir, and then, with the insignia of office in his hand, he marched through the crowd, dragged the chief culprit with him, placed him in the carriage, and brought him to the City Hall. That is the way, sir, that that great man administered the duties of his office in such trying circumstances. Now, I was sorry to hear gentlemen say that cities contained an especially insubordinate population. Sir, these cases of insubordination and turbulence are not confined to the cities of the State. Do we forget that the treasury of our State has had to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to suppress insurrections that took place almost within the sound of my voice. I do not forget that in 1840 when the first appropriation was made, I had the privilege, by the favor of the constituency of the city of New York, of a vote upon that question, and in opposing the appropriation of forty thousand dollars of the funds of the State, to defray the expense of what was then called, and known as the "Helderberg War," I took occasion to say (and I have the best authority for it, the authority of a gentleman who was with the posse comitatus, and who has since filled the position of mayor of the city of Albany), the sheriff of Albany was then a gentleman of my own profession, a quiet, kindly man, but not fitted for such an emergency; that had that sheriff exhibited such efficiency on that occasion as De Witt Clinton had exhibited in New York on the occasion to which I have already alluded, there would have been no necessity for calling in the military of this city, or the militia of the State of New York, there would have been no necessity for that excitement, or for that expenditure; and therefore I proposed on the floor of the House, that the expenses of putting down that insurrection should be assessed on the citizens of the county of Albany, because they had not taken care to elect to such a responsible office as high sheriff of the county, a suitable man. We know too, sir, the excitements that have occurred in other places and on other occasions in this State, outside the city of New York. If the committee will excuse me again for a moment for detaining them, I will say sir, that it was my lot to take an active part, many years ago, in suppressing the celebrated riots of the days now a matter of history, the election riots of 1834. At that time I had the honor to be in command of a company of artillery in the city of New York, doing duty as infantry. We found no difficulty there, sir, though long before the metropolitan police system, and when the watchmen in the city were much fewer in proportion to the population than the police are now—and I may remark, sir, that those watchmen were known by the sobriquet of "leatherheads," from a massive ribbed leather cap worn by them, whose principal duty was done in the night, but done openly, not covertly, at that time sir, when they were the only police force of the city, except a few constables, we found no difficulty in suppressing the riot. Owing to the weakness of the police force of the city on the emergency of that riot, resort was properly had to the military. The arsenal was attacked, the arms of the city were in danger, and a gentleman who has now gone to his long home was seen climbing over the arsenal wall, leading an attempt to take possession of the arms. In that emergency the mayor very properly and naturally called upon the military. We repaired to the spot promptly and succeeded in quelling the disturbance, and although we were compelled to do duty all night, there was no bloodshed. Again, sir, another disturbance, more important, perhaps, in the history of these matters, because it was connected with one of the movements which led to all our great national troubles, was what has since been known as the "abolition riot." It occurred in the month of June, and was incited, it is said, by a statement being made in a press of that day still extant, a press which always likes to deal in excitements and sensations, that the two brothers Tappan had carried matters so far in the little chapel in Chatham street, at a period just following the annual anniversaries, that they had dovetailed black and white in together like the keys of a piano-forte, which I believe was the expression used, those persons making up the audience who chose to go and listen to some erratic Thompson or Garrison of that day. This report was seized upon, in part perhaps by some honest individuals, and also by the population that undoubtedly exists in all cities—the population that love on a moonlight night in the summer time to have an excitement [laughter], and it led to a breach of the peace. I myself saw, sir, a fearful attack made upon one of these "leather-heads" by the mob, and I recollect distinctly hearing the sound of the clubs beating upon the barrier that was fortunately presented between them and his skull. I remember of seeing four or five rough looking fellows attacking this one man, and all I could do was to alarm his confederates at the station-house as I passed home. The gentleman who was mayor of the city at that time, drawing his theories on that subject principally from a friendly sect who do not believe in carrying or using arms, hesitated about putting in requisition that force which an earlier mayor had used on the occasion I have already mentioned; the consequence was, that the disturbance continued for two days, without loss of blood, however, but resulting in the destruction of one of the minor churches of the colored population of the city, and it was not until the third day that energetic means were resorted to and the riot was thoroughly suppressed. I had the honor to participate in restoring and preserving the peace on that occasion, and I will mention a little incident which comes to my recollection at this moment. I remember a man saying to me: "What right have you to block up the streets in this way?" I stepped up to him and said: "Sir, you appear to be a man of intelligence; there is my authority (exhibiting the mayor's proclamation), and if you don't leave the ground in five minutes, I will put you in the guard-house"—the guard-house being the lecture room in the church in Spring street, sir, an illustration of how even the holiest instruments may sometimes be perfectly diverted from their original purposes. [Laughter.] Again, sir, that same mayor being still in office, the more serious, and, if possible, the more dangerous riot of 1836, or 1837, I forget which, occurred—what is known in the annals of the State as the "flour riot." I remember sitting in my office on a cold winter afternoon, and one of my clerks coming in and saying that a large mob was just proceeding down Pearl street and up Maiden Lane, with the intention of going to H——'s flour stores. I hastily put on my coat and ran over in order to be early on the spot—for I think that is the great point in such matters, not to delay, sir, to be early on the spot, and nip the matter in its incipiency as it were—I ran across the town to the vicinity of Courtlandt and Washington streets. The mob had just come there a few moments before from the park, and to the depth of three or four inches the whole street was strewn with flour, and some of the poor people were busy appropriating it and putting it in their baskets. The mayor of the city was almost immediately on the spot, arrayed in his blue cloak, a garment ill adapted for such an occasion, as was afterward illustrated. There appeared to be no malice in the mob, which was chiefly made up of Dutch women and boys, their only desire seeming to be to get snugly in their baskets the flour. The mayor stood upon one of the instruments which we use in our mercantile business, known as "skids" and declared to the mob that he was mayor of the city, and ordered them to disperse. While he was making these brief ejaculations, some fellow struck the skid that he was standing on and doused him into the bed of flour. I thought, sir, that was a very apt time for me to make a suggestion, and I said to the mayor, "Sir, your duty is to call out the proper force, call out the military at once; you know the signal that will bring them here; you know that seven taps of the City Hall bell will bring the force at once"—there being at that time but six fire districts in the city. The mayor walked rapidly to the City Hall. We found his office filled with men who ought to have been at the scene of the disturbance, but who had rushed to the City Hall to make suggestions. Before the mayor had taken his coat off, some hasty, but doubtless well intentioned person said to him, "Sir, give us an order to go to the arsenal." Fortunately, there was a voice to suggest, "No, Mr. Mayor, you have the authority, issue your order regularly, and it will be responded to at once." It was done, the bell struck, and in less than an hour the force was ready, and I was one of those who, in military array, and with loaded arms, went to the scene of the riot. We found no one there, sir; but we remained on the ground a considerable time, and thence proceeded to other quarters, and my comrades and myself during that night, contributed to and secured the entire preservation of the peace in that city, on that threatening, severe winter night. I excuse myself for this seeming digression, because I have mentioned these things in order to illustrate the position which my colleague has endeavored to maintain, and which I think he has maintained satisfactorily, that the power to suppress riots in the city of New York dates farther back than the time of the organization of the metropolitan police force. To digress again for a moment. I remember that when the question of uniforming the police came up, one of the best captains in the force said to me, "Do you suppose that we will ever consent to wear uniforms, badges about the city?" My reply was, "What better are you than myself or any other of the numerous merchants of New York who have often walked about the city in their regimentals? I remember, sir," I continued, "when I was a boy, as far back as 1824, when I had the honor of presenting arms to General Lafayette, leaving my boarding-house regularly to attend the meetings of the military company to which I belonged, and often followed by a squad of curious urchins, and shall you, sir, a paid servant of the city, claim an exemption which I did not claim? No, sir; you will have to submit to it." And they did submit to it as a matter of course. Now, since that time we have made many improvements (although I do not know that we have improved much in military matters, but of course that is a matter for military men to say) improvements of various kinds, mechanical and otherwise, tending to facilitate the rapid concentration of the military of the city as an aid to the police in keeping the peace or suppressing a disturbance. I believe my colleague alluded last night to the Macready riot, as one in which the efficiency of the then recorder of New York was manifested; but I think the "Dead Rabbit" riot in front of the Tombs was one which well illustrated the efficiency of the police force of New York, although it occurred long before the excitement of the war, and while our police system could not possibly have attained all the efficiency that it has at the present day. I do not believe, sir, that any danger to the peace and good order of New York will be encountered by returning to the system that existed there at that time, or by giving to that city, and to all the cities in the State, the right of self-government, to which they are certainly entitled. I took occasion to say here, the other day, that I think our great error is in attempting to govern too much. It is best, sir, to keep the management and direction of these local affairs as close as possible to the hearth-stone, the neighborhood, the village, the city, the town, the county. Concede to the State its rightful powers, and to the cities and towns and counties throughout the State their legitimate powers. The right to decide questions arising between counties, and the control of the courts that adjudicate upon great cases, especially cases of crime, belong to the State; but local matters should be left to the localities, where they properly belong. One of the gentlemen who spoke on the other side of this question took occasion to ring some changes on that old threadbare theme, the exceptional delinquencies of our foreign population. We are too apt, sir, to forget that we owe much of what we are and all that we possess in this country, as a nationality, to the assistance of foreigners. We should never forget those noble foreigners who aided us in our revolutionary struggle—Montgomery, Kosciusko, De Kalb, Steuben, who first organized the military system of this State, and perhaps of the United States, and General La Fayette, of whom I spoke a few moments ago. Then, coming down to later times, let me ask gentlemen where we would have been had our foreign population hesitated to help to fill the ranks of our armies? It certainly cannot be disputed that in New York and other States they did their full share in that respect. I remember saying during our war, when looking at some regiment made up of foreigners going to the front, "I am always happy, under any great misfortune, to see some alleviating feature, and I think that even this miserable rebellion will be the occasion of one good result—it will cement us together so that hereafter we shall be one common people with a common bond of union, and we shall nevermore hear of 'native American.'" That was my hope, sir; but it seems that I was too sanguine, and that old prejudices are still alive or are sought to be revived even in this body. Now, I desire to express here my most decided dissent from the idea which we have put forward here in one of the minority reports on this article, and which I have more than once before seen cropping out in this body, that in some way or other a property qualification for voters would be the grand remedy for all our evils of local government in the cities. If it were proposed to fix a qualification upon education or good conduct, and it were possible to engraft it practically upon our system, I should at least hesitate before I would refuse to vote for it; but to this other idea I can never give my assent. I belong to a profession the members of which are perhaps more liable than most other men to experience the vicissitudes of fortune. Twenty-seven years ago, speaking in this city and almost within sound of my voice here, I ventured to state as my opinion that, taking a wide range of years, ninety out of every one hundred men who enter upon mercantile life falter or fall under its burdens. We had not the telegraph then to transmit news as it is transmitted now, and I recollect that the report of my remarks reached New York somewhat in this form: "A pretty representative you merchants have sent to Albany, a man who says that ninety out of a hundred merchants fall into insolvency." The statement I had made was used to some extent by certain persons to bring me into disfavor, until a gentleman of research in Boston said that my statement was not at all in excess of the fact, and that from his investigations he had ascertained that ninety-seven per cent of those who entered upon mercantile life failed; so that I was fully confirmed; and I recollect saying upon seeing the gentleman's statement that if I had come to the conclusion that so large a proportion of the merchants failed I should have said every one, and had done with it. But I was afterward very happy to declare in the Convention of 1846 (which declaration will be found in the debates) that I was satisfied, from the modifications and improvements that had been made in reference to the banking, revenue and warehousing laws, and in other ways, requiring a less use of credit and giving greater facilities for small men to avail themselves of the importation of goods, that the proportion of failures had been greatly reduced, and that I then thought that not over fifty per cent fell into insolvency within the period of twenty years of active commercial life. However, the calamities brought upon us by the rebellion have carried the figures back to about the former rate; and within the brief period of fifteen months following the outbreak of the war, the names of eight thousand of the merchants of New York passed from the solvent list. Now, if you carry out this suggestion of making the right of suffrage depend upon a property qualification, how will it affect this class of merchants? An intelligent and conscientious merchant presents himself to exercise his right of franchise, and is asked, "Have you the required two hundred or five hundred dollars' worth of property?" He answers, "Unfortunately not, sir, if I pay my debts," and he is turned away, while the next man, a shyster or shoddyist, and another perhaps who has become bankrupt and has paid his debts by the aid of the law, is admitted to vote. Why, sir, a single instance of that kind occurring under such a provision would make every gentleman here regret that he had ever given countenance to this attempt to make a property qualification necessary for voters.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Morris, to strike out the latter part of the first section, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SPENCER—As near as I can understand, there is a question relating to this whole article, whether it shall be incorporated in the Constitution or left out entirely; and with a view of having that question submitted distinctly, I move to strike out the section which has just been under consideration; trusting that, whatever may be the result of the motion, it will have the same effect as a motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill. This general question I do not propose to discuss. It has been discussed very fully already; but I desire to say a word in regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], made yesterday, by way of accounting for the change that has come over his views, in regard to the manner of governing the State of New York. It so happened that I had the honor to be a member of the lower house of the Legislature in 1857, and was then, as I am now, strongly attached to the republican party which was then just coming into existence. The proposition for a police commission was in fact, a party measure, and yet I hesitated to indorse it as a party measure; indeed I declined to vote for it when it was presented to the House. But sir, my observation and my information of the operation of the commission since that time has been such, that, if I were now a member of the Legislature, and the proposition were made to discontinue the commission, I should vote in favor of its continuance; for the reason that, so far as my information extends (and the position which I then took upon the question has induced me to give it a greater degree of attention than I have given to any other subject connected with the government of the city of New York,) my observation and my information in regard to its operation have satisfied me, that, there has never before been in that city a police system which has operated so efficiently as the system which was adopted by that Legislature.

Mr. ALVORD—Before the question is taken upon this motion, I desire to say a few words, not intending, however, to go through now with the whole argument which I expect to make upon this subject, but feeling that it is due to myself that I should say something at this time in regard to the matter, inasmuch as I have, in the main, consented to the article under consideration, being a member of the committee who reported this article, and concurred with the majority in their report. In what I have to say in reference to this matter at this time, I trust that I shall not so far depart from the legitimate line of argument to be used upon a question of this kind, as gentlemen have done who have preceded me upon both sides of this question. Undertaking to apply a general organic rule to separate and individual cases, is not the province of wise men or of statesmen. It would become a necessity if we were compelled to legislate, so far as regarded the fundamental law of this State, in that direction, that we should keep in perpetual session, so that as each exigency might arise in the history of the State, we should go to work to mold the organic law in a way to take hold of that particular subject. Now, sir, we can only look at these questions in the broad light of general principles. It has been said by a power higher and wiser than ours that there is no such thing as infallibility or purity in the human constitution, whether it be the constitution of an individual or of an aggregation of individuals. There are always, and there must of necessity be, great mistakes in any organization of human government. There is an impossibility, because we are finite and not infinite, that we should make a perfect form of government. I approach this subject, sir, with a view of taking in, not simply questions of mere locality, but rather to bring out the great principles which lie at the very foundation of our form of government, principles, sir, however gentlemen may have undertaken to state the opposite, which had their germs, so far as regarded the action of the individuals connected with them, in the free cities of Continental Europe. What was the reason for the aggregation of capital and of commercial power in those cities? It was, sir, to enable them to stand up against the inroads of the feudalism and despotism of the times. It was because the body of the people, the mechanics, laborers and manufacturers, gathering themselves together for the purpose of carrying on the employment in which they were engaged, were under the necessity of also aggregating themselves into a political society to resist and repel the encroachments and incursions of their rapacious neighbors. I take it upon me to say that the history of the world gives no evidence that the principles of free government were ever promulgated or sustained by persons who were, from the necessities of their condition, scattered over a wide range of country. It is the aggregation of individuals to pursue lawful and laudable enterprises that has given rise to those great principles and to the idea of the freedom of men from control other than such as he himself desires; and I believe that those principles would not have attained at this time the great and guiding influence which they have in this State of New York and in these United States of America, if it had not been for their early development and growth in the free cities of Continental Europe. This being so, it seems to me that this is a broader question, and that it should be looked at in a broader light than it has been looked at so far in this debate. It may be well enough to premise here that I hold that this question is not a political question, but a question rising above and beyond mere party politics, and to declare that I, in subscribing to the creed of the union republican party, and taking my place as a soldier in its ranks, never agreed to subscribe to all that might be said by individuals of that party as being part and parcel of the creed of the party. Since I have been a member of the political body to which I now belong, I have had the honor to proclaim in the Legislature of this State the sentiments and feelings that to-day inspire me in what I have to say upon this subject, and they are in hostility to circumscribed territorial legislation within the limits of the State of New York, hostility, sir, to any legislation that singles out a portion of the people of the State and deprives them of rights which other portions of the people possess and enjoy. I hold that if this idea of transferring a portion of the power that legitimately belongs to any locality in regard to the government of its own affairs, to the State government here at Albany, be accepted at all, it should never stop short, it cannot safely stop short, of taking the whole of these powers away from the locality, and governing it as a province, rather than as an integral portion of the State of New York. The past history of this system shows that aggression in that direction can never stop, but must be continued. If the system had stopped with the establishment of a police commission in the city of New York, as a great good would have come out of a great departure from republican principles, it might have been submitted to by the people of that locality, and by those who oppose the doctrine upon which that action was based; but when we find that step, once taken, followed up by another and another and another, until nothing but the mere semblance of authority is left in the local government, and that there is still an endeavor to increase those measures of aggression as the years roll over our heads, we see that, of necessity, as I have said, the system must go on until it results in the assumption by the State of the entire control of the locality in question. It has been remarked here once or twice that we should take this matter home to ourselves, and I ask any man representing upon this floor any of the rural portions of the State, whether or no he would submit, in the name of his constituents and for himself, to any innovations upon the rights that they, in equality with the people of other portions of the State, enjoy, by transferring those rights, so far as regards matters of local government, to the central State government at Albany? Sir, the answer would be the same from every member of this Convention: "No! we will not submit to any such thing." Now, what do we find in connection with this matter so far as regards the city of New York?

Digitized by Google

We say to the people of that city: "You may go to the polls and vote for the Governor and the other State officers; you may send up from your number representatives to sit in the Legislature of this State; but we will not concede to you those rights which we ourselves enjoy, equal with the people in every other portion of the State; we will take from you the power of self-government and self-regulation of your own local affairs—a power which the people exercise in every other portion of the State." Now, sir, my doctrine in regard to this matter is that these laws, so far forth as they are concerned, should be universal and uniform in their application to all portions of the State, and that there should not be any community picked out and isolated from the rest to be trammeled in its natural and ordinary rights of local government by regulations which are not imposed upon people of other portions of the State. I have no desire, and I do not mean to allude to remarks which have been made upon this occasion in this Convention for any other purpose than to illustrate the position which I occupy. I do not intend to enter into this controversy in regard to incidents and events that have occurred during the past few years, and if I speak of them at all I only allude to them for the purpose of giving point to the argument that I desire to impress upon the minds of the members of this Convention. Now, it has been said here, and repeated more than once, that, in this particular city of New York, there is a population which cannot be restrained except through the exercise of the power of the Legislature—a population that is above and beyond the ordinary powers of local law; and that it requires the strong executive arm of the State to be wielded over it in order to keep it within the bounds of reason and the limits of law; but what do we say to these same people who, it is undertaken to be argued here, are entirely unfit to govern themselves in their local affairs? We acknowledge, sir, that without any change in their character or circumstances, they are to be regarded as part and parcel of the sovereign people of the State, having a right to help, by their votes, to elect the officers who shall administer the government of the State at large.

Mr. AXTELL—I understood the gentleman to say that the establishment of commissions was a great departure from republican principles. Were the men of the early days of the State anti-republican in those days. I mean when the mayor of the city of New York was appointed by the Governor?

Mr. ALVORD—I cannot see any point to the question asked me by the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell]. The days when the mayor of New York was appointed by the Governor of this State under its original charter, were the days of federalism. They were days of the past, when progress had not got to the point that it has now reached.

Mr. AXTELL—Allow me to state my point for the gentleman. I had supposed that in the early days of this State, in the period near to the time when the nation was born, there were some men who controlled the State who were actuated by the pure principles of republicanism. I have always been so taught.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—George Clinton for instance.

Mr. ALVORD—I will ask the gentleman another question though I do not ask him to answer now.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Will my friend [Mr. Alvord] allow me to make a remark. Since the gentleman [Mr. Axtell] has referred to the early days of the State of New York as being pre-eminently republican, let me refer him to what they adopted in the State Constitution, to wit: that the powers of the government delegated to Congress may be reassumed by the people whenever it shall become necessary to their happiness. I think that is an answer as to the republicanism of our early days.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Because they were thoroughly republican.

Mr. ALVORD—I am entirely willing to stand all day and have gentlemen interrupt me in the course of my argument. I have no sort of objection whatever to it, but it will only result as a matter of necessity in the prolongation of the time I shall use in what I have to say, and in that way it may be disagreeable to the body of the Convention. Now, sir, in answer to the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell], I say that so far as it regards republicanism or the democratic ideas of the people of this State or nation, they had their simple birth in the results of the Declaration of Independence. They had eyes not yet fully accustomed to the light of reason, and were groping, as it were, in blindness, but from that day to this they have progressed up to the position which they now occupy. I ask the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] and members of the Convention, whether they desire to return to the position of affairs in 1777, when not only a property qualification was necessary for the purpose of enjoying the right of suffrage, but a certain status, so far as property was concerned, was necessary for the enjoyment of office. I will not, sir, undertake to say that in that regard, although the gentleman from Clinton may, that those men were purely republican, and that there was no possibility of any improvement so far as it regarded their Constitution. I think a great improvement has been made. I think that he and I are contending together that it is manhood and not property in which should reside the right to dictate what shall be the rule of government. There has been progress in very many other things. But a few short years ago in this State of New York, in every village and in every city in its limits, a property qualification was necessary in order to be a voter within the limits of that village, for municipal purposes. That has been entirely done away with, and it has been done upon this ground, and upon the ground which is tenable and cannot be controverted, that a man, although he may be a poor man, and have none of the goods of this earth to put upon the assessment roll, yet he is an integral portion of the community, and that in reality, although the assessment is put upon the property of men, yet in the end the taxation comes out of the man who toils with his hands—that taxation results finally in being wrung out of the labor of the land. That being the case, it is wrong to say that the source from which taxation comes in the government of the State, should have no voice or right in the administration of its laws. I stand up here to-day, sir, so far as I am concerned, against the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], rendering the property qualification necessary to the election of one of the boards of the common council of that city. Property, sir, what is it? It is the enjoyment of power in the hands of an individual, which gives him a great and mighty force in the management and control of the affairs of the city. It compels, from its very situation, those who stand down below it, to bow down and pay all the exactions that are put by the government upon it. Sir, under these circumstances, property should not be thought of in a republican government. Property should not enter into the controversy at all. It is men, it is the component parts of the government that should speak, and should speak unmistakably in all places, and upon all occasions, irrespective of property that may be attached to their name, or be in their possession. Sir, what is a republican government? What is the true democratic idea—not in any partisan sense, I use the term—of a republican government? Equal and exact justice, equal privileges to all portions of the community; not singling out any portion to be dominated over by another, nor leaving any one portion supremacy over the other. Deal to the man, wherever he may reside, just those rights that you would deal to any other man. If you give to the city of Syracuse, in their municipal corporation, a right to direct and take care of their affairs, give the same right to the city of New York. If you are to make any rule in this matter, when there shall be any different interest in the management and control of the affairs of the city, you can only make an excuse for it by placing it upon the question of the number of inhabitants within the limits of the city, and putting that dividing line in your Constitution. If you desire to say that cities arriving at certain points of population shall have certain rules to guide them, do so; but do not permit that there shall be taken out of the mass of the cities in this State, this one, that one, or the other one, and say that so far as it regards their domestic concerns, they are to be regulated different from a city lying right along side of it or from a city in another part of the State. In other words, I believe in the laws of the State being equal in their operation, so far as it regards all the powers and duties conferred upon or required of the people. Now, sir, we have in this State, towns. Is there any difference in the government of towns in this State? Are they not under one form, under one government, with one set of officers from one end of the State to the other, each like the other? There are towns in this State where there are five hundred people, and there are towns in this State where there are twenty thousand, and yet there is an inflexible rule that governs us in a republican form of government, that imposes the same duties, which grants the same privileges to towns of the smaller as to towns of the larger growth. It does not differ, so far as that is concerned, one from the other. We have counties in this State—counties so small, that although recognized territorially, as entitled to a member yet would not have the right to be so represented in the Assembly, according to their population, if they were part of another county.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] have the kindness to tell me if he is unwilling that a different rule should be applied to the cities of New York and Brooklyn from that which he has applied to the other cities in the State, how happens it that he assented to the reporting of an article, the great body of which is taken up with a specific distinction proposed to be put in the Constitution, distinguishing between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and the other cities of the State?

Mr. ALVORD—I will say, in answer, that in making up this report the committee has taken the population of those cities into consideration. There is a necessity for a larger amount of executive force for those large cities than there is for cities in the interior of the State; but as those cities shall grow up to the same position, there will probably be the same necessity for a similar provision in regard to the administration of their governments. We have not, nor have we thought of departing from the idea from the beginning to the end, of preserving in this article, that to local government shall be given the power to administer the laws applicable to that government. It is true that in the cities of New York and Brooklyn there may be some officers named different from those of other cities in the State, but still the power rests in the locality. It is not permitted to be exercised, no matter what that form may be by the central government against the wishes and desires of the people in the localities. The gentleman interrupted me when I was speaking in regard to counties. I wish to carry out that idea further. We have a county in this State having sixteen thousand people, and we have the county of Albany, having a vastly greater population. There is a difference, sir, in this, that the county of Albany probably with a just census would be entitled to five members of Assembly. The county of Schuyler would be entitled to one-half of a member. As it is, it has one member, and the county of Albany has four. There is an inflexible rule that governs us in the distribution of the power of this State under the authority of the Legislature. This comes from the fact that the laws in reference to the administration of affairs in counties is alike in each of the counties of the State; it is because that an attempt to make a difference in favor or against any one county of the State as compared with another would compel the people to rise up in rebellion against such an invasion of their rights, and to put down the government which should undertake such an operation. I say, and I repeat it, in hopes that some time hereafter I shall have an opportunity to speak again upon this subject, that no party and no set of men can ever expect or hope to be successful in carrying on a government in any republican country who attempt to wrest from one portion of the community powers which they freely and liberally give to other portions. I tell him that they have seen in the past history of this practice of filching away the power from the great metropolis of the State, written with a pen of iron upon imperishable marble, what will be the results? Sir, there has been progressive action against our party in that metropolis. Not so much because of the difference of ideas between them and us in other portions of the State, but because of the fact that we have gone on encroaching upon their rights in so far forth as they are concerned, which we have absorbed and taken to ourselves; and just so long as we shall continue this course of proceeding, the population of that city will, as it aggregates, increases and grows, come into power in the politics of this State, not by adding to it what little of force it can gather in the country, but by being itself absolutely the power of the State, not yet deprived of the vote upon the general ticket, not yet deprived of the power of making laws for us. When they come to have the matter of government in their own hands, when they shall control the government of this State, and shall have once more got into the seat of power, I then look forward, and I look forward with a terrible apprehension and trembling to such a revulsion in the opposite direction from which we have been going for the past few years as shall lead us to a lower depth of horror than we have seen perpetrated in the riots in New York city. I fear, sir, that when we shall encroach upon the rights of these men as proposed by legislative enactment of this State a little longer, the time will come when they will turn upon us, when they shall have the numerical power under our system of government so to do, and get themselves in places of power and authority, that they will go a great way toward crushing out those matters which are near and dear to our hearts, which are within the limits of the Constitution which we are permitted to enjoy, and that we shall find ourselves, under the domination of the terrible hate and revenge engendered as it has been by past legislation so far as they are concerned, hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I submit to this committee, whether, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] in his last few pathetic sentences has adequately described, so far as human power can do, the state of things to which he proposes immediately and now to commit the citizens living in the metropolitan districts. If this body of men, when they get the power in the State are to work the horrors that the gentleman has just described, does not that gentleman by his proposition to-day, undertake at once, now, when it is not necessary to do so, to commit the citizens of these districts to the same horrors. Sir, that gentleman ought to remember the prayer of the Kentuckian. The story is told of a Kentuckian who was lost in the woods; that he encountered a bear; the bear was a powerful fellow, and he was afraid of the result of the contest, and he ran and made a great struggle to get away from him; but he found after a while that he could run no further, and then he turned and prepared himself for a fight, and drawing his knife, with a sort of a Kentucky look, he sent up a prayer to Heaven like this: "Oh Lord, help me if you can consistently, but, if you cannot help me, don't help the bear." My friend is telling us what the bear will do, and yet he proposes to bring on the fight. He proposes himself, by his own will, and his own motion, to help on the bear whose terrific growl he seems to have heard. Let me ask this Convention, has any man at any time, whom the organized men in the city of New York, have had the fortune to send to either the Senate or Assembly of this State, voted against the police commission by which the lives and property of the people of the metropolitan district have been protected. I ask my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris,] if a single man holding an official position from the city of New York, who has been ready in all respects to hold up his hands in his official position during the last six years, has cast his vote against it.

Mr. ROGERS—I would like to ask the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] a question. Did not Daniel E. Sickles vote against it? He was a democrat.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—When Daniel E. Sickles was a democrat, he thought as a democrat, and felt as a democrat; but having become a republican, he put away democratic things. [Laughter.] My friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] followed precisely the opposite course. As long as my friend from Richmond was on the side opopposed to the bear, he fought the bear; but when—

Mr. E. BROOKS—I have never voted, if the gentlemen will allow me a word, on the republican side; although the gentleman voted once on the democratic side, and then turned republican.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Not at the time my friend was studying Hindoo philosophy. I was not then on the democratic side. The point I take is this: that no man in the city of New York holding an official position as the representative of the city of New York in Senate or Assembly, has ever been opposed to the Legislature giving them protection for the lives and property of citizens.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I would ask how it is, that with the remonstrances of persons I suppose worth at least three hundred millions of dollars in the city of New York against the repeal of the police law, and the fire insurance companies in the metropolitan district against the repeal of the fire department law, and that every health insurance company remonstrates against the repeal of the health law, without a single petition coming from the city of New York in favor of the repeal of these laws, that we can assume that there is any desire for their repeal?

Mr. DEVELIN—The majority of the people gave their verdict last November in opposition to the New York commissions.

Mr. HUTCHINS—If that is so why has it not been shown by some petitions here in favor of the law?

Mr. DEVELIN—They have petitioned through the ballot-box.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I hold in my hand the annual message of the mayor of New York, elected, as we all know, by an immense majority since this Convention assembled in June last. I think his voice is entitled to some little weight in the Convention, and I would like to detain my friend [Mr. M. I. Townsend] for a moment while I read.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Go on; I am willing to learn.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Mayor Hoffman, on this subject, uses this language:

"Only the form of government remains, the substance having been transferred to various metropolitan district boards and commissions, all acting independently of each other and of the municipality."

* * * * * * * * *

"We can never have an efficient or responsible administration of municipal affairs, until all departments are made portions of one harmonious system, under the control and direction of the chief executive, who shall have powers adequate to his responsibilities. The duty of giving us such a government belongs to the Legislature and to the Constitutional Convention."

* * * * * * * * *

"I am glad to know that these views are sustained by many men of all political parties, and that many of those who have favored and sustained the metropolitan commissions concede the fact that it would be far better for general interests, if they were all parts of a system, of which the mayor of the city should be the responsible head."

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has confirmed the position I took that the men who sustained this abrogation of the barrier of protection that surrounds the lives of the citizens of the metropolitan district are the same body of men that vote the democratic ticket. As my friend from Richmond however confined himself to the views of this same John T. Hoffman (a very excellent sort of a man by the bye, I only wish his politics and associations were better). [Laughter.] I say as he confined himself to the views of Mr. Hoffman at a period when he had become an interested claimant for the favor of the disorderly classes in the city of New York and elsewhere, I will now take the privilege of reading to this Convention what this same John T. Hoffman said when he was recorder of the city of New York, and when he himself was less of a politician, in regard to this same metropolitan police. He said:

"We have one of the most complete forces in the world—a force that is approaching as near to perfection as ever can be attained in this city and county of ours. * * * If those officers who are charged with the administration of public justice, and the jurors whose duty it is to examine patiently the cases which will be submitted to them, do their duty, the laws will be enforced to the terror of the offenders, and to the protection of the community."

Mr. DEVELIN—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment by stating that that charge to the grand jury was made by Recorder Hoffman when the metropolitan police commissioners was a non-partisan board, composed of two republicans and two democrats. Now it is the other way.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—My friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. Develin] has seen fit to give me a suggestion. I would ask what has there been in the public action of that metropolitan police board since it became a partisan board, more than what it ever did before when democrats were members of the board?

Mr. DEVELIN—I was speaking about that. I was speaking about the fact that public confidence was not so great when the board of police commissioners was made up of members belonging to one party as when the members were divided equally between the two parties.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Now, Mr. Chairman, this whole suggestion of my friend from New York [Mr. Develin], speaking respectfully of him personally, is simple nonsense. The police commissioners owe their appointment not to a republican Governor, they owe their appointment not to the favor of the republican party, but they are elected by the Legislature of the State. This very winter, at the present session of the Legislature, they are to elect such a man as they please, because they have a majority, and if they chose to elect a democrat, as they undoubtedly will, they will then succeed in making a tie in that board.

Mr. DEVELIN—The gentleman is in error in some respects. Originally the members of the board of police commissioners were appointed by the Governor, but subsequently there was a compromise arranged between a democratic Governor and a republican Legislature and there were two republicans named in the bill, and two democrats for the positions of police commissioners. They drew for terms and one of the democrats drew the short term. Upon the arrival of the time when this short term expired, the republican party turned him out and put a republican in his place, so as to make the number three to one.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Then as our democratic friends have such a tremendous majority in the city of New York and such a tremendous majority in the lower house, they have the power to eradicate the evil, if they so regard it. And I can assure my republican friends that when democrats have the power, they have no scruples in the matter of exercising it to the fullest extent.

Mr. DEVELIN—Did the gentleman say that the democratic party had no scruples? [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—No scruples about matters in which they think they are right. [Laughter.] They have none of this hesitation. They never get their consciences up to so high a pitch as to side against their own party and make speeches against it, which my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] felt it his duty to do yesterday. If they cannot fight for the man they never turn in and help the bear. [Laughter.] Let me say in regard to our national affairs that it has been the misfortune of the republican party in the northern portion of the country that they have been timid and hesitating, and they continued so until in the providence of God, it was the timidity and half-heartedness of the anti-slavery portion of this country that emboldened and induced the men at the south, who never hesitated in carrying out their objects to believe that we were physical as well as moral cowards. That was the difficulty that produced our dreadful war. But when the south found we would fight, that we were not, in action in the field, a body of cowards, though our leaders had been cowards, the southern men would have been exceedingly grateful to have got out of the war. They felt very much like another Kentuckian in another fight—they wanted to be counted out. Sir, if the speech of my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] and the speech of my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], are carried down to the polls they will make glad those who differ from us in their notions of government. But, sir, I will not read a lecture to my friends on this subject. I do not speak for this purpose, and I leave it to my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] to read these lectures. He has a prescriptive right to do so [laughter], and I shall not encroach upon that gentleman's prerogative for it is as sacred as the right of a gang of rowdies to wallop their peaceful neighbors [laughter], for which my friend is contending; for he really contends for the right of local rowdies, who happen to be in the majority, to override and violently maltreat and abuse the God-fearing men in the locality who are in the minority. I wish to answer another of my friend's arguments. He did make a beautiful argument in favor of putting New York and Brooklyn on the same footing as the other cities of the State; and yet in the article which he advocates, he has made a distinction between these cities and the other cities of the State. Why, sir, this love of locality? How long is it since I asked this Convention to allow the Assembly districts to send representatives in your house of Assembly? How long is it since that question was discussed here? There was no love of localities then. It was "help the bear," and henceforward twenty-one Assemblymen, representing one political party, are to be sent from the city of New York to the Legislature. Assembly districts were to be swallowed up in the vortex of county representation. It was decreed by this Convention in compliance with the wish of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], though whether my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] voted with him on that question or not I am unable to say, though I strongly suspect he did, that there never should be another republican in all coming time in the Assembly of this State from the county of New York and the county of Kings. Where was this love of locality then? This love of locality is vastly like Pat's idea of the disease called the glanders in a horse. He was trying to sell his horse, and the man asked him if the horse had not the glanders. Pat was not quite certain as to whether the glanders was a benefit to the horse or an injury, and so he made the judicious remark, "If the horse is better for the glanders he has got the glanders enough, but if he is not better for it he has not got the glanders at all." [Laughter.] If it would help our friends, the democrats, to carry out their party views in regard to public policy to give the whole representation of New York to the democracy, my friends are ready to give.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] permit me to interrupt him for a moment? He alludes to some yet unperfected action of this Convention looking toward the election of Assemblymen.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Yes; to something we have passed upon.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I would ask the gentleman, how long it is since the framers of the Constitution under which we now exist, with the most emphatic democratic majority among its members, provided that the precedent of seventy years should be departed from, and the principle the gentleman now so much lauds was established?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—That is the action of the Convention of 1846, twenty years ago, and I will say that when that subject was on the tapis I voted for the system of electing Assemblymen contained in the present Constitution. This love of localities on the part of my friend is a new love. It does not pervade gentlemen except by fits and starts. But, sir, there is another reason why I am opposed to this whole proposition. I do not believe in autocrats. I do not believe in making the mayor of the city absolute. I do not believe, under the pretense of giving a locality the power of controlling its own affairs by its own vote, that one man should be elected who for three years shall be an autocrat, more absolute, if possible, than the Emperor of France himself; for the mayors of Brooklyn and New York and the conditions of this proposed article have a power never known in any community in a civilized country to be exercised with safety to the community. Such a power could never be exercised with safety to the interests of the community intrusted to one man. Why, sir, let us see in what period we are doing these things. Let us see under what circumstances the chairman of this committee defends this state of things. My friend has hardly got his coat brushed of the dust of toil and travel in coming from Washington, where he held a seat in the Senate, and where he voted to take away from the Chief Magistrate of the United States the very power he proposes to confer upon the mayor of New York, to take them away as a means of insuring the safety and well-being of the nation. If it was not safe to trust the President of the United States with such power as he was intrusted with, is it any more safe to intrust the chief magistrate of the city of New York with still greater powers? If my friend was honest, if my friend believed he was acting for the well being of this country in crippling the power of the President of the United States, I leave it for him and for his constituents to decide as to what has produced the change in his views and has led him to adopt the course he has adopted here. But I go beyond the gentlemen of the committee, and I commend myself to the members of this Convention, shall we not exhibit to the world a ridiculous inconsistency sending our representatives to Washington to cripple the power of the President of the United States by every vote and every device that our Representatives and Senators can bring to bear, and yet we, professing to support these men and sending these men there to do the acts they do, to confer a power upon the mayor of the city of New York greater in his locality threefold than was possessed by Andrew Johnson, two years ago? For myself, I believe that Congress is doing right. For myself, I believe that we are doing right in supporting Congress. I say another thing, that if men wish the triumph of the parties who are supporting Congress, let them show that they wish it by their works; because, sir, I believe in the scripture doctrine that by their works we shall know them. When a newspaper announces every day that it is in favor of General Grant, and yet thrusts a knife at the heart of every friend who sustains General Grant, I judge that newspaper by its works, and I tell my friend that if the people see men in a public position, sustaining the good men in this State hitherto acting with their party, striking a death blow to the best interests of the people who claim protection under the power possessed by that gentleman's party, they will judge such man's principles by their works. I understand what it is that our friends propose to do. My friend from Albany [Mr. Harris], and my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] mean to give over thirty thousand men who have acted with them in the city of New York, to the tender mercies of that mob which was guilty of outrage and crime in 1863. We have seen how this thing works. I have said here that allegiance and protection were correlative. I believe that nobody has disputed that statement. How has it worked in our national struggle? When war broke out there was a large body of men in the Southern States who were ardently attached to the union of the States. They did not hold with my friend here that a man owed his first allegiance to his locality, but that he owed his first allegiance to the government of his country. Yet they found that the government of the country could not protect them; and what was the result? These men were forced, for the preservation of their lives, to go hand and soul into the rebel cause. Men originally loving their government as well as the gentleman from Onondaga, and men loving it all over the South, were compelled, for lack of protection, to give their adhesion to the rebel cause. I propose to use plain language. Can a man live to-day in the sixth ward of the city of New York and not vote the democratic ticket, if he votes at all?

Mr. E. BROOKS—Yes, sir.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I will allow my friend [Mr. E. Brooks] to say so now, because he has changed his views from those expressed in the pamphlet that he had put out in olden time, and which pamphlet I have had the pleasure of reviewing lately. I think there was a time when my friend thought differently.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Never.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I have stated that it is perfectly well understood that in large localities in this State, if the government do not protect men, they have no choice. You must vote with the majority or your life and your property are in danger. Sir, as I have said, I propose to talk plainly upon this subject—in any thing that appropriately belongs to the discussion of this question. Unless some action be taken upon this subject the republican party of this State must expect to go to the wall. Well, sir, if we go to the wall, I propose to go to the wall with colors flying. I propose to go to the wall with my integrity, with my self-respect, and with the respect of every good man in the State who holds the same political faith as myself. Does my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris], or my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], believe he can go into any house of God in the State of New York and find there that the good men who meet about God's altar wish that men living in districts where they cannot protect themselves should be left to the mercy of the local mob? I tell my republican friends that if they do not retain the confidence of the good men in the State of New York they will have not only to go to the wall, but they will deserve to go to the wall, and much further than the wall. There is a feeling and there is a power of public opinion in the State of New York (I do not say there is in the city of New York); and that public opinion to-day, however unwilling my friend from Onondaga may be to follow it, says to this Convention that if there are localities in this State in which, there are, by the influx of men coming from other climes, but imperfectly educated and imperfectly civilized, and in which localities the powers are not used to protect the citizen, it shall be the duty of the central authority to protect them. God says you shall protect them, and there is but one power on earth which says you should not, and that power is the democratic party of the city of New York. If any man of my way of thinking regards the clamor of the democratic party in the city of New York more than he does the fiat of his God and his purposes, the fiat of public opinion in this State and the fiat of his own conscience, then we can be given over to ungodliness. I say that, sir, because, as long as men can be permitted occasionally to be elected who dare to doubt the democratic faith in the city of New York, they have said so—they say so to-day; and the cry has come up here, and it is a Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." The State of New York must protect us in our homes, our lives and our property, and, sir, we have no right to travel out of the record to do a wrong merely to satisfy the clamor of local politics in certain localities of this State. Why, does not my friend know that when you get the democratic members outside of this Convention they will admit all these things? I commend one word of consolation to my friends on the other side. There is in the city of New York a paper called the World, and it is understood by us, away up in the country, to be the organ of the democratic party. I read in that paper, a short time since, in a discussion between the World and Tribune, as to whether it felt that it was advantageous to society and the government to have the voters of certain wards in the city of New York govern the country, and the World replied that it was yet a problem whether any people, black or white, could successfully govern themselves by universal suffrage. This is the real opinion of the democratic organ. They doubt themselves. The exhibition before their own eyes loads them to do it. I will not allude to private conversations, because that would not be proper; but how many are sitting in this hall, coming here with the democratic stamp upon them, labeled with democracy sufficient to pass the examination of the United States custom house officer, have said over and over again that they believe that this experiment of popular government is a failure. One respected friend of mine added the word "devilish," saying that it was a "deviliah failure." And, sir, if the votes of such localities are to be taken as the vote of the people who are to carry out the principles of popular government, I do not know who would not adopt the sentiment quoted, if not the expletive, when the democratic press states that their own people are unfit to govern themselves, that popular sovereignty is a stupendous failure. But I stand here to-day as much of a believer in popular government as Michael Hoffman was in 1846. I am as much a believer in popular government as Thomas Jefferson was in olden times, or as Daniel D. Tompkins was in still later times. But when you get into one pot a collection from every portion of Europe, and Asia and Africa, some of them so bad that they cannot live at home, and the fugitives from every portion of our own country, I have no doubt but that the State should exercise some supervision over the boiling, and occasionally stir up the pot.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I suppose the good in that pot were the thirty thousand republicans.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—No matter how many thousand voters. I do not care. The fewer there are who need protection, the more incumbent it is upon us that protection should be provided.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—How about Troy?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I talked about Troy yesterday. We have work in Troy that can be performed by a body of men that came there without inquiring into their previous character, and that body has created a state of society such that there are wards in the city in which there is no possible protection by any regular exercise of local power to preserve good order. I spoke more fully on this subject yesterday, and my friend must excuse me if I abstain from further talking upon that subject now. I have another thing that I wish to say to my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. We have had under the administration of my friend from Onondaga as the leader of this house, a position to which he is justly entitled, from his experience, and from the accuracy of his general notions of government, we have had probably thirty pages of our book, where the discussions of this Convention are printed and perpetuated, delivered to us, arguing against the policy of legislating in the Constitution. My friend has told us that what you put in the Constitution stays there forever, or until the Constitution is changed, and that exigencies may arise that shall render it utterly undesirable that these provisions shall remain in the Constitution. I confess, as my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] said yesterday in the first part of his remarks, in answer to me, that I was "amazed" when I found my friend putting his hand to a whole book of legislation in regard to cities. What has made this change? It was wrong to legislate about charities. It was wrong to legislate about the school system; but it is right to legislate about the cities, and the more minutely the better. Sir, I wish myself, individually, to stand well before that portion of the people of the State who have ordinarily acted in politics with myself. I have said thus much not only with a view to urge upon this Convention the right which we living in the metropolitan districts have to protection, but for the purpose of vindicating my action in regard to this matter, to those whose praise I desire, to those who honored me with their votes in sending me to this Convention. If I have in any thing transgressed the rules that should govern me in a discussion of this character, it has been from no intention to do wrong. It has been from zeal which is, as my friends well understand, a characteristic part of my nature, and without which I should cease to be.

Mr. ALVORD—In rising to answer the remarks made by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], I think I will begin where he closed, and say to him, that in the few closing remarks which he made he has shown that he is one of the greatest of observers, for he has declared that my humble self am the leader of his side of politics in this Convention, and he, sir, in face and eyes of that announcement, comes forward and condemns me, his principal. I think that I ought to bow my thanks to the gentleman from Rensselaer, for giving me the high, enviable position in which he has placed me. I hope that other opinions will agree with his in the Convention, but I very seriously doubt that for any thing that I have done in the Convention I should receive any thing more than the single vote from the gentleman from Rensselaer. I wish to be understood by the gentleman from Rensselaer, and by this committee and this Convention, because, for the first time in the history of our proceedings, so far as regards the fundamental principles which we were to lay in this foundation of the government of the State, there has been an attempt to control the action of any individual member of this committee upon the part of any portion of the members thereof openly in debate, by saying that thus you must act, and in no other direction, because your party, to which you are attached are in favor of that manner of conducting the affairs of the government of the State. I am very sorry, indeed, that my distinguished friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] and myself, have been read out of the republican party to-day. I am very sorry indeed, sir, but I desire distinctly to state where I stand, and that if I believed for a single moment in the principle undertaken to be engrafted upon our minds by the remarks of the gentleman from Rensselaer I would not stand up here to-day to advocate the position which I occupy. But ouside of and apart from all party considerations, outside of and apart from all considerations which can bind me to any particular class of men in this Convention, I simply come up here to state what are my views and what are my principles, and to carry out those principles in my action in the Convention in this regard. It is not a question of expediency with me. It is not a question whether or no the result of our action in one direction or the other here, will or will not cause us to go to the wall. If it was a question of principle in which I believed as heartily as the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], I would not only go to the wall standing upon it, but I would go to the grave, although I knew that it might be yawning to receive me, rather than depart from principle in the organic law of the State, and cater to the idea of expediency. I spoke in reference to the effect of past legislation, and continued legislation of this State in reference to this question of commissions, not in a threatening way, for the purpose of conveying the idea that they were rapidly hurrying the party out of existence, so much as to say to the men of this Convention that it is my honest belief that if they stand up and undertake to protect this idea of theirs, then of necessity that party must fall. They must go to the wall, I care not what the party is; I care not how high it may stand in the estimation of the people of the country, if it is not entirely and absolutely grounded on principle, it must in the long run and in the end be ruined; and it deserves so to be. I can tell the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], so far as it regards this matter which he undertakes to come in here with as the creed, a part of the creed and the doctrine of the republican party, that if this is to be the test of the republican party, if this is to be the great thing that the republican party are to stand by and cluster around, that he will find not only myself, he will find not only the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris], but, at least in my immodiate neighborhood, sir, he will find very many men who have stood up in the past and are standing up to-day in favor of the great ideas of the republican party, in carrying forward this controversy in which they have been engaged, who must separate and shake hands and part from him and the other portion of the republican party. I can tell him that there is yet left enough of that democratic element in the republican party of this State which forbids this encroachment upon the rights of the people of the State. Upon great and grave questions of national policy, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the past, those men have, and still continue and will continue to act with the republican party. They have not looked for this in the past so far as regards their action, they have not expected that this was a part of the creed of the republican party, and forgetting to how down to this portion of the creed, that therefore they were to be no longer considered republicans. I trust the gentleman will not read the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] and myself out of the party. If he does we have our principles left, and we may go on in the rear guard of the army of republicans in this State, and when they get into hostile conflict upon principles and upon questions of great advantage to the State, we may volunteer yet to aid them in that controversy. I have a right to go a little further. The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has made a characteristic speech here, it is true. He has made one in which he has undertaken to drag in all the former proceedings of this Convention, and undertaken to contrast the position of gentlemen now with the position of gentlemen in what he thinks are kindred matters at other times. I leave to the good sense of the Convention to determine whether there is any weight to be given to the arguments used in this direction. But he has said one thing that I deem it is right and proper that I should notice. He has spoken of the Congress of the United States of America taking away from the President certain powers which had been heretofore granted to him by the Constitution of the country. Sir, I have no question myself but what that exercise of legislative power on the part of the Congress of the United States is only to be excused—and I speak the words, sir, understandingly—is only to be excused in consequence of the great and imminent necessity of the occasion. I hold that when the very life of the nation is at stake, when the perpetuity and the very foundations of the government are threatened to be sapped and undermined forever, that then it is a duty to be bold and resolute, and to take into the hands of the people's representatives that power which God Almighty has given to any people to protect to the utmost their dearest and nearest rights. But upon no other platform, with no other base for the argument, can he or any other man within the limits of these United States of America plant himself as justifying and extenuating the action of Congress. But believing in the exigency, believing in the absolute necessity for the continuance of the government of the country, believing that it is a simple question of life or death for the country whether it shall or shall not be done, I, in conjunction with him, will hold up the hands of our representatives in Congress until peace shall come over this broad land of ours, and men shall return from their insanity of the past clothed and in their right minds, as parts and portions of the government of the country. I trust and believe that there will be no attempt on the part of the gentleman from Rensselaer, or upon the part of any members of this committee or of this Convention, to hold that this is a political test. I yield to him the belief, the consciousness, that he is right in the position which he occupies. All I ask of him in return is, not to believe that I have taken the position which I occupy simply upon the ground of expediency; but that the principle in the matter is that which I am aiming at. And I trust that this may be the result of the contention in regard to this matter, that we shall, no less than we have in the past, so far as the great and fundamental ideas that we have in reference to government, act together and for the benefit of the mass of the people. But I do say, and I repeat it, and I desire to be distinctly understood in regard to it, that I think this is a great innovation upon the rights of the people; that it has been done in violation of the Constitution of 1846, in violation of its intendment; that there has been a method of getting around that Constitution that was not foreseen by the parties who enacted it, and by the people who accepted it; and under that state of things there has been upon the part of the court of appeals of this State a sustaining of that innovation upon the intendment of that Constitution. Your judges, set aside from mere party conflict and party issues, look simply and plainly to the text that is put before them, and they see that there is no infraction of the text nor of any powers or duties that are given in the text; and they therefore take it, as it must necessarily be taken, that what is not absolutely prohibited may be enjoyed by the party which has the resulting force of the government in its hands. They, under such circumstances, no matter what might have been their opinion of the intention of the Constitution of 1846, finding that it failed to express that intention in exact words, as a Constitution should express it, have legalized by the judgment of that court the past action of the Legislature in reference to these questions of commission. I do not believe, sir, that there stands anywhere any man who looks upon this question who thinks or dreams for a single instant that there was any other intention on the part of the founders of the Constitution of 1846 than to take away any such power as this now exercised by the Legislature of the State over local municipalities or governments. I wish again to revert for a single moment to a portion of the argument of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. He undertakes to say that in the city of New York there are gathered together from the four corners of the earth all that is wicked, all that is vile, all that is vicious; and that therefore, in consequence of that fact, and because there are few good men like Lot and others in the times of old, still in that city, we should come forward and protect the city against the outrages of this set of men who are thus gathered together. If this is the case, if there is no other remedy under heaven except to take the course proposed by the gentleman from Rensselaer, then we do not go far enough. This description of men whom he has painted so vividly before our imagination here are men who compose a portion of the sovereignty of this State, and through the ballot-box they help elect your officers and make your laws. If they are thus vicious in their own locality, and in consequence of that vileness have to be controlled by the executive power of the State and the legislative power of the State here at Albany, concentrated together, they have no right whatever, conceding and granting that position, to enter into the beginning of the making of the laws which shall finally eventuate, so far as they are concerned, in thus depriving them of local power and position. And it resolves itself simply into the position which I first took, and that is that in a case of this kind attempting to filch away from a portion of the people of this State that which you grant to others must necessarily result in constant encroachment, until finally you will of necessity be compelled, in order to carry out your theory to its legitimate, ultimate conclusion, and have the fruits and the benefits and the advantages of what you have undertaken, you must take all political power away from them and govern them as a province, govern them as standing outside of the great body of the people, permit them to have no voice in the action of the people, no voice in the management of the concerns of the State.

Mr. SMITH—I had not intended to mingle in this discussion at all, and do not now propose to make any extended remarks on the question; but I rise merely to offer a few suggestions which seem to me to be demanded by the course which this discussion has taken. We are met, sir, in limine, by the question of right, a question which ought to be settled in the outset of the discussion. If we have no right to take from the cities, the counties, and the towns of this State the privilege of local self-government, then we have no right to go further in the discussion and consider questions of expediency. That settles the whole question. I understand the learned gentleman who first addressed the committee—the chairman of the committee who made this report [Mr. Harris]—to take the ground that legislative commissions for cities are an invasion of the right of self-government. I also understand the gentleman upon my left [Mr. Alvord] who has just taken his seat, to take the same ground, and to say, in substance, that this kind of legislation by the State is an aggression upon the rights of the people. Now, I have great respect for the character and opinions of these gentlemen; I differ from them with great reluctance, and when compelled to do so have great distrust of my own judgment; but I feel constrained to say that, in my judgment, the position which they have assumed is unsound. I do not understand that the original and independent right of self-government belongs to individuals as inhabitants of a city, county, or town. I believe fully in the right of self-government, but it seems to me that this right is fully realized, and the claim to its enjoyment fully satisfied, in the organization of a State under a republican form of government. We are entitled to this right as citizens of the State, and we enjoy it as citizens of the State, whether in city or country. The people of the whole State, organized into a State government, possess the sovereignty, and may rightfully exercise control over every portion of the State, including cities, counties and towns. It seems from the arguments which the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] and the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] have addressed to the committee, to be their opinion that the right of self-government inheres in the inhabitants of cities, as inhabitants of cities, independent of the authority and sovereignty of the State; and that any interference of the people of the State, through the Legislature, with their local affairs, is an invasion of this original, independent, and inalienable right of self-government. If that position be sound it ends this whole controversy. We have no right to go further and consider the question of expediency. We have no right to invade the great principle of self-government. But the position does not command my assent. I understand that a city or municipal corporation is nothing more nor less than a public corporation, created by the State, and deriving all its powers and privileges from the State. Under the British government, as we all know, a charter to a public corporation was a gift of the Crown. Under our form of government the people take the place of the king; they are sovereign; and the people, through their Legislature, create public corporations, and confer upon them their powers and franchises. They have just the powers and privileges granted them by the Legislature, no more and no less. The sovereign power that gives may take away. As against the government of the State, public corporations possess no original, and acquire no vested rights. The inhabitants of municipalities cannot truthfully say, "We have certain vested rights, or original and independent rights, that the Legislature has no lawful power to take from us; that to curtail our power of local self-government would be an aggression upon our rights." The extent and limitations of local powers and privileges to be conferred on cities, is wholly a question of propriety and expediency. Allusion has been made to the charter of the city of New York, and the rights and privileges enjoyed by that city in the early history of our government. The first charter was granted in 1686, and for more than one hundred and thirty-five years from that date the people of that city did not enjoy the privilege of participating in the election of mayor. For about fifty years after the formation of our government they were deprived of that privilege; and they never claimed, I believe, that their right of self-government was infringed. Some of our approved writers upon constitutional law have given their views upon this subject, and I beg to refer to them for the purpose of seeing whether these gentlemen, to whose arguments I have referred, are right in their position. Chancellor Kent, in his commentaries, on page 275, says:

"Public corporations are established for a variety of purposes, and they are either public or private. Public corporations are created by the government for particular purposes, as counties, cities, towns, and villages; they are invested with subordinate legislative powers, to be exercised for local purposes connected with the public good; and such powers are subject to the control of the Legislature of the State."

This is the definition of public corporations, including counties, cities and towns, given by Chancellor Kent, whose authority upon this subject will not be questioned by any member of this Convention. But the court of appeals have spoken on this subject. In the case of Darlington v. The Mayor of New York, decided not long since, and reported in 31 N. Y. Rep., at p. 164, that eminent jurist, Judge Denio, in pronouncing the opinion of the court, says:

"City corporations are emanations of the supreme law-making power of the State, and they are established for the more convenient government of the people within their limits."

A question arose in that case in regard to the power of the Legislature over corporation property. It was adjudged that the property of corporations is held in trust, and that the Legislature has the right to make any law they deem proper in regard to the control and regulation of that property. I will read a word or two, by permission of the committee, from the opinion of the court. It is very desirable that we be right on this question.

"A corporation, as such, has no human wants to be supplied. It cannot eat, or drink, or wear clothing, or live in houses. It is the representative or trustee of somebody, or some aggregation of persons. We cannot conceive the idea of an aggregate corporation which does not hold its property and franchise for some use, public or private. The corporation of Dartmouth College was held to be the trustee of the donors, or of youth needing education and moral and intellectual training. The corporation of New York, in my opinion, is the trustee of the inhabitants of that city. The property, in a general and substantial, although not a technical sense, is held in trust for them. They are the people of this State —inhabiting that particular subdivision of its territory—a fluctuating class, constantly passing out of the scope of the trust by removal and death, and as constantly renewed by fresh accretions of population. It was granted for their use, and is held for their benefit. The powers of local government committed to the corporation are precisely of the same character. They were granted and have been confirmed and regulated for the good government of the same public, to preserve order and obedience to law, and to ameliorate and improve their condition and subserve their convenience as a community."

Judge Denio, in the same case, says in relation to this passage which I have read from Kent:

"The expression of Chancellor Kent, in the commentaries, that where a municipal corporation is empowered to have and hold private property, such property is invested with the security of other private rights, is understood to mean only that it possesses such rights against wrong-doers, and not that it is exempted from legislative control."

I might read other extracts but it is unnecessary; the books all agree that these corporations are creatures of the State, and wholly subject to State control; that the individuals residing for the time being within the corporate limits, have no independent or original rights of self-government appertaining to their locality, separate from those of the State They have, as citizens of the State, the right of self-government, and that right is guaranteed to them, and they are protected in its enjoyment by the Constitution of the State. If this be so, then the only question left is one of expediency, and I do not propose to go into the discussion of that question. It has been, very fully discussed by others, and will probably be further discussed by gentlemen yet to address the committee. I only desire to say this in regard to the matter: that, so far as my observation has gone, and so far as I am able to learn, the police commission has been of great benefit to the city of New York. It was my misfortune to reside in that city under the reign of terror inaugurated and fostered by Fernando Wood. I witnessed those scenes of terror and violence caused by his police force of desperadoes, when, in obedience to his mandate, they defied the laws and made a brutal assault upon the new police. I have lain upon my bed at midnight and heard the guns of rioters as they traversed the city on their lawless and destructive mission! I have felt that insecurity of life and property under which the law abiding people of New York so long suffered. I have been there since the metropolitan police system went into operation, and seen the change; and, as the result of my own observation, as well as from what I have learned from other sources, believe the police commission has been of inestimable value to the city of New York. There is one other remark which I wish to make before I take my seat, and it is this: I protest against the assumption that the whole question of the prosperity and good government, and good name of New York, belongs solely to the residents of that city. I claim, as a citizen of the State, and as a resident of one of the rural districts of the State, that I have an interest in her welfare, material and moral; in her commercial prosperity, and in her good name. I have an interest in every thing which pertains to New York; not as deep an interest, it is true, as those who reside there constantly—but still an interest. New York city belongs to the State of New York; it does not belong exclusively to the permanent residents of the city. This fact is distinctly recognized by Judge Denio in the passage I have read. The people of the whole State have an interest in New York. Why, sir, every pulsation of the great heart of that city is felt to the utmost extremities of the State. How was it during the great riot? If the rioters in New York city had been successful, it would have extended throughout the State! There is not a village or a hamlet in the State of New York, where riot might not have prevailed had it triumphed in the city of New York! I have learned since, from sources entitled to credit, that in quiet localities, where law and order generally prevail, houses were marked out for destruction and men enrolled for massacre! The preparations were made, and the brutal mob waited only a triumph in New York to commence their work of destruction. And am I to be told that the people of the State have no interest in New York? They have a deep interest in every thing that pertains to her welfare; and have no right to abdicate the power which they possess, in the capacity of a sovereign State, over every foot of territory, and every citizen within the bounds of the State. But I will not extend my remarks. I rose mainly for the purpose of questioning the doctrine, that the right of self-government belongs to inhabitants of a city, as against the sovereignty of the State.

Mr. AXTELL—I do not rise to enter into any extended discussion at this time, but I wish to make an observation in relation to a remark which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] last evening. I listened with some degree of attention to his ingenious attempt to make it appear that he is perfectly consistent in his change of front in relation to the metropolitan police commission. It occurred to me that a good reason for his change of front would have been to have informed this committee that the class of persons who sustained him in his action at that time had petitioned this Convention to incorporate such a provision in the Constitution as would forbid that class of legislation and abolish that commission. I do not understand that there have been any papers laid on the table of this body representing any considerable number of persons who attended that great meeting of which he spoke, remonstrating against the existence of this metropolitan police commission, or asking that there shall be such a provision incorporated in the Constitution as will abolish that commission. I listened also to his remarks on the subject of the morality of cities. Now, I have not heard any comparison made at all in this discussion yesterday or to-day between the morality of the city and the country, except the comparisons that have been made by the gentleman [Mr. E. Brooks] and those who take the same views with himself on this subject. He did not yesterday, as in two or three instances formerly, repeat the stale witticism in regard to the earth belonging to the saints, but at the same time he attempted to repel what he supposed was an attack on the morality of the city of New York, as an invidious comparison between the morality of cities and the country. Now, I do not wish to charge any greater prevalence of crime or immorality on cities than in the country; that is to say, in proportion to the population of cities. There is a vast amount of crime in the cities. There is a vast amount of crime in the country. The difference I take to be simply this: that crime in cities is brought in close contact; the population of cities is more dense, and as the result of this there are frequently serious outbreaks. These crimes, scattered over a larger portion of territory in the country, do not interfere with public order as they do when the criminal and vicious classes of society are brought into close contact, as we know they are in cities. And that is the distinction. True, crime begets crime, vice begets vice, and it is possible, owing to this fact that there may be a greater amount of vice and criminality in the cities, in proportion to the population, than in the country. This is possible. And it is also true that there is a tendency among restless spirits, there is a tendency in the turbulent elements of society, to congregate in cities, and owing to this fact there may be required in the cities of this State peculiar means for preserving good government and protecting the lives and property of the people of these cities. I think one fact suggested by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] shows the necessity that exists for peculiar laws in regard to cities. He referred to the charities of New York. Now, with that gentleman, I have a great admiration of this spirit of charity that manifests itself in these public and private charities that are to be found in the city of New York and in all Christian cities and countries. And yet, does not that gentleman know, and does not every intelligent person know that in this land the existence of the necessity of those charities arise from the prevalence of crime? There are but few persons, comparatively, in this land, who would need the charities bestowed by those institutions but from the fact of vice and crime. And, therefore, when he points to the charities of New York as an indication of the benevolence and morality and piety of that portion of the people, we say that by this very fact he concedes what we claim, that there is an aggregation of crime and vice in that city and its surroundings. I do not wish to make any invidious or odious comparisons; that is not my design or intent at all. I simply wish to refer to the fact, a fact which is known to all, that the peculiar circumstances of these cities demand peculiar means for protecting the people, and for governing these cities. I wish also to refer to the statement made in relation to the case of ex-Governor Morgan. The gentleman, [Mr. Brooks] tells us that the former mayor of that city only wished to do what Governor Morgan actually did; and he seemed to think it was a complete answer to the argument of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. Now, the difference between what Governor Morgan did, and what the mayor of that city desired to do, was this: The mayor of that city said himself that he desired to send those arms forward; he desired it because he sympathized with the rebellion, as he said. He desired it—

Mr. E. BROOKS—If the gentleman will allow me, I made no such remark as to say that the mayor of New York did sympathize with the rebellion. That is an inference of the gentleman and not a remark of mine.

Mr. AXTELL—The gentleman misunderstood me. I say that the mayor of New York was an open sympathizer at that time with the rebellion. He had gone so far as even to propose to make New York a free city, to have New York secede on its own account. Governor Morgan surrendered those arms, or allowed those arms to be surrendered, to be sent forward, because there were other interests affected by it, not because he had any sympathy with the views of the mayor of New York, but because there was a large amount of property belonging to the citizens of this State that would have been ruthlessly confiscated by the Governor of Georgia. That was the reason, and I submit that there was no parallel between the cases at all. Governor Morgan, a loyal man, desiring to protect the interests of the State, considered it was best to allow those arms to be sent. The mayor of New York wished the triumph of the rebellion, and to aid the rebellion, and therefore wished to send them. Governor Morgan, for the reason I have stated, allowed those arms to be sent; but the mayor of New York, wishing the success of the rebellion, regretted that he had not the power to send them, and that he was held back from sending them. And I have no doubt that the action of Governor Morgan secured the property of citizens of this State. But if the mayor of New York had not been restrained by the police, those arms would have been sent forward, and the ships, belonging to citizens of the State of New York, would in all probability have been confiscated, as they did lay their hands on every article of property that they could that belonged to northern men. Another remark of the gentleman [Mr. E. Brooks] in regard to pugilism, attracted my attention. I refer now to his remark while contrasting the morality of the country and the city. He told us that these pugilistic encounters take place outside of the metropolitan police district, in that portion of the State where the State government has a more complete and direct control. If I understand the gentleman and those who act with him, they are objecting that the State has stepped in and assumed a direct control in these municipalities—this is the burden of their complaint. I suppose however that the State government has as complete and direct control within the Constitution over every portion of the State as it has in the country outside of the city of New York. Outside the metropolitan police district there is no more direct control exercised than there is in the metropolitan police district, and so I do not see the force of the argument or reference of the gentleman.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—In the country we send pugilists to the penitentiary; but in the city of New York they send them to Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. AXTELL—In referring to the mob of New York, the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] alluded to other mobs. He referred to a number of other mobs that have occurred in the history of this country; and he used this language, or something like this language, "mobs that had not so much provocation," or "mobs that did not have the provocation that the New York mob had." Now, I would like to know what "provocation" that mob of New York had? I ask for information. At that time, at the time when the mob began, and for days before, I had been performing, with tens of thousands of others, long and weary marches and doing some fighting. We were startled while confronting the foe in our front in Virginia with the news that a great riot had broken out in New York; that they were burning women and children; that they were sacking houses; that they were without hindrance moving through the streets of New York and committing all sorts of crimes and depredations. And for some time after that I was where I could not get any direct information on that subject; and I own that to this day I have never heard what was the peculiar "provocation" of that mob, and I have yet to learn what it was.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. AXTELL—I cannot give way, at present I cannot spare the time. I have never been able to learn that there was any peculiar provocation. I know that there was on the part of the government of the United States at one period of our history a violation of the great principles of liberty and the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence which did, in some instances, produce mobs, mobs however in which no lives were lost, or hardly a life was lost, mobs which even in their results showed the law abiding spirit of the people who believed in the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence. And it will be pointed at by historians and by political philosophers in the times that are to come as an instance—as an illustration of the law-abiding principles of the people throughout the northern States, that they did submit to the violation of every principle dear to them; that they did allow their State Houses to be put in chains; that they did allow the man-hunter on their soil; and that, even in their ebullitions of feeling, even in the swelling up of those principles of justice, which it was impossible to stifle, they did not sacrifice the miscreants who were doing the bidding of the slave-power under the authority of the federal government. This will be pointed to as an illustration of the respect for law in the hearts of the people—the loyal people of the great States of the North. There was no "provocation," so far as I understand, for the mob in New York. If there was I should like to be informed as to the nature of that provocation.

Mr. COLAHAN—I should like to ask the gentleman if he has had any experience in the sixth ward of New York, similar to that of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]?

Mr. BICKFORD—I believe the motion now pending—that of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]—to be the proper motion to dispose of this whole question; and I think it had botter prevail. If it prevails, the effect will practically be that the whole scheme, and all the reports on this subject will have to fail. I have but a few minutes, and I will take up the time until the adjournment in reading a few maxims which I think should govern in relation to this matter. They are in the form of axioms, and I think will be recognized by gentlemen around me. We have heard a good deal here about the great principle of self-government, and of local self-government; and I lay down, as the first axiom in relation to this matter, that we are here, members of this Constitutional Convention, for the purpose of framing a government for the State of New York—the whole State, and not for any portion of the State; we are here to frame a government for the whole people. I lay down, as a second axiom, that there is no right of local self-government except in the people of the whole State. No isolated portion of the people of this State can claim the right of self-government, and the only right of self-government which exists is in the people of the whole State. I lay down a third axiom: that the people of all parts of the State may rightly claim protection from the State in any and every part of the State. And I lay down another axiom resulting from that, that the people in any part of the State should not be remitted for protection to any local authorities merely. For instance, I, as a citizen of this State, have a right to go into any part of the State, and when there, have a right to claim that the strong arm of the people of the whole State shall be put forth to protect me, and that I shall not be remitted to any mere local authority to protect me. I lay down another axiom. A good deal has been said about comparing the cities with the towns. I say that the towns and counties in this State are held strictly under the control of the State. Every town and every county has such power and such authority, and no other, as the State chooses to confer. Another axiom I lay down is this: that the government is vested in the State, and not in any fragment of the State. Another axiom is that the Constitution of the United States under which we live, and which is the supreme law of the land, does not recognize any government inferior to that of the State. It recognizes State governments, and nothing lower. Another axiom is that the State has no right to abdicate the government of any part of its people, or its territory. It is competent, and it is its duty to govern all its people and territory, and it has no right to abdicate its functions. Another axiom is that all acts of government should be in the name of the people of the State—that is, by the authority of the people of the State. No act of government should be by the authority of the city of New York; but every act of government should be in the name of the people of the State, and by their authority. Other acts, not involving government, may be properly performed by local boards, or local officers. But if the act involves an act of government, it should be performed in the name and by the authority of the people of the whole State. Another axiom: the powers to be vested in communities that are subordinate to the State, are precisely such, no more and no less, as the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] has well said, as the people of the whole State, either in the Constitution or by laws constitutionally passed, shall see fit to confer. Again, in determining what powers should be or may properly be conferred on subordinate communities, the controlling considerations are, first, the public safety, and, secondly, the general good; and you have no right to consider any thing else. What is convenient, what may be desirable by the people of a particular locality, is not to control; it is the public safety; that is the supreme law. And by the public safety I mean the safety of the individuals composing the body politic of the State, of which the city is a part.

Mr. DEVELIN—If the gentleman will give way, I hold in my hand an invitation from the Governor and his lady to attend a party there to-night. I understand this invitation has been extended to all the members of this Convention, the members of the Legislature, and the military body which has been in session here for a few days. Under the circumstances, out of courtesy to the whole of us, who have, I believe, received invitations, and out of my consideration for the political interests of the majority of this Convention, if the Governor is to be the next Vice-President, [laughter,] I move that we adjourn until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move that the hour be four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. LEE—What hour is mentioned in the invitation?

Mr. DEVELIN—"Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Fenton at home from eight to half-past eleven."

Mr. LEE—Then we can meet at seven—

The CHAIRMAN—The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. It is two o'clock, and the Convention must take a recess.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the chair and announced that the Convention would take a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock P. M.

Mr. ALVORD—It is evident, inasmuch as most of the members of the Convention absent themselves entirely this evening, that we will have no quorum in attendance. I therefore move you, sir, that we now adjourn until to-morrow morning.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord to adjourn, and it was declared lost.

Mr. ALVORD—I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is no quorum present.

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—If that point is raised, the Secretary will call the roll of delegates.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I rise to a question of privilege. The clock in this hall is ten minutes in advance of city time and of the time in my own city, and I do not believe that it is yet seven o'clock as counted by any other clock except this. The difference of time may be the cause of the inattendence of members at this time.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would state to the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I Townsend] that this clock must be his standard.

Mr. ALVORD—I withdraw my point upon which the call of the roll was ordered.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I renew it.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

The name of Mr. Bell was called.

Mr. MERWIN—I desire, in connection with the name of my colleague [Mr. Bell], to state that he is detained at his boarding place by illness.

Mr. KINNEY—Would it be in order to move a division at this time?

The PRESIDENT—It would not.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I ask that the absentees be called, and I move that they be called five minutes from this time.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not regard that as a parliamentary motion.

Mr. BEADLE—I move a call of the house.

Mr. SILVESTER—I rise to a question of privilege. By the town time, I believe, it is now just seven o'clock.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair has already stated that that is not a question of privilege. This clock regulates this body.

The call of the roll having been concluded, the PRESIDENT announced that fifty-four members had answered to their names.

Mr. BEADLE—I made the motion for a call of the house, Mr. President, without any desire whatever to embarrass the proceedings of the Convention. I felt satisfied that it would show that there are almost as many members in attendance as were present at any time during the past week, during which we have done a great amount of business. I now withdraw my motion.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I suppose that by general consent we may now go into Committee of the Whole.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Spencer to strike out the first section; Mr. Bickford being entitled to the floor.

Mr. BICKFORD—At the time the Convention took a recess to-day I was very nearly through with the few remarks that I desired to make upon this subject. In addition to what I have already said, I wish only to say further, that if it is not the purpose of the people of this State to continue to govern every part of the State, we ought to apply to Congress to set off that portion of the State that we do not intend to govern in the future, and let them constitute a separate State by themselves. The State may be divided, and in that way, and in that way alone, can those portions of the State enjoy the privileges talked of here of "self-government." This concludes, I believe, the propositions which I desired to lay down here as axioms, and I submit, sir, that all the propositions I have laid down are self-evident truths, and that they commend themselves to the mind of every man on the mere statement, as containing their own proof. I wish to say one thing in reference to this matter of commissions for the city of New York, where it seems the principal trouble lies. The trouble, as will be seen on the statement, is not one which is without a remedy at present. It arises from this; not that the commissions are illy administered, not that the metropolitan district, or any other districts which are the subject of these commissions, is illy governed, but from the fact that for years past there has been a republican majority in the State, who have elected the Governor of the State and the Legislature of the State; whereas there has been a democratic local majority in the metropolitan district. This, and the uneasiness and conflicting political feelings attending it, have created the trouble. It may be, indeed, that the government of the districts subject to these commissions, has not been the most wise; it may be that there are great improvements to be made. But it does not follow that because there are improvements which experience has suggested and shown to be necessary, we should, therefore, in this Convention, do all the legislation on the subject of cities for twenty years to come. Let the evils that arise from time to time be remedied by the Legislature. At the present time there is a democratic majority in the House of Assembly. Very well, let them fix that matter up, let them make the required improvements, and I venture to say that if they will concoct a reasonable scheme, the republican majority in the Senate, and the republican Governor, will agree to it. If they will adopt a scheme of government for that district which will commend itself to the reason and common sense of the community, I apprehend that neither the Governor nor the Senate will manifest any opposition to it. At all events, let the democratic majority, in its wisdom (and they are mostly from that district), concoct a scheme which they think right, to pass it and submit to the Senate, and if it be at all reasonable, I am satisfied it will be adopted. This trouble, sir, is not without a present means of remedy. I apprehend that even the republican party are willing to concede that there may be improvements made in relation to these commissions. Complaints have been made that there has been too much disposition to employ republicans instead of democrats in the offices connected with the commissions. That may be true, but that is no argument against the wisdom of the system or against its continuance. I have nothing more to say at this time.

Mr. HARRIS—I am not disposed, Mr. Chairman, to struggle against the opinion that this Convention may entertain in relation to the merits of the article now under consideration. I assumed the duty with which the President of this Convention saw fit to honor me as chairman of this committee, with reluctance. It was not a matter that was in accordance with my own taste nor one to which I had given any very great attention; although I had even then decided opinions on the subject. I have brought to the consideration of the subject since that time the best powers of my mind and I have arrived at conclusions, in connection with the majority of the committee, satisfactory to my own judgment. I should be glad to see this article adopted. I believe that it is right, eminently right; I believe that it is wise, eminently wise. I should regret to see it rejected. The vote now impending taken is probably to be decisive of the fate of this article; and in that view it is to be more far-reaching and influential than any vote that has yet been taken in this body. I am encouraged to believe that we shall make a tolerably good Constitution. I believe that our work will be an improvement upon the existing Constitution; but I am very sure, sir, that if we reject this article and substitute nothing in its place which shall be satisfactory to the people more immediately concerned we seal the fate of our whole work. I am quite confident that it will be impossible to get a vote of the people of the State accepting the Constitution if this article shall be rejected. I regard that as a moral certainty. I admit, of course, that this should not be a controlling consideration with this Convention; and yet I think it should have some weight. If we can be convinced that this alone will save our work, and it is right in itself, then certainly there is no objection to its adoption. There is another reason why I desire that this article or something substantially like it should be adopted. I desire to take this subject out of the Legislature and out of politics. Sir, I think the Legislature ought not to be intrusted with this extraordinary power. Their exercise of it, for the last ten years, has been fraught with the most serious mischiefs. The corruptions of the metropolis have been transferred to the Capitol. The Legislature has been debauched by these influences and has become a by-word and a reproach throughout the country. Compare its reputation now with what it was before the system of legislation was entered upon, and any gentleman will be convinced of the demoralizing influence of the system. For this reason, sir, I have earnestly desired that something might be adopted in this Convention which should have the effect to put an end to this demoralizing system of legislation. Again, sir, I had hoped that this article would be adopted, and most of all, because it is right. This system of governing the city of New York is wrong in itself. It is vicious in principle, it is ruinous in policy. I should be glad, sir, to see this matter settled, settled upon sound republican principles, the recognition of the right of self-government in those portions of the State now subject to this system—a right which we all claim for ourselves. I claim the right to govern myself and to take care of my own affairs so long as I do not interfere with others. I claim that right for you sir, I claim that right for my friend, I claim it for my enemy, for every body. I claim it for the community in which I live, I claim it for the State in which I reside, I claim it for my nation. It is an inherent right, and any interference with it must always be pernicious in its consequences and ruinous to the party that adopts it. I desire to get rid of it as a political element. I think it is an incumbrance upon any party that has to bear the responsibility of it, too great an incumbrance for the party to which I belong and whose success I desire to promote. If you go on with this system, the time is not far distant when the city will rule the country rather than the country the city. We ought to be rid of it. But, sir, I am not going to struggle against the sentiment of the Convention on this subject. If they choose to strike out this article, as they seem inclined to do, I shall have no hope myself of the adoption of our work. I believe that the votes that will be controlled by this one consideration will be decisive of its fate. Before I sit down I want to say a word to my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], and to say a word for him. I have a very warm attachment to that gentleman. There has been an unbroken friendship between us for the last thirty years. I do not know that I ever had in the State a more decided or a truer friend than he, and nothing that has occurred here or that will occur shall interrupt that friendship if I can avoid it. I admire him for his many good qualities and virtues. He has undertaken to administer to me a pretty severe castigation. Perhaps I deserve it; but my conscience acquits me. I have done according to the best of my ability what it was my duty to do in this important matter. That gentleman is not very apt to give those who are opposed to him much quarter. He is a descendant of the Puritans, proud of his Puritan blood, and I have always regarded him as the best specimen of the New England Puritan that I had ever met. He is an embodiment of my idea of what the New England Puritan was two hundred years ago. His ancestors persecuted my forefathers and drove them out of New England to Rhode Island [laughter]; but I do not charge that to his account at all, and he and I will have no quarrel about it. The Puritans thought that they at last had reached the very truth, and that any body that opposed them was guilty of heresy and that they not only had the right to persecute him, but that it was a sacred duty to do so. Now, I submit to this Convention whether the gentleman does not exhibit the same peculiarities of character, the same spirit of intolerance, which distinguished his Puritan ancestors? But I will have no quarrel with him on that account—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that the ancestor to whom I claim most resemblance, Miles Standish, was as pugnacious as I am, and never belonged to the church. [Laughter.]

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—According to history, the ancestors of the gentleman from Rensselaer drove out of New England not only the forefathers of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris], but certainly a large portion of my and most of his own relatives. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER—I must detain the Convention. I must be permitted to express the grounds of surprise I feel at the disposition manifested to strike at the whole of this report by refusing an affirmative or approbative vote to the first section. Consistency, sir, is said to be a jewel, doubtless not to be paraded or flauntingly worn. But in deliberative bodies more eminently than in the case of individuals, it is an indispensable attribute to maintain self-respect and to secure just commendation. Let us consider then what we have done hitherto in the earlier part of our proceedings. We have refused to give to the Legislature power of control over certain internal affairs of towns and counties, and we have declared by general provisions to be incorporated into the revised Constitution that the boards of supervisors shall have exclusive control over certain matters which we have designated; and we have refused to allow the Legislature to interfere with or to exercise concurrent jurisdiction with these functions of the boards of supervisors. So that, for example, to take the case of my honorable friend from Rensselaer, who lives in the city of Troy, the internal affairs of his county cannot be touched by any action of the Legislature. But that which more immediately pertains to his local and private interests as a citizen of Troy is to be subject to the same mutations of legislative will as have hitherto disgraced the action of the Legislative body if the measures he now so earnestly advocates are adopted. Now, here is an anomaly that is worthy of a few moments' consideration. What are those great rights of self-government pertaining to towns and counties which it seems are so isolate and separated from the rights of cities that the Legislature may not touch the one and may strike down the other? If my memory serves me right I heard this morning the gravest imputation upon the doctrine of self-government as applicable to cities. That doctrine was scouted as the great primal heresy which threatens to invade all constitutional government not only in the State but throughout the Union. With what consistency, however, can those who have heretofore given their votes to grant to towns and counties certain rights and functions of self-government irrespective of legislative control, denounce the measure? Is there any thing in this article that is so obnoxious to censure that the very sniff of the word mayor shall excite the indignation of this dignified body and induce them to turn back upon the plan and principle of action they have heretofore advocated and sanctioned? The Convention will remember that it did not hesitate to make the registers of deeds for the cities of New York and Brooklyn constitutional officers, and on suggestion of the gravity of the interests involved, this assembly also made the register of the county of Westchester a constitutional officer. Is there any thing in the office of mayor of New York or Brooklyn or of other cities that is so worthy of contempt, so little entitled to the consideration of this body that the office as such and by name is to be refused a constitutional status? How can this thing be, when it must be conceded on all hands that the office of mayor of the city of New York is one of the oldest offices, historically speaking, known to our State? Gentlemen forget that it was from the first beginnings of wisdom, of moderation, of sound judgment, and practical sagacity manifested by the citizens of the ancient New Amsterdam and the early colony of the Duke of York that we derived those notions of government and independence (clustering about commercial prowess and municipal liberty) which finally culminated in the adoption of the Constitution of the State and led to the ratification of the Constitution of the United States. Now, sir, I am not one of those who, believing in the historical value of the early charters of the city of New York, have ever carried the doctrine so far as to say that those charters were protected by any Constitution to the extent that the Legislature could not modify the powers conferred by them, or seek to increase the functions which those charters were designed to secure. I am not here to advocate the doctrine that these charters contain political powers which could not be disturbed by the action of the State government. But I beg to call attention to the singular protection they have hitherto enjoyed. When the Constitution of 1777 was adopted, so sacred was the sense of justice that existed at that day that they added, as almost its final clause, that all charters theretofore granted should be sacred and incapable of perveraion or annulment even by the sovereign law then ordained. Need I state that the same security is preserved if any thing in stronger terms in the Constitutions of 1821 and 1846, I take it to be a matter of great and cardinal importance whether you seek to destroy a chartered right, or merely seek to give it the assistance that it is necessary it should receive] from the superior wisdom and power of the Legislature; but I do not propose at this late hour to detain gentleman in such a discussion. My memory enables me to bring out a fact which I deem of no little consequence. I happened to be in the Legislature in 1853 when there was great excitement, not only in the city of New York but throughout the State in regard to the corruptions of the local government of that city. And when a measure was proposed for the relief of the difficulties under which New York then suffered, what was done by the Legislature? Did they seek by a mere barren assertion of power to contravene the rights of the people in their corporate capacity, those rights of local self-government which they had enjoyed for nearly two centuries? I will not moot the question now whether they had a right to do it, but what was the fact? Why, sir, they proposed a new charter for the city, to take effect on its receiving a majority of the popular vote in that city: and I say that it is a necessary inference that by that act the Legislature recognized the right of the people of New York to certain functions of self-government, and that we are precluded at this late day from undertaking to set up the right of the Legislature to do any similar act, independent of the suffrages of the people of the city of New York. If the Legislature had the right by the exercise of a mere barren power to subvert those old franchises, why did they not exercise that power? Or to give this matter more pointed expression, and with reference to our immediate subject, suppose the Legislature at this session, or any subsequent session, had undertaken to abolish the office of mayor of the city of New York, do you suppose that they would have had the right, under the pretense of a special sovereign power to take away from that locality the right to select or confirm its own mayor, a right which has existed always in that locality under the charter, and which has never been denied, but always approved by the Legislature hitherto.

Mr. VAN COTT—Under which charter does the gentleman mean?

Mr. CONGER—Under either of the charters.

Mr. VAN COTT—Will the gentleman specify either of the charters?

Mr. CONGER—I suppose that the charter of 1730, commonly known as Montgomery's charter, confirmed the rights of the citizens in the Dongan charter.

Mr. VAN COTT—The right to elect a mayor?

Mr. CONGER—No, sir; to have a mayor, whether elected by popular vote or not; the right to have and possess a mayor in the exercise of that high executive function. But, as I said before, I eschew the constitutional question. I do not think it is worth while, or necessary, to press it on this occasion. That is a question that may be reserved more properly for the courts. But I will say to the Convention, I will say to my honored friend from Fulton [Mr. Smith], who read the opinion of Judge Denio in a celebrated case, that there is not a word in that opinion which would imply the right of the Legislature to abolish the office of mayor, or to abrogate the chartered rights of that city in this particular. The general expression of opinion given by Chief Justice Marshall in the interpretation of the Dartmouth College case, that a right under a charter did not confer political rights absolutely, and that those rights might be modified or altered by the Legislature, has but little to do with the chartered right of having that office of mayor in the city.

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman permit me to put a single question to him?

Mr. CONGER—Certainly.

Mr. SMITH—Does not that case to which he refers hold distinctly and explicitly, that all the rights and powers of the corporation of the city of New York are the gift of the Legislature, held in subordination to the Legislature, and that the Legislature has the right to modify and change them as they think best?

Mr. CONGER—No, sir; I apprehend that Judge Denio never uttered such a sentiment as that.

Mr. SMITH—If that is not the purport of that opinion, then I cannot correctly read or appreciate an opinion.

Mr. CONGER—I apprehend that Judge Denio never uttered such a sentiment, because that learned judge, after reading the history of these charters, knew too much of their origin to say that all these rights came from the Legislature, or that the right, as in the case I put, inhered in the Legislature. I beg my honorable friend and the committee to remember that I do not pretend to say that the city, under its charter, had rights to tax, or had certain other political rights which were always reserved under the charters granted by the Parliament or Crown of Great Britain, neither do I claim for the city, a right to tax independent of legislative sanction, for that has not been claimed by any one, and I should be the last to urge it. But I put it in this individual case because of the feeling manifested in the committee. I put the point just here—has the Legislature the right to abolish the office of mayor without the assent of the people? Now, I do not think it is wise, either in the present discussion or in the future handling of this question, to institute any sort of conflict between the city and the State governments, and I do not favor questions or animosities leading to any such divisions or contests. On the contrary, I say that to my mind it is our duty to close up this gap if possible, and to establish by some general provision of law a sufficient confirmation of those organic rights which the people of the city of New York enjoy, and by general provision to extend those local rights of self-government under general law, to the other cities of the State. Nether do I think that it is wise to look at the question in a partisan light. It may answer a present purpose, for certain political ends, to seek to give certain offices, by way of gift or emolument, to certain persons who could not get those offices from the people of the locality; but if you persevere in this method, without establishing any general provision of law, and say to the people of that city, "you shall be bound hand and foot under the will of the sovereign Legislature," you will awaken a feeling in the city that will lead to untoward results, and I, for one, should deprecate the occurrence of any thing which should lead to such dire results. I am too deeply interested in the order and welfare of the city of New York to desire to have this agitation go on, and I ask gentlemen, even if the proposed action suits their present purpose now, to consider, on the mere hypothesis, that there shall be a revolution in public sentiment, and the party now in power in this State, shall, in a year or so, cease to have the power to appoint to these offices, and such patronage should come from another and opposite source, whether there will be an alleviation of the evils which are now existing, and which gentlemen seek to cure? When parties get into power, who have long been deprived of it, and who feel that their rights have been infringed, are they always so scrupulous in the selection of their agents to execute their will? You, and I, and all of us, must see that it is neither wise nor expedient to undertake to chafe the fury of a people deprived of rights, and in a way which a prudent man would abet or justify. Now, sir, if there is any one consideration which should have greater weight in this Convention than another, it is this, that the next twenty years in the city of New York are not doomed to follow the rule of even the last twenty years, although we have seen in that time the most enormous strides in the population and wealth of that city; and the same is true of nearly all the cities in the State. How have our villages and cities grown? Before the next twenty years shall have rolled over our heads half the villages in the State of New York will claim to be cities, and to exercise chartered rights as cities. The whole tendency of our population is to concentrate itself in these large vitalizing centers, whether villages or cities. But, however it may be in other parts of the State, remember that the growth and progress of the cities of New York and Brooklyn cannot be checked, and remember that you have in those cities one-third of the whole population of the State and one-half of its taxable wealth; and then go home to your constituents if you can, with any show of consistency, and say—"We have taken good care of the towns and counties, but we have left this great district, destined to contain nearly one-half of the population of the State and fully three-fifths of its taxable wealth, to be held in the grasp of legislative power and plunder." Must I remind the Convention, Mr. Chairman, that in the earlier sessions of this body there was no topic so frequently brought out in its debates as the corruptions and the venalities of the Legislature? I need not say sir, that I did not indulge in censorious strains upon that body; I rather sought to explain how, under the unwise distribution of power as between the two bodies of the Legislature, the Senate not being a conservative body, but just as dependent upon popular caprice as the Assembly itself, that out of that defect these evils have grown. Having taken that position, I feel that I can with propriety remind gentlemen present here to-night that they have, not only in their discussions but by their votes, gone far to give their sanction to the popular impressions in regard to the course of the Legislature. Do you mean still to turn over the rich city of New York to a body of men who, if they do not sell offices for gold to undeservers, sell franchises and grants that are worth more than all the offices of the city and the State together? Do gentlemen mean to say that the right of self-government can be so illy lodged in the city that men must come up to the Legislature, some on one side and some on another, with thousands of dollars in their pockets, to be competitiors to get this or that grant of railroad or other franchises? Can the city of New York no longer be protected from this rapacity of country members combining with the shameless betrayal of trust, which the representatives of the people of the city are said to manifest? Now, Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary for me to call your attention again to what has been stated on this floor, that the taxes of the people of the city of New York have been frequently increased thirty per cent if not more, by act of the Legislature, for the purpose of carrying out the special desires or whims of some of the favorities of the legislative majority. Does my honorable friend from New York [Mr. Hutchins] and other gentlemen who represent here, or have the right to represent, such mighty interests, either of real or personal property, pretend that it is wise to continue this state of things, or do they fail to see that in refusing to give their assent to some general or organic provision of law by which the rights of citizens in these cities may be recognized, they leave them at the mercy of all the myrmidoms of corruption scattered throughout the State. These gentlemen from New York should remember that they have to pay their share of the tax which goes as plunder into the pockets of these publicans. But we are told sometimes, Mr. Chairman, that the property interests in the city of New York are antagonistic to the political interests of the majority. Well, now, if that be so, why should you fail to take cognizance of the fact and provide a suitable remedy? Will gentlemen pretend that this Convention was called on some mere general scheme of betterment, simply in pursuance of the organic provision which required the Convention to sit? Was there not a loud public cry for reform in certain particulars? Some will say that the people of the State of New York cared for nothing but a reform in the judiciary; yet I cite the voice and the deliberations of this Convention, heretofore expressed and held, to prove that the people of the State were deeply interested in checking the corruptions of the Legislature. Moreover, I take it to be an undeniable fact that one great source of complaint under the Constitution of 1846 was this very evil of conflicting interests in cities, as between the property interests—which my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] called the "law abiding interest"—and the element of population which he described as "lawless," if not worse. I confess that I cannot see why this Convention should adjourn without paying some attention to that cry. Is the cry of a million and a half of souls coming from that quarter of no account, either in your deliberations or in your votes? Is the interest of one-half of the taxable property of the State of New York of so little moment that the desires expressed by her tax payers in the city of New York—every owner of property, personal or real, that the taxation may be abated and corruption checked—is that cry not entitled to consideration, worthy of some remedy to be applied? But I will conclude, Mr. Chairman, very briefly, after I have drawn the attention of the committee to the fact that, if this first section which is sought to be voted down as a test of the sense of the Convention on the propriety of exercising political power over the subject, were yet to be examined critically, there can be but two exceptions taken to it by the most astute minds in this body; one is as to the use of the word "chief" as qualifying the executive power vested in the mayor, and the other as to the tenure of his office. Take out the words "chief," as extending, if you please, his "executive power," and take out the number of years for which the mayor is to serve, and you have got the fact and law, precisely as they now stand. Now, I ask gentlemen, is it wise, or becoming the consideration of a body that has been in session five or six months, to answer the public demand for the correction of an evil of this nature, on a mere quibble on the word "chief," as qualifying the executive power, or on the term of office whether for one year or three years, by a vote taken for the purpose of destroying the whole product of the labor, and skill, and industry of the honorable committee which you have appointed to investigate this subject? The thing, as it strikes me, if I may use the term, is preposterous; because, although you have one or two minority reports, there is no modification proposed of an essential character to the first article, by either, except that the minority report headed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke] proposes that the term of this office should be for two years, and the report of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] urges a modification of power. If I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Ordyke], who spoke this morning, and who has doubtless written the minority report to which I have alluded, he also fixes the chief executive power in the cities in the mayor. It is proper, sir, in this connection, that I should direct the attention of this committee to the folly evinced in the departure from the great general principles of local administration and government made by the Legislature of 1853 in the amended charter of the city of New York, and the greater folly, as it seems to me, which was exhibited by the people when, by their votes, they ratified that charter. Under the old charter the executive power of the city was vested in the mayor; under the new charter the executive power was distributed and scattered through seven departments, and we realized literally the declaration of the parable in the Scripture that, after having garnished and swept the house, we had let in seven devils, instead of one. I say, understanding fully the import of the assertion made by me at this time, and in this place, and I say it with the most entire sincerity, that such was the effect and the result of this legislative reform given to the city of New York. Prior to 1853, although there had been some petty stealings by the common council in the matter of the Fort Gansevoort and other properties, although there had been no inconsiderable corruption just beginning to show its head—although taxes were then supposed to be intolerably heavy, because of the rapacity with which this city property had begun to be taken—taken for the use of adventurers and unprincipled speculators—yet, immediately after the institution of these seven departments, there was not a man in the city of New York who owned property but soon felt how terrible it was to be under seven masters instead of one. I knew a case arising in the administration of the street department. A rescript was issued in reference to certain parts of the city, that all the pavements and sidewalks should be taken up and new flagging laid. What was the fact that lay behind that rescript? That the gentleman at the head of that department, with his confederates, had bought up or forestalled all the flagging there was in the market, and that, too, at a season of the year when it was impossible to get more, and he thus made a very fine speculation out of the power conferred upon him to regulate the streets and sidewalks of the city of New York. I know something of this, sir, from my own private knowledge, and private experience, gained as a tax payer of the city. This, if it were an only instance, may be deemed as a very light affliction, but all such enormous burdens, growing with its growth, and strengthening by the facilities left to corruption, must lie on the city of New York as long as you refuse them an efficient city government, with a head clothed with ample power, yet checked by the just obligations of his vast responsibility. I hope the committee will pause and consider; I hope it will not be carried away by the animadversions too unkindly passed on the political course of other gentlemen in this Convention whom we have honored with high and important functions as members of this committee. I hope that my honored friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], whose original Puritan ancestor, as he says, was not a member of the church, will so far remember the rules of religion and sound morality as to give to the people of cities the same measure of independence, and the same rights of self-government, not absolute, but restrained within right and reasonable limits, and with just constitutional safeguards put over them, as he will give to his fellow citizens in the county of Rensselaer, or as he will give to my fellow citizens in the county of Rockland.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Spencer to strike out the section.

Mr. VERPLANCK—Before the question is taken, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words to the committee. The motion is to strike out the first section of the report. That section provides that—

"The chief executive power in cities shall be vested in a mayor who shall be elected by the electors of the city, and shall hold his office for three years. He shall take care that the laws and city ordinances are faithfully executed. He shall receive, at stated times, for his services a compensation to be established by law, and which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall be elected. He shall not receive during that period any other emolument from the city. He shall hold no other office and shall be ineligible for the next three years after the expiration of his term."

Without attempting to amend the section of the report of the committee or to correct what any member may deem to be wrong in the section, the motion is made to strike out the entire section, and I suppose we are to regard an affirmative vote on this question as disposing of this subject, because most of the other sections the committee have reported are based upon this first section. What is it that gentlemen object to, so far as this section is concerned? Do they object that the mayor is to be the chief executive officer of the city? He always has been the chief executive officer of the city, the officer in the city who executes the law; so that there can be no difficulty here. What next? "He shall hold his office for three years." In reference to that there may be some difference of opinion. Some gentlemen may think this term of office should not be more than one or two years, instead of three years, as recommended by the committee. The only other portion of this section about which there can be any dispute is the proposition that the mayor shall be ineligible for the next three years after the expiration of his term. I desired, sir, to call the attention of the committee to the effect of the vote to be taken, and while I am up I hope the committee will pardon me for saying a few words in reference to the report under consideration. The object of the report of the committee is to do precisely what the Constitution of 1846 undertook to do—nothing more and nothing less. The Constitution of 1846 provided that city, village and town officers should be elected by the people of the respective cities, towns and villages; and it was further provided that if any office after that time should be created, the office should be filled by the electors of the city, village or town for which the office was created. Now, by ingenious legislation and, as I think, mistaken judicial decision this provision of the Constitution was set aside, and all that the report of the committee proposes is to carry out in unmistakable words what the Convention of 1846 intended to accomplish. What is that? Why, to declare that the several divisions of this State hereafter shall be counties, towns, cities and villages, and that no other local divisions or districts shall be made, and thus place the matter beyond the reach of ingenious legislation. How did the Legislature get round the Constitution of 1846? As they had no power to take away the election by cities of their officers, they devised a system of forming new divisions, which they called districts, and claimed that the Constitution of 1846 did not apply to such districts. New York, Kings, a part of Westchester, Richmond and a part of Queens counties were formed into a new division and called the metropolitan police district. Then Albany, West Troy and the village of Cohoes were made the capital police district, to which Troy, the Central railroad between Albany and Schenectady and the city of Schenectady were afterward added. The march of usurpation is ever onward, and its next step removed from the citizens of my own city of Buffalo their right of self-government. The city of Buffalo, the town of Tonawanda, and the town of Wheatfield in Niagara county were organized into a police district with the high sounding name of "The Niagara frontier police district." The law provided that the town of Wheatfield might have two policemen, and for their payment by that town. There never has been a policeman appointed in the town of Wheatfield, and the town has never paid one dollar for any such purpose. The provision of the Constitution of 1846 was in the case of the Niagara frontier police district evaded only on paper—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] allow me to call his attention to this fact. He speaks of the device to get around the law of the State and the Constitution, providing that all officers who should afterward be created should be elected. I think the gentleman has fallen into an error. If he will read the second section of the tenth article he will find it has this language, "All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed as the Legislature may direct."

Mr. VERPLANCK—Undoubtedly the whole scope and meaning of that article in the Constitution was, and the debates will show it as well as the letter of the Constitution, that the cities should have the right to select their local officers.

Mr. DEVELIN—In answer to the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] I will state that Judge Denio, in delivering the opinion in the case of the People v. Draper, in which this matter was decided, declared that the office of commissioner of police was an office that had existed before the Constitution of 1846 was adopted, and although it was called by another name, it had the same power as the previous office had; and Judge Denio used this phrase: "This court looks at the substance and not at the form, therefore we decide that this office having existed before the Constitution of 1846, and as the Legislature has increased its jurisdiction by adding the counties of Westchester, Kings, a part of Queens and Richmond to New York, thus making a new jurisdiction which did not exist previous to the Constitution of 1846, therefore we decide that this law is constitutional." It was by a trick that these counties were added, to escape the evident view of the framers of the Constitution of 1846. The idea of that Constitution was to decentralize the power. I appeal to the members of this body who were members of the Convention of 1846, Mr. S. Townsend, Mr. Harris, Mr. Murphy, and Mr. Bergen, if it was not the intention to decentralize and take away power from the city of Albany and give it to the localities. Against the spirit of that Constitution this decision was made, and it was made because an offensive officer was mayor of New York at the time, and not on the merits of the matter at all.

Mr. VERPLANCK—We have had the confession of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] who made this motion to strike out the section, that he was a member of the Legislature when the metropolitan police bill became a law, and although it was urged and carried upon party grounds he refused, as one of the party, to vote for the bill. It is commonly believed that the metropolitan police bill and the capital police bill and the Niagara frontier police bill were all conceived for party ends, and were passed to subserve the interests of party.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If the gentleman takes that position I say that I deny it most thoroughly. I deny it not only for myself, but I deny it for the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris]; and he and I were the two fathers of the measure.

Mr. DEVELIN—You were twins. [Laughter.]

Mr. VERPLANCK—I do not propose to have any controversy with my friend on this subject, because if I wished a quarrel with him I would have greater cause in remarks he has made to-day.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I thought I heard the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] say that he voted for this bill because from twelve to fifteen thousand of the respectable citizens of the city of New York, irrespective of party, said that the old police was corrupt, and there was a necessity for the measure.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The gentleman must remember that when the original police bill was introduced, it was intended to apply to the city of New York exclusively. The whole intent of the petitioners was to secure a change of the police administration of the city and county of New York. When it was found that such a law would be unconstitutional as applied to that precise locality, then came the time to annex these agricultural districts and other counties to the city and county of New York.

Mr. HUTCHINS—That is not the point. The point made by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], was that the metropolitan police law was passed as a partisan measure.

Digitized by Google

Mr. VERPLANCK—I believe that to be the fact, and I quoted the statement of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], who was a member of the Legislature of 1857, which passed this act, as evidence of that fact.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Then I say that one of the fathers of the measure — the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks]—who was at that time a member of the State Senate, said last night that it was not a partisan measure.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] says that he does not wish to have any quarrel with me. I certainly do not wish to quarrel with him because he carries too much weight for me. [Laughter.] It was the gentleman himself who looked me in the face and said that it was not denied that the capital police law was instituted as a partisan measure. The gentleman called upon me to admit or deny it, or I should not have said any thing if he had not addressed himself to me; and having done so I could do no less than to reply. I would not be uncivil to the gentleman at all, in any respect, or have any controversy with him. He discussed the question from his side, and I from mine.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I did not challenge the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] to reply. I may have looked at him, because it is pleasant to look at his pleasant face. [Laughter.] I know in reference to the metropolitan police bill that it was understood to have been introduced as a party measure and for a special purpose. I know after the bill had passed, when the officers came to be appointed under it, to prevent its being a party organization, it was arranged by a compromise, that of the four commissioners appointed under that bill two should be democrats and two republicans.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Allow me to correct the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck]. That bill provided for five commissioners. There was no agreement, no arrangement of any kind, such as is stated by the gentleman. They were all appointed from the republican party, all five. I believe my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] voted for them, for I recollect that Mr. Cholwell was recommended by him as a member of the board and was appointed at his suggestion.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The gentleman [Mr. Hutchins] is not altogether correct. The mayors of the cities of New York and Brooklyn were also members of the metropolitan police board.

Mr. HUTCHINS.—They were ex officio members.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Yes, sir; so that both of those gentlemen being democrats and members of the board according to law, the board was not composed entirely of republicans.

Mr. HUTCHINS—The board of commissioners consisted of five gentlemen who were appointed as republicans—Mr. Cholwell, one of them, being supported by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], and the mayors of the two cities as ex officio members.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Mr. Cholwell was not appointed as a republican.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Well, he was an American.

Mr. POND—I would like to ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] a question if the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] will allow me.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I rise to a point of order. This discussion is not pertinent to the question under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. POND—Is a question that I have not yet asked declared to be out of order because it is not pertinent? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN—The side discussion thus far has been out of order.

Mr. POND—My question is—

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that the Chair will enforce its decision.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair cannot yet tell whether the gentleman's question is in order until it has been asked.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. When a gentleman is speaking and another gentleman interrupts him by a question, a third person has no right to rise and ask the second person a question.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. POND—I presume so. I have never known a gentleman to rise but what the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] raised his point of order.

Mr. RUMSEY—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. POND—Then I ask the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] if he will ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] [laughter] if both parties in the city of New York came to the Legislature agreeing that the old system of police of the city was defective and should be changed, what they would have done had the Constitution of 1846 been precisely as it is now proposed to make it, and where would they have found their remedy?

Mr. VERPLANCK—Of course the gentleman from Saratoga [Mr. Pond] does not desire to have me answer that question?

Mr. POND—I should like to have it answered by somebody, because on the answer to that question my vote may depend.

Mr. VERPLANCK—We know that for several years the police commissioners of the city of New York consisted of two from each party, and that they so remained until a vacancy occurred by the expiration of the term of Mr. McMurray, that then the republicans changed the board into a political board by putting a republican in the place of Mr. McMurray.

Mr. DEVELIN—It was the Legislature.

Mr. VERPLANCK—It makes no difference how it was changed. It was changed by the republican party, so that they had in the board three republican members to one democrat. So far as the Niagara frontier police bill is concerned I know that it was introduced and passed through the Legislature as a partisan measure, and as there are gentlemen here who were here at the time of the passage of that bill, I challenge contradiction. The three police commissioners of the Niagara frontier police district, who were appointed under that bill by the Governor and Senate, were all republicans. A vacancy occurred recently by the resignation of one of the commissioners, and that vacancy was filled a few days ago by the appointment of a republican. I have no fault to find with these commissioners. They are highly respectable gentlemen. The fault is in the system, The people of Buffalo are entirely competent to select their own local officers, and the act taking from them the power to do so is in derogation of their rights. It is said that the new police is much more efficient than the old. Sir, inasmuch as the expense of the new police is greatly increased beyond the expense of the old, I do not see why it should not be more efficient. Who doubts that, with the mayor at the head of the police, with the same disbursements for the police now made, we would have as great efficiency as we now have under the police commissioners? The committee, in reporting in reference to the mayor and his powers, have carried out the views of committees from New York and Brooklyn, and with one single exception so far as my memory serves me, every body, republican and democrat, insisted that the mayor should have these powers, and that exception is my friend from Kings [Mr. Murphy] who doubted the propriety of giving such extensive powers to the mayor. But every body consulted said: "You must have responsibility somewhere. What we want is responsibility. You should give these powers to the mayor, and make him responsible for their proper exercise." Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat humiliating to the citizens of a portion of the State that they should be obliged to submit to some conditions that the rest of the people are not subject to, and that they cannot be intrusted with the management of their own affairs and the appointment of their officers. It is the same feeling that some of our Canadian brethren have in reference to the appointment of their Governor. An able and distinguished Canadian said to me a few days since, "I do not complain that we have not good governors, but what I complain of is that we have no voice in making or unmaking them."

Mr. GRAVES—If the gentleman will give way for a moment I will make a suggestion. It is quite evident that we shall not be able to close the discussion upon this subject to-night. Myself and others desire to submit our views upon this question, but I do not desire to submit mine to an uneasy committee who are quite anxious to respond to the invitation to visit the Governor this evening. Believing that we shall not be able to close this discussion to-night I move, without desiring to interfere with the rights of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], that the committee do now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Graves, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. RUMSEY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the Committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Cities, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith had instructed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave to sit again, and it was declared carried.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move that the Convention adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Develin, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment at ten o'clock A. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev Dr. WYCKOFF.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

The PRESIDENT presented a letter from Richard McHenry, transmitting a communication from Peter Cooper, relative to the government of cities.

Which was laid on the table.

Mr. COLAHAN presented three memorials from citizens of Wayne, Monroe and Cattaraugus counties, on the subject of a medical board.

Which were referred to the select committee on that subject.

Mr. FERRY, from the standing committee on contingent expenses, made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. Curtis, asking that a copy of the Debates of this body be sent to the Secretary of the Georgia Constitutional Convention, beg leave to report that they are informed by the mover of said resolution that he contemplated sending a copy of the entire proceedings of the Debates only.

Your committee therefore recommend that the Secretary of this Convention send to the Secretary of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Georgia a complete copy of the entire proceedings of this Convention, such copy to be taken from the number appropriated to the Assembly Library.

E. E. FERRY,
January 24, 1868. Chairman, etc.

The question was put on agreeing to the report, and it was declared carried.

Mr. AXTELL—I had a report of the select committee of which I am a member, designing to present it this morning. It was left in my drawer yesterday. It is not there now, and it is not to be found, and for that reason I do not present the report this morning; and if any gentleman finds a stray report I should like very much to have it returned to me. [Laughter].

Mr. VAN CAMPEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday evening at seven o'clock.

Mr. CASE—I move to amend by saying ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. We do adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow unless we adopt this resolution; and the proper way is to vote down this resolution.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—We have never been able to have a quorum here on Saturday and Monday during the sittings of this Convention. It arises from the fact that gentlemen have business that must of necessity be attended to. They stay as long as is possible, and as Sunday comes between those days they take Saturday and Monday for their business. I have a very grave objection to the manner in which we went forward with the business last Saturday and Monday, with only twenty-five or thirty members of this Convention present. If we must sit to-morrow and Monday, as we did last Saturday and Monday, I feel it my duty to give notice that I shall take advantage of the conditions which will arise, to adjourn from day to day.

Mr. HAND—We have consented to do business here without a quorum from day to day, and it is rather too late to impose that check upon the proceedings. I hope no more time will be wasted, but that we shall avail ourselves of every favorable opportunity to attend to business without interruption until the duties for which we came here are performed. A great deal of time has been spent here and it has become a matter of reproach, and I hope, therefore, that we shall go forward to-morrow as usual, and hold a session on Monday.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred upon the resolution offered by Mr. Van Campen.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the resolution offered by Mr. Van Campen, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 44 to 33.

Mr. CURTIS—I offer the following resolution, and ask that it may lie upon the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to report the following as an additional section in the article on education:

SECTION —. Instruction in the common schools and union schools of this State shall be free of charge, under such regulations as the Legislature may prescribe.

Which was laid upon the table at the request of the mover.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I call for the consideration of the resolution which I offered yesterday.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be instructed to strike out the word "sixty" in line twenty-one, section 18, of the article on judiciary and insert instead thereof the word "forty."

Mr. FOLGER—I move to amend the resolution so that it shall read "be authorized." Although I have been opposed to making the limit smaller than sixty thousand, I find that very many gentlemen of the Convention claim that in their particular localities it is almost absolutely necessary that there should be some alteration from the way the article stands now. I feel inclined to yield to their wishes in that respect; and still, I would like to have some latitude left to the committee in reporting the phrase when they come to report this article. That is the only reason why I ask the word "authorized" to be inserted instead of "instructed." I shall yield so far as I am concerned, my position; but I would like to have some latitude left as to the number of thousand that shall be necessary.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I have taken some pains to inquire of gentlemen, members of this Convention from different counties of the State, and I think the number which I propose to insert, corresponding as it does with the number in the Constitution of 1846, will be the most acceptable to this body. My friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger] proposes that the committee be authorized instead of instructed. I know not why that should be so. It is not compulsory now; the resolution does not propose to make it compulsory, but it leaves it as it is in the Constitution of 1846. It leaves it to the Legislature, that they may establish surrogates' courts in counties where the population exceeds forty thousand. As I said yesterday, I am perfectly convinced that, in counties where the population amounts to that number, it will be impossible, with the proposed increase of jurisdiction of county courts, for county judges to perform the duties of surrogates. I speak with some knowledge in regard to my own county, where the duties of the county judge will be greatly enlarged. There can be no equality in making the population exactly the ratio on this subject. In some counties, perhaps, in the State, with a population of forty thousand, where there is not much commercial business, there might be some reason for limiting the amount to the number of sixty thousand; but in our county, for instance, where the population is between forty and fifty thousand, we have a large commerce with Canada, by way of Lake Champlain, which brings a large amount of business into the county, and will tend thus to increase the duties of the county judge under the proposed enlargement of the jurisdiction of county courts. And so it is in regard to some other counties. In some counties the population exceeds fifty thousand, and a large business will devolve upon the county judge, and yet they come within less than the number proposed by the gentleman. If it be left to the discretion of the Legislature, that body would never pass a law unless the people of the county requested them to pass such a law. Therefore it is not compulsory, but it is only discretionary with the Legislature. I hope that the amendment proposed by my friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger] will not be adopted. I speak with some information on this subject, having conversed with several members of the Convention representing about the same number of constituents as myself, who will bear witness with me of the propriety of this resolution. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I can bear the same testimony as the honorable gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen]. My county has for a series of years contained a population varying from forty to forty-five thousand, and we have found it necessary to have a surrogate under the provisions of the Constitution of 1846. It seems to me that the proposed amendment is wise and proper for the reason that, in the county in which I reside, although it does not have an unusual amount of business either for a judge or a surrogate, yet we have found it necessary to have the office of surrogate.

Mr. HALE—I would like to ask the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], if he will allow me, whether the effect of his amendment, if adopted, will not be to leave the whole matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, to change it or not, as they should see fit?

Mr. FOLGER—I understand that it will.

Mr. HALE—It then amounts to nothing except to permit the Committee on the Judiciary to make the change if they choose. I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will not be adopted, but the motion of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] will prevail, inasmuch as the powers of the county court, and the duties of the county court have been so much increased by the action of this Convention. It seems more necessary now than ever it has been in the history of the State, that there should be in many counties a separate officer to perform the duties of surrogate. The county court will probably now be occupied more than it ever has been in the duties pertaining to that court.

Mr. SILVESTER—I trust that the resolution of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] will be adopted, and that the amendment will not. As far as my own county is concerned, there is a great necessity that the office of surrogate and county judge should be separated. Our population exceeds forty thousand by a very small number, and yet I was informed last evening by a gentleman who has had the charge of the business of the surrogate's office for the last eight years, that during the last year one hundred wills have been proved in the county of Columbia, about the same number of letters of administration have been granted, and about the same number of letters of guardianship, and the same gentleman further assured me that the business of the office in that county demanded the entire attention of one man, and that the surrogate himself had not been able to do all the business of the county of Columbia without the aid of a clerk. The gentleman who has just vacated the office, and has been surrogate of the county of Columbia for the last eight years, although a lawyer, has not devoted any time to the practice of his profession, but has given his attention entirely to the duties of the office, to the neglect of all other business. If the section as it stands in the report of the Judiciary Committee shall be finally adopted, there are more than sixteen counties in this State that would be prohibited from having a separate surrogate; a surrogate who should perform the duties of the office, separate from that of county judge. In my own county, I know that the county judge, with the present jurisdiction of that court could not be able to discharge the duties of the office of county judge and also of surrogate, and as we propose largely to increase the duties of the county court it certainly will be impossible in our county, and I have no doubt it will be in many others, for the same officer to discharge the duties of both courts. I trust, therefore, that the resolution of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] will be adopted.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—My own county will not be affected by any change that may be made in pursuance of the resolution of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], but I wish to call attention to the relation that the surrogate ordinarily bears in the rural portions of this State, to the interests of the community. It is the only court in the State of any importance, into which persons interested go without the aid of counsel; and in our surrogate's court, during my entire practice, the surrogate has been the adviser of widows, guardians, and others who were interested in the settlement of estates, and a very large proportion of the time of our surrogate has been taken up, not in the rendering of actual adjudications, but in the giving of advice which he has from time to time been called upon to give, and has given, to persons holding responsible positions, in regard to the settlement of estates, thus saving them from the burden and expense of employing counsel. I think that instead of restricting the power of the Legislature to create surrogates' courts, it would be beneficent for us to provide in this Convention, although I do not make a proposition to that effect; I only say this as illustrating my view in regard to the office of surrogates' court—it would be very much better to provide that there should be a surrogate in every county of the State. Indeed, I hardly know, if my own locality was cut down to a population of less than thirty thousand, I hardly know how we could get along without an officer occupying the place that the surrogate has occupied during my practice in the profession.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the resolution offered by Mr. C. L. Allen, and it was declared carried.

Mr. WALES offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to add the following to the article on education and the funds relating thereto, viz.:

"SEC. 2. The Legislature shall provide by law for investing in the bonds of the government of the United States, under the direction of the State Treasurer, the principal of the United States deposit fund, as it shall be paid in to the loan commissioners of the several counties."

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move to amend by inserting after the words "United States" the words, "and the bonds of the several cities of the State."

Mr. FOLGER—I wish to debate the resolution.

The PRESIDENT—The resolution giving rise to debate, it will lie upon the table.

The Convention then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. RUMSEY, of Steuben, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on the motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], to strike out the first section of the article.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I was endeavoring to show last evening that what are known as State commissions had their origin in parties; and I was told that this was not so in regard to the metropolitan police bill, because that bill was asked for by persons of all parties; but I refer to the statement of the gentleman from Steuben

[Mr. Spencer], in confirmation of what I claimed. He stated last evening, in his place that, being a member of the Assembly when this bill was passed, and that it was passed as a party measure. The gentleman has corrected me by claiming that he said it was passed as a republican measure, and I do the gentleman the justice to make this correction. Now, so far as the capital police bill is concerned it has been claimed I know by the press that it had its origin as a party measure. I know that the city of Schenectady has protested through their counsel against the additional expense imposed upon that city on account of the police bill. So far as the Niagara police bill is concerned, in addition to what I said last night, I have been reminded by one of my colleagues of a debate in the house of Assembly when that bill was under consideration there. The member from the city of Buffalo objected to the passage of that bill "because," he said, "my constituents have not asked for it; they do not want it; they know nothing about it; and they do not need it." "I do not know what your constituents in the city of Buffalo need," was the reply. "I know what my party needs, and that we will have." I ought to apologize to this Convention for saying a word about the partisan origin of these commissions. And my excuse for having done so is in the remarkable appeal made by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] to the republicans in this Convention on this subject. What was that appeal? He says—"You send your members to Congress, to Washington, to cripple the power of the President. Will you confer these powers upon the mayor of the city of New York? You sustain your members of Congress in depriving the rebel States of their power of self-government, and will you hesitate to withhold it from the city of New York?"

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Does the gentleman pretend to say that I uttered language of that kind?

Mr. VERPLANCK—I understood the gentleman —

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I will say to the gentleman that it is not first cousin to it; it has no relation to it whatever. I said that we sent our members to Congress to cripple the Executive in the exercise of the power that he possessed; and now we are acting very inconsistently with that position, in proposing to give greater power to mayors of cities in their localities than the President of the United States possesses. The democratic slang was running in the gentleman's head, and he has got that and repeated it instead of what I said.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not mean to misquote the gentleman. I made a memorandum of what the gentleman said at the time. I made it as I understood him.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I wish to say to the Convention, in order to set myself right, my friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] has once quoted from me what he had written down, and it had no relation to what I said in any possible shape.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I cannot have any personal controversy with the gentleman on this subject. The members of the Convention will correct me if I am wrong. The gentleman said more; he said that he "upheld every thing that the Congress did." I will not trust myself to comment here—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I did not say it then, but I do now.

Mr. VERPLANCK—You said it then.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—No, I did not, but I say it now.

Mr. VERPLANCK—He said it in his place as I have stated, and so the gentlemen around me say. I will not trust myself to comment on this subject here, because I think it is an improper place to do so; but I cannot refrain from referring to one single subject.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I beg leave to call my friend from Erie to order. I do not think it is wise to follow the wild and rambling speech of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], if this discussion is in order at all.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman is in order, and will proceed.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I should like very much to defer to the advice of my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], but I must be permitted to take my own course and follow my own convictions with reference to my duties here. The Congress is not only crippling the power of the President, but they are attempting to cripple the power of the supreme court of the United States.

Mr. HAND—I would inquire if Congress is on trial here?

The CHAIRMAN—Does the gentleman from Erie give way?

Mr. VERPLANCK—No, sir.

Mr. HAND—I raise the point of order that Congress is not under discussion here, and not on trial here.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] has a right to refer to any source of argument that he sees fit, that is not entirely irrelevant. He is in order.

Mr. VERPLANCK—These questions of order did not arise when the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] was pursuing this subject. These subjects are only out of order when gentlemen on this side of the house refer to them. I was saying that the Congress of the United States not only were crippling the power of the President, but were proposing to cripple the power of the supreme court of the United States. What is the relation of the supreme court of the United States to the Constitution and the laws of Congress? The Constitution is the will of the people. It is their law. Congress acts through a delegated power. They are the servants and agents of the people; and when Congress, the servants, undertake to create a law in contravention of the Constitution, the law of the people, it is the duty of the supreme court of the United States to decide whether this act of Congress is passed in pursuance of the Constitution. And to-day it is proposed that if the supreme court annul an act of Congress as unconstitutional, it shall do it by a two-thirds vote of that body. If, Mr. Chairman, the necessity shall arise, who doubts but that this Congress would require a unanimous vote to annul an act of Congress? Today it is two-thirds, next year three-fourths, and the year after it may require a unanimous vote. I refer to this not for the purpose of discussing it, but for the purpose of seeing whether it is not time for staid, steady citizens, who love their country, to pause and see what it is that the legislative power of this country is attempting to do and what usurpations they are entering upon.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman permit me a single remark?

Mr. VERPLANCK—Certainly.

Mr. SMITH—I would like to inquire of the gentleman, in what clause of the Constitution he finds any thing that inhibits the Congress of the United States from prescribing the rules and regulations governing the supreme court in their decisions in relation to this matter to which he alludes?

Mr. VERPLANCK—I do not propose to go into this discussion. I only refer to it; and in connection with it I want to call the attention of members to another thing which has just been brought to my notice. I wish to call the attention of the Convention to the tendency and effect throughout the country of this attempt to cripple the powers of the President of the United States. I read an extract from the Meriden (Connecticut) Recorder, and the committee will observe the effect of this legislation upon the minds of men who undertake in the "land of steady habits" to direct through the public press the minds of the people. It says:

"There was found a fiend so utterly wretched as to take away the great heart of the nation, Abraham Lincoln; is there no patriot worthy to strike to the dust the hateful tyrant who is loading our beloved country with the galling chains of a most oppressed despotism? The names of Abraham Lincoln and John Brown are written side by side on the golden scroll of immortality: and he who would send an impeached traitor, betrayer and blasphemer to the bar of God for judgment would write his name in imperishable letters beside that of a Washington."

Mr. HAND—I rise to a point of order. I would inquire how far this discussion is to be allowed and where it will terminate, if gentlemen are allowed to read long extracts from partisan papers?

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair cannot inform the gentleman how far this matter may proceed. When, in the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman shall be out of order, he will so rule; but he is not, in the opinion of the Chair, yet out of order.

Mr. VERPLANCK—It seems to be supposed by some gentlemen of this committee—

Mr. FOLGER—I would ask from what paper that is an extract?

Mr. VERPLANCK—It is from the Meriden (Connecticut) Recorder. I read it from the Buffalo Courier.

Mr. FOLGER—I did not know but that it was from a New York democratic paper.

Mr. VERPLANCK—No, sir. I was saying that some members of this Convention seemed to suppose that if we changed the manner of appointing commissions, the powers and duties under these commissions would be destroyed. These bills were enacted for party purposes. They were enacted without the consent, and against the will of the localities which they affect. They are an effective party organization in those localities. The committee will bear me witness that I have said not a word against that commission; and I can here bear testimony to the respectability and high standing of the gentlemen composing the Buffalo police commission. The police system is not more efficient than it would be under the control of the cities at the same amount of expense. It is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and should be changed. Our duty on this subject is plain. It is to place in this Constitution what was designed to be placed in the Constitution of 1846, and what has been defeated by ingenious legislation, and thus save the rights of these cities inviolate, and preserve the Constitution which we shall submit for the approval of the people from inevitable defeat. Gentlemen must recollect another thing in this connection: that the people of the city of New York, and the people of the city of Buffalo, will not be satisfied to have nothing said in this Constitution upon this subject. They ask affirmative action, that their lost rights shall be returned to them by this Constitution. There are other questions about which there is a diversity of sentiment, and you may get the main articles of the Constitution approved by submitting those things separately to the people; but here is a matter you cannot submit separately. If the Constitution does not have a provision giving back the rights which the cities heretofore possessed, it will be rejected because it lacks this feature. I hope and trust partisan feeling will not enter into our deliberations. I have made my apology to this Convention for referring to this subject, and I now regret that I have said a word on the subject. It would have been better if I had not said a word on the subject, but left the comments of the gentleman who introduced it without a word of reply. I trust and hope that in the spirit of kindly and fraternal feeling, gentlemen assembled here design, and hope to make a Constitution which shall make our State and principal city what they have been in the past—the chief State and city in the Union; that we shall so act on this and all other subjects that when the people come to act on the subject of the approval or rejection of this Constitution, there will be no political party in the State—there will hardly be an individual in the State who will not give his approval to the work we submit.

Mr. SPENCER—The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] has made so much use of the remarks which I made upon introducing the motion now under consideration, that a brief explanation is due from me. I remarked that the police commission of 1857 was a measure of the republican party. The gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] at once construed that to mean that it was a partisan measure. Now, I wish it to be understood that a partisan measure, and the measure of a political party, are two entirely different and distinct things. A partisan measure, as I understand it, is one which is made use of to promote the mere interests of a political or other party. The measure which a party may adopt and favor, is one which involves the policy of the government—one which it regards as the exercise of wise statesmanship. In that sense all the great measures of the government that have been promoted and adopted, have been favored by one political party and opposed by another, and in that sense they were party measures and not partisan measures. The charter of the government bank—of the United States Bank—was a party measure, and not a partisan measure, in the sense in which the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] uses that term. The tariff of former days, the principle of protecting home manufactures, was a party measure, because it was favored and advocated by one party and opposed by another. The enlargement of the canals of this State, was, in that sense, a party measure—it was regarded as the exercise of the wisest statesmanship, and was advocated by one party and opposed by the other. And so it has been through the entire history of this union, and every other free government; that the statesmanship of the government has been exercised in the adoption of party platforms and the carrying out of party principles.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—My friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], is entitled from me to the brightest and most distinguished token of my admiration that it would be possible for me to paint or write. His memory certainly is a possession that every man ought to admire if he does not envy; because, certainly, a memory that can lay up and quote a course of remarks such as mine, in the form which the gentleman's memory has preserved them, certainly is a thing of wonder. But the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], holds me up as having uttered sentiments that should fill the minds of this Convention with horror, because of certain proposed action—not real action—certain proposed action of Congress in regard to the supreme court. I deem it not inappropriate to recall to the memory of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] if it is not as far out on the subject of the supreme court of the United States, as in other respects, the position which he and I occupied, in our outset in political life, in regard to this same supreme court of the United States that he now proposes to enshrine and worship. The first doctrine that I ever heard announced from the lips of that gentleman, and the doctrine which I then believed as I did holy writ, was that it was the duty of a statesman to hold his opinions of the Constitution of the United States independent of the decision of the supreme court of the United States. That was in the school of "Old Hickory," and he and we interpreted the Constitution of the United States as we understood it, but it was never, until the day when the supreme court of the United States discovered that a portion of the creatures that God had made and had enstamped his own image upon, had "no rights that white men were bound to respect," that my friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck], learned to love the Constitution of the United States so dearly as he loves it to-day. I trust and I prophesy that if the gentleman's political feelings will hold on as they are on now—

Mr. FOLGER—I rise to a point of order. This train of remark is foreign to the amendment now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman is proceeding further than is relevant to the subject under consideration or a direct answer to the argument of the gentleman.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If the gentleman will allow me to finish that sentence I will go no further.

Mr. FOLGER—I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman will please come to order—the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] insists upon his point of order.

Mr. FOLGER—We will guess the other part of it.

Mr. KINNEY—I would like to hear what the sentence is that the gentleman was going to utter. [Laughter.]

Mr. POND—I would like to inquire, if we do not know what the sentence is, how we can ascertain whether or not it is out of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I will suggest it, and if the Chair rules it out of order I will not utter it. [Laughter.] It is that the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] parts company with the supreme court of the United States the moment that court begins to believe, or the majority of it begins to believe, that four millions of black people in this country have any rights which white men are bound to respect. If that is out of order I will withdraw it. [Laughter.] As I rose principally to reply to matters that were as much out of order as this, under the ruling of the Chair, I will forbear my remarks at the present time, except, perhaps, that it may be in order, as one gentleman [Mr. Comstock] has chosen on this floor to criticise, in a loud tone of voice, designed for the hearing of the Convention, the remarks which I felt it my duty to make here, as "wild and rambling." I will take the liberty to say, if permitted by the Convention, that I am exceedingly sorry that my remarks in their tone and manner, did not meet the approval of that gentleman, because—

Mr. COMSTOCK—If the gentleman will allow me. I think my expression was hasty and ill-advised, and I take great pleasure in withdrawing it.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If my friend puts it in that form, I am certainly satisfied.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I have the greatest respect for the abilities and motives of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. MURPHY—I do not know that I can expect, after the exhibition of youthful fervor that has been manifested on this subject by the venerable gentlemen who have preceded me, to interest the Convention in the few remarks which I am about to make upon it, still I ask the attention of the committee for a few moments, while I present some considerations of a general character. Although I do not entirely agree with the majority of the committee, and differ from them in some particulars or provisions of the section which is now proposed to be stricken out, I cannot consent to give my vote to strike out the section. The purpose of the motion is avowed to be to test the question whether there shall be any constitutional provision upon the subject of municipalities. I think there is no one, who is not perfectly aware that one of the principal objects for the calling of this Convention was to regulate by fundamental law the government of our great cities. From all quarters of the State the cry came up for something to be done to arrest the corruption in common councils, the extravagance, waste, and inefficiency in municipal government—the consequences of an ill-regulated system. We saw in our cities combinations of men for public office; the public service obstructed and hindered; the streets rendered almost impassable by nuisances of different kinds; the wharves dilapidated and unfit for use; and thus the greatest commercial interests suffering from the effects of a vicious organization and bad legislation. For years, I may say almost for a generation, the communities in our great cities have been struggling against the evils of bad government and seeking to have proper laws enacted at Albany for remedying these evils. Measure after measure has been passed for this purpose, and yet it seemed that the evils were increasing, and the hearts of good men despaired of reform being accomplished. I do not exaggerate, sir, when I draw this picture. I feel convinced that there is no one within the sound of my voice who will not bear witness to its truth, and yet it is here gravely proposed, when we are just entering upon the threshold of the discussion, to strike out this section of the article altogether, and summarily refuse relief. Now, I hold in the first place, that the evils which exist in the great cities, and perhaps in others in the State, arise from vicious legislation, and it is peculiarly the province of this Convention to adopt some constitutional provision which will prevent it. I believe further that the difficulty in our municipal legislation arises, in a great measure, from partisan action. I will not follow the example of the gentleman who preceded me, in denouncing any particular party, because it is not the fault of either exclusively; nor do I seek to shield those with whom I have acted politically. These evils are the result of improvident legislation through the political action of both parties; and the good and wise men of both must adopt, now and here, a remedy. The statutes which have been passed from time to time by the Legislature for the creation of commissions, were initiated by the enactment of the metropolitan police act, and I should be doing violence to history and to truth if I did not admit that there were great and grievous complaints against the management of the police force in the city of New York at that time. Those complaints, if they were not the sole cause, were the pretext for the passage of that act. The truth is, that the official patronage of our great cities both before and with the passage of the police law and since, has been so regulated by the law as to make office the great object of legislation, instead of the good and welfare of the people, and by the concentration of power, to place in the hands of a few men, the entire control of the patronage of those cities to be used by them for political and selfish purposes, to the utter destruction of the true ends for which municipal governments are instituted. Whon is to be seen in one department of the government of a city one man wielding the patronage of four or five hundred appointments, varying in the salaries attached to them, from one to three thousand dollars or more a year, ramifying all parts of the city, and constituting an army of men constantly working to keep their chief in power, is it not evident that the voice of the people must be overruled and the public interests be placed at the mercy of designing men. Such a state of things has long existed. It is evident there has not been a wise system pursued in regard to the appointment of these chief officers, nor, again, in regard to the appointment of their subordinates. Corruptions and abuses have thus crept in the system of popular elections in cities and have led a great many good people to seek relief in the other extreme, by measures which have been fraught with equally pernicious consequences. Such as I have already said was the origin in part of the police system which exists in the cities of New York and Brooklyn. That was found a convenient political machine, and having worked well for the purposes of a police, partisans rushed up to Albany and obtained commission after commission under the same or similar pretexts; transferring other portions of the municipal power from the people of the cities of New York and Brooklyn to the Legislature; boards for which there was no necessity, and which were created for the purpose of securing to a minority the emoluments of office and the political power which attaches to office. Now, I hope I offend no one by speaking so plainly in regard to this matter. I have myself seen the means by which these measures, year after year, for the last few years have been enacted; and I have seen that they have had their origin, not in a regard for the public good, but in considerations of private advantage. What has been the consequence? Those cities now lie bleeding from bad management on the part of the local authorities on the one hand, and this most unwise and injudicious State interference on the other. Why is this interference injudicious and unwise? The Legislature create a commission to perform some function of local government and require a certain amount of money to be raised by law for the purpose of carrying out its objects; the commission proceed to expend that money as they please, the people unable in any way to restrict the expenditures. The people must pay as dictated here at Albany, and dictated I must repeat, not always with the purest motives, or for the best ends. Thus these boards are the most extravagant way of managing the public affairs and the most despotic. Placed as it were above all control of the community in which they live, they exercise their powers only in obedience to the wishes of their masters at Albany, feeling satisfied that as long as they do that, they will be safe in their places. This system, bad as it is, when there are two different parties in power, one in the city and the other in the State, becomes much worse when both are of the same political character. Should our cities be left thus at the mercy of shifting legislation for mere party purposes, or should they be regulated by wise constitutional provisions? I did not have the pleasure of hearing what was said upon this subject by the able chairman of the committee, but I have heard much said since I have been in the room in reference to local government. What is local government as sought for by the friends of municipal reform? It is not, as the delegate from Fulton [Mr. Smith] argued, a right of government independently of the State. All that the cities of New York and Brooklyn have claimed in that respect is that they should have the same right of local government as other portions of the State. They insist that if it be proper to retain in the Legislature the power of appointing health officers, police officers, or any other officers in those cities, in consequence of their duties being of a general and not a local character, the same provision be made applicable equally to each and every part of the State, and to all communities alike. They believe, however, that these duties will be best performed by officers appointed by the communities where the duties are to be performed. It is objected that this mode of election or appointment is an abdication of the sovereign power of the State over the subject. Why, sir, your whole Constitution wherever it confers the right of election upon the local constituencies is an abdication of State sovereignty in this sense. The provisions in the present Constitution, proposed to be repeated in the one we are now forming, that towns and counties shall have the right to elect their own officers, abdicate on the part of the State in the same way as is now proposed in regard to cities any power or control in the selection of officers. But there is no abdication of sovereignty in either case. You only commit the administration of the local laws to the people in the different localities who have the principal interest in their proper administration. We claim that the people of the cities are as capable in this respect, in regard to their localities, as the people of the different towns and counties in the State are in regard to their interests and in this sense have the same right. There is as much interest felt, and prudence observed among the inhabitants of the cities, in regard to their local affairs, as by the people in the rural parts of the State, and both should receive the same consideration. Any discrimination against cities in this respect is a flagrant wrong to republican government. There is not that difference which is claimed by some between men in the rural districts and men in cities. I am tired of the stuff which I hear here about citizens of foreign birth in our cities, that they are not to be trusted with a vote or with taking any part in local government, although identified by citizenship, family, relationship and business with the place. I have no appeals to make in their favor particularly, but I aver here, from a long knowledge, political and otherwise, of the subject, that the mass of the voters in the cities, when left free from this corrupting official patronage which influences alike the country and the city, vote as intelligently and with as much regard for the interests of the community as do any other class of our people. Popular government will be vindicated only by giving the people of the localities the ultimate control in the selection of the persons who are to serve them in official capacities. I do not advocate a multiplicity of elective officers in the cities. I think a portion of those officers may be elected, and a portion of them may be appointed by the local authorities, but by a distribution of this power in a way to break up the combinations and corrupt influences which exist under the present system. Mr. Chairman, I have long had my convictions upon this subject. What I speak to-day in regard to the general question of city government, has been confirmed by long observation. For full twenty years I have been endeavoring, in my humble way, to bring about municipal reforms. In order to have wise and judicious reforms, the laws in regard to cities should be modeled upon a general plan. I am no believer in charters, or special laws for this purpose, or in the old colonial patents to which some of my friends in New York cling so closely. I do not think that we are to look to the charters of our cities for models of good government. I would obliterate all that has been granted by the crown of England that is now in force here. Of course cities may have chartered rights of property; they have had lands given them and ferry franchises, and other rights of property, which, as a matter of course, belong to them and are not to be disturbed; but so far as regards the matter of government, the manner in which the city shall be governed, that belongs to the sovereign people of the State to determine. It is by legislating in continuation of this system of special charters, that we have fallen into our present difficulties. Our legislation is different for each city. Those interested in incorporating a city come up to Albany and beleaguer the Legislature for a charter, or for amendments to a charter, with provisions designed to carry out their own particular purposes. The great body of the representatives of the State feeling no interest or concern in the bill, in consequence of its local operation, say in substance to those who seek it, "take what you want," and they do take it by default, nobody opposing it. The consequence is that we have a great body of incongruous legislation in regard to cities, each one having its own peculiar forms and provisions. We will not get rid of these evils until we organize our cities upon some general plan, for which purpose, however, I would classify them, that is, I would say that all cities with a population of over 250,000 should have certain officers and powers, and those with a population over 50,000 and less than 250,000 other powers and officers. With such general laws for the government of cities there would not be that constant special legislation which is destroying entirely the efficiency of the city governments, and by which the charters are made the tools or instruments of corrupt and mercenary men to carry out their purposes. Well, how are we to secure these general laws? The Legislature will not pass them, unless you put a mandate to that effect in this Constitution. We have adopted this principle in regard to other corporations, and therefore there is no want of a good precedent on the subject.

Mr. GRAVES—Having had the honor through the courtesy of the President of this Convention to be placed upon this committee whose majority report we are now discussing, I feel at liberty to suggest some views which I now entertain, based upon the facts that have been elicited during the time that we have been engaged in the labors of that committee. Coming, sir, as you are aware, from a rural district with no particular knowledge of the administration of the government of the city of New York, and with no other knowledge of the laws on that subject than such general knowledge as a lawyer usually obtains by reading the session laws in his office after their passage, and feeling no other interest in the subject than a desire that the city of New York, in common with all other parts of the State, should be governed by laws which should subserve its general interests, my attention was not necessarily called to the subject before, so that when I came as a member of this committee to the discharge of the duties which I was called upon to perform, I came only impressed with the general doctrine which I had imbibed in early life, and which has always seemed to me a cardinal principle of the government of our country, that the people thereof, and of every part thereof, were capable of self-government. With that general belief I entered upon the discharge of my duties as a member of that committee, with the desire to be set right if I was wrong, and to ascertain if there was any good reason why the city of New York should be taken from under the operations of the general laws applicable to the other localities in the State. And, sir, ignorant as I was of the operation of the metropolitan police law I found it necessary of course to make many inquiries of that intelligent and industrious committee, and I take occasion here now to thank the other members of that committee for the great patience which they exhibited in responding to the many, perhaps seemingly ignorant, inquiries that I made of them upon this subject. Now, sir, with all the zeal that I could manifest to attain the truth, I have not been able to find, either from the facts disclosed before that committee or from any argument that has been made upon this floor, that the doctrine that the people are able to control and manage their own affairs, in short that they are capable of self-government, is not the true democratic doctrine upon that subject. I do not intend to appeal to or present my views particularly to my republican friends here. When I came into this Convention I ignored all political feelings and partisan attachments, and I came here to associate with the members of this Convention as a body of men desiring to make an organic law that should subserve the general interests of the State, and that, too, without respect to the ascendency or defeat of either political party. Sir, in my judgment, party has little to do with the discussion in which we are engaged. Party is not the subject to be considered here. Party is subject to vacillation. The democratic party may be in the ascendency to-morrow; and I can see no earthly object to be gained here by alluding to the events that have occurred since the beginning of our late war. I can see no advantage resulting from calling up the calamities connected with that subject; or referring to the mob that made riot in the city of New York, or one that did the same in the city of Troy. If that has any bearing upon the question before this Convention, it must be an evidence of the inability of the people of the State of New York to control themselves. Now, if these reminiscences are introduced for that purpose let me ask whether the mob in July, 1863, or the mob in Troy are the only evidences of the uprising of the people of this State to carry out their particular views? It is well known to every member of this Convention that mobs have occurred in the several States of the union ever since the organization of our government, and in many instances they have not had any thing to do with politics? In some instances mobs have originated from selfishness and for objects of gain, and not from any party or partisan spirit or desire. Now, sir, no man has been found upon this floor who has for one moment justified the mob in the city of New York, or the mob in the city of Troy, and I can see no earthly object in alluding to those mobs as my able and ingenious friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has done, except to appeal to the passions of members of this Convention, rather than to their sound and sober judgment. I listened to the argument which was made by the able chairman of this committee, and I submit to this Convention, and to the candor of my friend from Rensselaer himself, whether he feels as if he had answered the argument made by the chairman of that committee? That argument is founded upon the principle that the people of this State are capable of self-government, and that they have the right to self-government. It was an able argument, addressed to the intelligence, good sense and fairness of this Convention, and I submit that it has not been fairly, intelligently and judiciously answered. It appears to me, sir, that the only question before this Convention is the broad question: Are the people of the State of New York capable of self-government? That puts the whole thing in a nut shell. Let us inquire first, what would be our position if this doctrine, this principle of interference with the rights of the city of New York is to be continued to be exercised by the Legislature of the State. It is conceded that the democratic party is in power in the city of New York, and that it has a decided majority there. Now, our government is formed upon the principle that the majority should rule, and that the minority should be subservient to them; and it is upon the broad, general ground that the majority are presumed to be right. We hold this doctrine in this country that the majority is right, and that the minority is wrong. Now, if that be the democratic doctrine of our government, and a true doctrine, then permit me to ask how, if the democratic party are in a majority in the city of New York, and the Governor and Senate of the State of New York are of the other party, if it is not within the power of the Governor and Senate to create commissions to control and manage the local affairs of the city of New York, without the assent of the people of that city? Is that in accordance with the general principle of our government of which I have just spoken? Is that the ground upon which our institutions rest—that the minority is to control the majority—for that is the effect of it? If the appointing power here is controlled by the party that is now a minority in the city of New York, and they appoint here those officers who are to govern and manage the affairs of the city of New York, I submit that if the people of that city do not acquiesce in such government, whether the whole thing is not antagonistical to the doctrine of self-government, and to the doctrine that the majority shall rule. But, sir, suppose that the republican party of the city of New York should occupy the place which the democratic party occupies to-day, and the Governor and the Senate should be of the party in the minority in New York, I submit to my republican friends here if they would be quite willing, the Governor being a democrat, and the Senate being democratic, and the republicans of the city of New York in the ascendency, that the rights and interests of New York should be controlled by the minority? Sir, I have lived over a period of half a century, and for more than thirty years of that time I have been identified with a political party, but I have never yet found a party that I thought was perfectly pure. I have never yet found a party in this country that I thought could divest itself of the desire of ascendency and power, rather than for right and justice; and while I have adhered to what I believed to be right, and while I have attached myself to the political organization that I thought was steering nearest to justice, I say I have never yet found a party, but what I thought, if I could have had my own way about it, I could have improved it and added to its principles of justice and right. Now, it is said that the city of New York, of all other cities in the world, is the most corrupt and abandoned, and that it is not competent to take care of itself, but that it really requires a special interposition of the State government. Who compose the population of the city of New York? It is said that the population is made up of every thing and every body, that the roughs and vagabonds, the thieves, the paupers, the felons of the world are congregated in New York city. Are they voters? Our laws require that when a man comes here and asks the privilege of exercising the elective franchise, he shall comply with certain conditions before it can be given him. First, he must have lived in the United States for at least five years, and in the State of New York for one year before he can become a citizen. He must do more than that. He must file in the office of the clerk of his county his intention to be admitted a citizen of the United States, and then at the end of five years he must call two of his neighbors, men who are acquainted with him, who know his moral character, who know what his conduct has been since he has been in this country. He must summon those neighbors before the proper tribunal, and there they must swear that they have known him for so long a time, that he has sustained a good moral character, that he is attached to the principles of the government under which he lives, and that he is well disposed to the good order of the same. They must swear to this, and he must swear that he desires to become a citizen and that he abjures allegiance to all other countries. All these conditions being complied with, you admit him as a citizen and allow him to go to the ballot-box. Now, sir, are our laws defective in this respect? And when these two witnesses go and swear to all that I have stated, do they perjure themselves? After all, does not the man desire to maintain and support our institutions? Why, sir, if it is true that our laws are worth preserving, if it is true that they are the result of sound sense and judgment, if it is true that these men whom we admit as citizens are worthy to become such under our laws, is it not also true that they are entitled to the right of suffrage? And such men, men who are citizens of this country and entitled to vote, are the men who approach the ballot-box; and foreigners, men who are not citizens—strangers, of no country, no clime, no religion, and who have not conformed to the prerequisites required by our statutes—cannot go to the ballot-box and vote. Now, after we have invited these men to our country, and said by our laws and by deliberate enactments that they are fit to become citizens, is it right, is it just, is it wise, to deny them the right of going to the ballot-box and of taking part in the election of the officers who are to administer the government of the localities in which they live? Now, sir, it is said that there is a great deal of immorality in the city of New York. I admit it, and I would ask the gentlemen who are opposed to this report to show me in the State of New York a place where vice and immorality do not exist and where vicious men do not congregate; and I would ask if there is any gentleman here who will undertake to say that the city of New York, in proportion to its population, has any more criminals than any other city in this State? So far as my examination has been made, I have failed to find that there are any greater number of criminals in the city of New York, in proportion to its population, than in any other part of the State. And, sir, what evidence have we that the people in the city of New York are not capable of electing their own officers to regulate the affairs of that city? The general statutes of the State of New York require of citizens of that city just as faithful allegiance to the common law rights and statutory provisions as they do in the rural districts. When money is to be raised to defray the expenses of our government, when common schools are to be supported, when all the objects of charity are to be exercised, I ask, does not the city of New York respond to these claims? Why, sir, the city of New York pays its taxes to help support every common school in the rural district, and very large amounts of the money which are taken from the thousands of toiling men in the city of New York, as well as from the capitalists of the city, goes to support and maintain and educate the children of the country. Now, sir, the city of New York erects its asylums. It creates its houses of refuge, it takes care of the deaf, the dumb, the blind and the insane, with all that warmth of feeling and charity and kindness that is manifested in any district in the State of New York. Sir, does not the city of New York contain as many churches and as many worshipers of our Creator as any other place in proportion to population? And have we not as many devoted Christians there as we have in the rural districts in proportion to its population? Yet we are told that all this kindly feeling manifested on the part of the city of New York to take care of its young and rising generation and educate them and direct their footsteps in the path of virtue and of right, is not to be credited to them, and that they are not entitled to the right to control their own affairs. Now, sir, in my opinion, the whole difficulty lies in something else. I must be permitted to add, with all due respect to the gentlemen of New York occupying high position in society and conspicuous places in this Convention, that I believe the whole difficulty of the bad government and mismanagement, if there is such a thing in the city of New York, grows out of the indifference of the capitalists in that city to take care of it. Sir, it is the grasping of the almighty dollar that controls the judgment of the city of New York rather than moral influences that are brought to bear. Why, sir, is it not true that men are there engaged in large and extensive business who pay no attention to the organization of government? Is it not true, and do not we all know it in the rural districts, that the capitalists and business men of high integrity and great moral worth pay little or no attention whatever to the selection of the officers of that city? Sir, they allow those of perhaps less moral worth, of less high standing and of less integrity to control that city, and they exhibit an indifference which, in the country, would be regarded as very reprehensible. Now, sir, permit me to ask who it is that selects the judges in the city of New York? Is it the Governor and the Senate who are instrumental in selecting those officers by whom and through whom the law is to be administered? Sir, if the city of New York is incapable of electing these policemen who are simply to execute the laws after they are made and after sentence has been passed by a jucicial officer, permit me to ask if the citizens of New York are competent to elect the judicial officers who are to determine and construe the law? There is no complaint on that score. I have never heard of any application being made to the Legislature that the judicial officers of the city of New York should be appointed by the Governor and Senate or that there should be a council of appointment for that purpose. Sir, they do elect their judicial officers—they elect their supreme court judges within that district, they elect the superior court judges, and they elect the common pleas judges—and they elect responsible gentlemen of capacity and ability to these positions. And yet we are told that, when they are allowed to elect these responsible officers—these men who are to give tone and character to the laws that are to govern the city of New York—these men who are to see that the laws are duly executed and properly construed—that when it comes merely to the question of appointment of a police to execute those laws, the citizens of the city of New York are not competent to do it.

Mr. AXTELL—I would like to ask the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] if he does not know of one instance, at least, in the city of New York, when a judge was elected to the bench of the superior court who is unfit for the position, who is a criminal and unfit for decent society?

Mr. A. R. LAWRENCE—No, that is not so.

Mr. GRAVES—I cannot answer that question unless the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] will refer me to the man.

Mr. AXTELL—I refer to Judge McCunn.

Mr. GRAVES—It may all be true; and is that all the evidence that the opponents of this measure can bring? Is that the only case that they can produce in the city of New York for twenty years? If so—

Mr. E. BROOKS—I would like to suggest to the gentleman [Mr. Axtell] that there was a judge in the county of Oneida who last year was tried before the Senate of the State, and was dismissed from office because of his conduct.

Mr. AXTELL—The difference is that the judge in Oneida county was removed from office when his wrong acts were discovered; but Judge McCunn was elected to his office after his criminal conduct was known.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. It is that this by-play between persons not upon the floor legitimately, cannot be permitted in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order is well taken, and the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] will proceed.

Mr. GRAVES—I am very happy to say, sir, that I believe the conviction of the judge in Oneida county was founded upon just principles, and calculated to subserve the ends of justice. I think, if the Legislature of this State had taken into consideration the conduct of Judge McCunn, the same happy result, perhaps, would have taken place—a result creditable to the city of New York and creditable to the county. Now, sir, without detaining this committee at any length upon this question, I desire to make two or three inquiries. Why is it that the city of New York is selected from among all the other cities of the State as incompetent to govern itself, when it must be conceded that the population of that city is no worse in proportion to its numbers than any other? And, sir, permit me to ask, if it is necessary to have an imported police—if I may be permitted to use the expression, in the city of Albany, for they have it here—are not the people of the city of Albany capable of selecting their own policemen? Are they not qualified to do it? Are they so lost to the sense of duty, and so unmindful of what contributes to their own interests as to allow immorality and impropriety to prevail in the city of Albany, and then appeal to the Legislature of the State of New York for protection? And, sir, let me go to the city of Buffalo, where my friend [Mr. Verplanck] resides. Although I have a limited acquaintance with the city of Buffalo, yet I do not believe that the character of the people of that city is so lost to its own interest as to be unable and unqualified to select from among its body suitable men to control and take care of it. Now, sir, if it is true that the people of the city of Albany, and the people of the city of Buffalo, and the people of the city of New York, and the people of the city of Brooklyn, and the people of the city of Troy are incapable of controlling their own interests, and incapable of selecting officers com petent to discharge these duties, then, sir, it appears most clearly and unmistakably true that the principle upon which our government is founded was a mistaken one, and that the principle of self-government cannot be sustained among an intelligent people; and if this usurped power is to be continued over the city governments, then, sir, it is an abrogation; it is an annihilation of the fundamental doctrine upon which our government is founded, that our people are capable of self-government.

Mr. HAND—I do not desire to controvert the general principles laid down by the gentleman [Mr. Graves], that the people are capable of self-government as a general axiom, and that so far as we can do it with safety in the government of the State of New York that principle should be carried into active operation. A gentleman upon our Committee on Cities asked me while we were discussing the subject if I had lost my confidence in the capacity of the people for self-government. Said I, "What portion of the population of the city of New York were born on foreign soil?" He said, "Not quite two-thirds, but more than three-fifths." "With regard to such a population," said I, "I have not lost my confidence, for I never had any to lose. If our whole population, or a large majority of them in the State of New York, were made up of persons of that character, I would not dare trust the interests of government to their control. I say give me an absolute monarchy rather than such a rule as we would have, and not trust to republicanism administered by the ignorant and vicious constituting your majority." I speak for myself in this matter and not for any party. The safety of republican institutions and the safety of self-government depends entirely on the intelligence and virtue of the people. I need not argue to this body that virtue and intelligence are the foundations on which our government must stand while it shall stand. Without these in the responsible majority, ours is the worst form of government on the face of the earth. And I mean an intelligence founded upon a careful study and years of experience in the doctrines of republicanism. That safety does not reside in the masses of the people who come here from foreign soils, who have never been instructed in their childhood, who have grown up under influences calculated to demoralize and keep them in ignorance of the true doctrines of republicanism. That is my opinion, and I express it very freely. Some of the statements of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] are so extraordinary that I cannot but review them. He says that in the city of New York no man has a right to go to the polls and exercise the right of suffrage until his character is indorsed and made substantially good, until he has a certificate of good morality, intelligence, and good behavior, and that this constitutes a perfect security against the evils I deprecate. Now, I appeal to the good sense of the gentleman from Herkimer in saying that I don't think he believes a word of it. [Laughter.] There are not five men in this Convention that believe that this is any real evidence of good character. Does he not know that the various criminals, men who are intoxicated every day of their lives, go to the polls and vote without hindrance, and that the same is true in t place where he resides no less than in the city New York? What does all this certificate of go behavior and character practically amount to? is not worth a farthing, and the gentleman kno it; and I am astonished that the gentleman shou have made such a statement to a body like th It might do to make such a statement in an el tioneering speech—

Mr. GRAVES—I would ask the gentlem from Broome [Mr. Hand] whether the immo do not go to the polls in Binghamton?

Mr. HAND—They do. That is where I get m knowledge of the fact, that, notwithstanding man may have a certificate from good neighbo as good as himself, and of as good character an principles, and as ignorant as himself of the g nius of free institutions, and as incapable as hi self of assuming the duties of American citize ship, he is allowed to vote, though he be t veriest scamp in the community. One gentlem has said that the average morality of the city New York—I mean the gentleman from Richmo [Mr. E. Brooks]—is as good, and that the intel gence and conduct of the people of that city a as good as that of the people of any other porti of the State. When he made that statement, a he has several times made the same statemen before this body, the gentleman knew that the were not five men in this room who believed word of it. It is not true. The gentleman co tradicted himself by some statistics that he ga to us two or three days ago, perhaps, when made this statement, and I am glad he gave the to us. When we have a beautiful edifice broug to our notice like the social fabric in the city New York, and our attention directed to its dele able masses, and our admiration is challeng by a person who speaks of the glories of th social fabric compared with other communitie the man must make one part of his high-wrough description so match with the other as to produ harmony and consistency, or we shall detect t fallacy of his descriptions and have a slight dou of their truthfulness. The gentleman spoke the vast amounts expended in the city of Ne York for charitable institutions and institutio for the prevention of crime—institutions creat for the purpose of aiding in the great work healing the evils that crime, neglect and vice h produced. This proves what I have new doubted—the existence of a noble class in t city of New York. But whence the necessity all these charities, I ask you?—charities equal amount to all the rest of the State. The expend tures of the entire State in the rural distric would not amount to one-half what is expende for charity in the various ways to help to ke down disorder and suffering in the city of Ne York. What does this prove? That those di orders are equal to those of the whole State New York—yes, vastly greater in extent a magnitude to the aggregate of the entire Sta outside of the metropolitan district. What ne of these charities to cure these evils? When comes the destitution? Whence comes the n cessity for hospitals and asylums for the orph and the destitute but from the vices and wron doings of men? They come upon them becau of the vices of their natural protectors. And, notwithstanding the fact that, the raising of this money and its expenditure argue the benevolence of the people of the city of New York and their attention to the wants and the injuries inflicted upon portions of the community, it likewise proves the existence of those evils; it likewise proves the corruptions of that society and the outrages upon the rights of the helpless in those cities. I do not dispute the fact that a vast number of the people of the city of New York are virtuous and intelligent. I admit that a vast number in all the vocations and walks of life are, perhaps, superior to what you can find in any other part of the State; but I speak of two-thirds of the population of that city—men born in foreign lands. I say it takes a whole life-time, under the influence of free institutions—without education or culture, with foreign prejudices—to qualify a man to properly appreciate the doctrines of self-government, and to be safely intrusted with the responsibilities of citizenship in this country. There are a few men born on foreign soils who sufficiently appreciate this, but they are few. The only safety in this country exists in our institutions of learning and of religion, that can enable us safely to take into the great stomach of the body politic this impure mass and digest and assimilate it into the body politic, in short, to fit those people for citizenship; and that is an experiment that has tried the feelings and tested the sincerity of many a man in his belief of the doctrines of republicanism, whether with the vast masses coming to our shores from foreign lands, from year to year, it will be possible for us to assimilate this crude mass, and prepare it for the glories and dignities of American citizenship, so that the ship of state can ride along in safety.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I would like to ask the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand] whether there was any difficulty found in assimilating that crude mass on the battle-field? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAND—I will tell the gentleman upon what battle-field they were assimilated. They did fight to support the party to which the gentleman [Mr. S. Townsend] belongs, and in the battle they had every thing their own way in killing negroes, burning orphan asylums, and robbing respectable citizens. It is said that we should not allude to that mob in the city of New York. I allude to it in order that we may learn from experience. It is said that "experience is the only school in which fools will learn," and I hope that we are not fools enough not to learn in that school, and if such riots did take place in New York and Troy as have been so vividly described on this floor, we may be able to guard against their recurrence hereafter by wise provisions in our fundamental law. No sane man believes that if Fernando Wood had been mayor of the city of New York on the days of those riots, with such powers as are proposed in the committee's report, with the police under his control, that that mob would have been brought under subjection in the way it was, but, on the contrary, that rebellion would have run through the city of New York, and not only this, but through the entire State. It had multitudes of sympathizers there, as it had everywhere throughout the State, who, without the courage to encounter the danger themselves assumed by these ignorant masses, did all they could to aid and encourage them, in methods I will not enumerate, though well understood. The gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] has said that there is no more crime committed in the city of New York, compared with their population, than in other parts of the State of New York. Now I do not desire to speak disparagingly of the native population of New York city, as compared with the same population elsewhere. The proportion of ignorance and vice may be about the same. But, added to these, they have immense numbers of foreigners mostly of the more dangerous classes, so that the comparison, as regards the aggregate of the masses of the people there is very far from being a correct one; and I venture to assert that there is in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, in a single month, more crime and more violations of the rules of decency and good order, more gross and more petty crime, than has occurred in the county of Broome in sixty years. We have never had in that county a conviction for murder. We do not want a police force there, a few constables performing all necessary duties. I will put sixty years of the county of Broome against one month of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, as to the amount of crime and social disorder. If I cannot show a favorable comparison for the county of Broome I will drop the argument.

Mr. GRAVES—Does not the gentleman [Mr. Hand] know that what are called the "dead rabbits" and "shoulder hitters" are composed of our own people, and not those of foreign birth?

Mr. HAND—I do not know any such thing.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I understand the gentleman to say that mobs were more frequent in the cities than elsewhere?

Mr. HAND—I did not say any thing about their frequency.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that for years past we have had more difficulties in the rural counties than there have been in the larger cities.

Mr. HAND—I will say in reply to the statement of the gentleman that the aggregate of the loss of life and property by the July mob of 1863 in the city of New York, was greater than that resulting from all the mobs that ever existed in the rural districts of the State. Compared with it the mobs in the rural towns have been mere disturbances, and hardly worth mentioning, and would most of them scarcely be considered of sufficient importance to be published in the police reports of New York city; and yet, that mob, which for three days held that city in terror, in its career of murder and robbery, had its sympathizers among men high in station, because they thought, perhaps, the mob was advancing the interests of their party. I have given one reason, I think, Mr. Chairman, why the cities of New York and Brooklyn should be an exception in municipal affairs to our general principle of self-government. I think I may include the cities of Albany and Troy, likewise, as coming within that exception, because they embrace a large forogn population; not that a foreign population should not be protected in their rights, not but that a portion of that population are intelligent, but that the mass of the foreign voters are unfit, from their ignorance, and the condition in which they have been placed all their previous lives, to participate in our free government, especially where they constitute a majority of the voters; and if the whole mass of our population should be composed of such, I sincerely believe it would be impossible to maintain republican institutions, and I hold to that.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Did not the gentleman, in the early stages of this Convention defend the admission of a still larger class of more ignorant men to the right of suffrage?

Mr. HAND—No, I did not. I advocated the admission to the right of suffrage of about ten thousand negroes who do not vote, and who, compared with the other class, are gentlemen. [Laughter.] I will take the gentleman to Binghamton, and there look at the houses of both classes, and if he does not say so I will give it up. In his candor, and not in this Convention, where he is compelled to speak and act to serve the ends of his party, the gentleman would admit it. That is a class of not over ten thousand, and every day that you require a property qualification to enable them to vote, you do violence to republican principles as interpreted by all parties. They are well behaved, respectful and orderly, natives of our soil and understand and love our free institutions. I have never known one of them to misbehave himself at the polls in my life, but I have seen Irishmen—ignorant, insolent, intoxicated, but "dimmycratic"—to block up the polls and intentionally prevent respectable men from voting; and what is more, the negro generally votes right. [Laughter.] Is the gentleman answered?

Mr. CHESEBRO—In your way I am.

Mr. HAND—In my way?

Mr. CHESEBRO—It is satisfactory to me.

Mr. HAND—I was going to speak of another reason why in the city of New York and in the districts surrounding the capital we should make an exception to our general rule. The reason is that one is a commercial center, and we have business relations and pecuniary interests that give us an ownership in it that we have not in any sense in other cities. The government of the State of New York should not have reference merely to the people who reside there in providing for the government of the city of New York. It is a narrow view to take of it, and fails to give protection to those who are interested in it, through business relations and otherwise. I have an interest in the city of New York, as has every citizen of the entire State. Nearly one-half of the loose property in that city belongs to men who do not reside there. It goes there for the purposes of business, because that city is the commercial emporium. We are all mixed up with it. There is not a day nor an hour in the year but that thousands of persons who reside in other parts of the State are in that city on business. Their lives and their health and their property require protection. It is that consideration which gives us an interest and a right to inquire into the nature of that government. It being the central place of business, it is incumbent on us to secure, by the power of the State, and not leave it to that ignorant mob to say what sort of govennment shall exist in the city of New York to protect the lives, health and property both of the visitors to as well as the residents of that city. When pestilence visits our shores it is important that we have a health commission that shall give adequate protection to both citizens and strangers. In the report of the minority of the Commitee on Cities, etc., to which I had the honor to subscribe, we propose to retain the health and police commissions as of fundamental importance to the people of this State. Soap boilers, bone boilers, and sundry establishments detrimental to health, together with filthy streets, are to be found all over that city, and when a pestilence comes, if the question of the abatement of these nuisances is to be controlled by the voting population there, they will compel the authorities to be lenient in the matter and the nuisances will remain. There should be a power separate and apart from that mass of people to protect my health, my life and my property, when business or pleasure shall call me for a brief visit to the city of New York. The power should exist in the State, where, as the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] has truly said, sovereignty only exists. We should not lose our right to control the city of New York in these matters, which are fundamental to the interests of the people of the whole State, as to the proper government—the proper police department to protect my life and property, and the proper health department—when I am called to the commercial emporium. And about this capital, too, we have a large foreign element. Albany is becoming a large manufacturing city, and its manufacturing interests are to very largely increase in the future. Its water privileges are among the best this side of the Mississippi, and a large portion of them are still unimproved and unused. Then, too, this is the capital of the State. Our duties as citizens call us here, and the numbers that visit here annually are very large, and it is incumbent that we provide for the district about this capital a good local government. Troy, too, as has been shown by the remarks of the gentlemen from Rensselaer [Messrs. M. I. Townsend and Francis] equally needs the care of the State for providing for its local government. It is upon these grounds that I claim the right to have the government of these cities, at least their health and police departments, left under the control of the Legislature, leaving to them whatever powers of self-government may be consistent with the best interests of the whole State, for it is in the State where sovereignty resides. Can you give to those localities the powers which are proposed here in this report, without endangering the rights of the people of the great State of New York, in which exists alone political power? I claim the right to secure these interests by the power of the sovereignty of the State, and not leave it to the ignorant masses in our large cities. I speak of facts. There is not a gentleman here but believes what I say is true, and will generally admit it in private conversation. The gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] asked who composed the inhabitants of New York, as though he did not know. No man can be ignorant of the facts in the case. The remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] let out the whole secret of the hostility of the people there to the police commissioners. The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] admits that under the old system the police had become so indifferent to the interests of the people and their protection that it was the conviction of all good men there that something should be done. The gentleman admitted that the people demanded a change because the police system had become so bad. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] did not deny that he was in favor of the change, but he says the power that controls the police has since passed into republican hands. So, then it seems that it is not commissions to which they are opposed, but to commissions not managed by the democratic party, for nobody pretends that, by those commissions good government has not been secured. I have not heard it asserted that good government does not exist in the city of Albany, in the city of Troy, and the city of Schenectady, under commissions, and that good government apparently has not been secured in the city of New York. I think that the statistics abundantly prove it, and I think that the people of the city of New York, even the democrats themselves, would feel very reluctant to go back to the old system; and though the political exigencies of the times make it incumbent upon them to oppose commissions and to make political capital out of them and the agitation of the subject, I think they would much prefer to have a commission under republican control than no commission at all. I think so because I have confidence in their good sense aside from their politics. All that has been said about the great fundamental principle of our institutions for self-government we know is true. I admit the truth of the doctrine most fully, under certain restrictions. I am in favor of self-government. I am a democrat in the true sense of the word, but I held early in the debates of this Convention on the suffrage question that the right to participate in government is a franchise and not a natural right. Every supreme government in the world decides for itself what classes shall enjoy that franchise, and weighs well the qualifications necessary in men to safely admit them to participate in the affairs of government. Certain persons are excluded from participating in the government in this country—minors, women, and insane persons. They are excluded for the reason that they are manifestly unfitted to exercise the right of suffrage, or that the best interests of society would not be subserved thereby, and is there any reason which will occur to gentlemen why the ignorant masses which largely preponderate in our large cities should hold the lives, property and health of our better class of citizens in their hands? Is there any reason why they should not be excluded from the control of that branch of the government? Why should the control of the police and health departments be taken from those who have the largest property interests in the city and be given to those who have very little interest in them? Why should that mass of people be allowed to determine the amount of taxes and what proportion each man shall pay, and especially be allowed to choose the men who are to arrest them when guilty of crime and fix the penalty of that crime? I think that the statement made by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] ought to satisfy any reasonable man that the inhabitants of Troy and Albany are satisfied with the working of the capital police system. And I believe that testimony to any amount could be obtained from the city of New York and those holding business relations in that city, and those interested in its welfare, showing that the respectable and law-abiding portion of that city are satisfied with the workings of the police system there. I do not desire to occupy the time of the Convention in a lengthy discussion of this subject. I have given expression to my opinions and feelings and to my mind the reasons I have given are convincing why New York, Brooklyn, and the larger cities should be exceptions to the general rule for providing for the government of localities. And if in time it should become necessary to extend the system which prevails in New York, Brooklyn, Albany and Troy over every city in the State, then, sir, the sovereignty residing in the State should be exercised to that end.

Mr. DEVELIN—The gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand] is in error in saying that I objected to the commissioners because they were under republican control. What I said arose in this way: the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] read a portion of the charge of Recorder Hoffman on the trial of the rioters in New York, in which he praised the police commissioners, and said that the police there, was, probably, the best police in the world. I then remarked that the commission was composed of four members, two democrats and two republicans at that time, but that since then one democrat, on the expiration of his term, was not re-appointed, but a republican was appointed in his place whereby the board became three republicans to one democrat, and that since then one of the board had died, and that it was now two republicans to one democrat, and that this interference with the balance in that board had destroyed the confidence of the people of New York in that commission. I would have said the same thing if it had been made up of a democratic majority. The idea was that the commission should be operated without reference to politics; and in order to do it there was a balance of power put in the board by making it composed of two democrats and two republicans, and if, at the expiration of the term of one of the republicans, a democrat had been put in his place the same want of confidence in the commission would have existed. And while I am up I will make another statement. I understand the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] charged that one of the judges of the superior court of New York had been convicted of a crime and that after his conviction he had been elected a judge of the court. I am informed that this was the statement made to the Convention by the gentleman.

Mr. AXTELL—What I did say was in reply to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], that the difference between the case of the judge of Oneida county and the case of the judge referred to was this, that while the judge of Oneida county was removed from office on account of his crime, the judge in New York was elected after his crime was known.

Mr. DEVELIN—I am informed that the expression used by the gentleman from Clinton was that a criminal had been elected judge of one of the courts of New York, and that the gentleman named as the judge so elected Judge McCunn.

Mr. AXTELL—That statement is correct.

Mr. DEVELIN—Will the gentleman please inform me of the nature of the crime of which Judge McCunn had been convicted, and when he was convicted?

Mr. AXTELL—I am not here to enter into details.

Mr. DEVELIN—I have known Judge McCunn for many years, and I pronounce such language by that gentleman a slander.

Mr. SILVESTER—I understand that there are many members of the Convention who wish to leave shortly after one o'clock. In order that they may be able to do so, I move that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, with the object of moving in Convention an adjournment.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Silvester, and declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT pro tem., Mr. ALVORD, assumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. RUMSEY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Cities, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had instructed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave, and it was declared carried.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. McDONALD—I call the ayes and noes on that motion.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Develin to adjourn, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned to Monday evening at seven o'clock.

MONDAY, January 27, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

No clergyman present.

The Journal of Friday last was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think it is evident that the attendance to-night must be very small. The season is exceedingly inclement, and the great body of the Convention that have been desirous to attend here to-night will be unable to be present, and I am entirely satisfied that we cannot transact any business which will be useful. For that reason I move that we do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. J. TANEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BICKFORD—I call for the resolution offered by myself on Thursday last.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will read the resolution.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to add at the end of the article on future amendments and revisions of the Constitution in substance as follows:

"But no new Constitution or amendment agreed to by such Convention shall be valid until adopted by a vote of a majority of the electors of the State voting on the question of its adoption, either at a general election, or at a special election, as shall be determined by the Convention."

Mr. BICKFORD—I regret that I was not present when the article relating to future amendments of the Constitution was considered and adopted by this Convention. If I had been present I would have moved an amendment similar to the one contained in this resolution. According to the provisions of the Constitution of 1846, there was to be submitted to the people, to be determined by popular vote at the election of 1866, the question whether there should be a Convention to revise and amend the Constitution; and if the majority voted in favor of such Convention then the Legislature were required to pass an act providing for the election of delegates to the Convention. The power conferred by the Constitution upon the Legislature in the event of a vote in favor of the Convention, was simply to provide for the election of delegates and nothing more. To be sure, the Legislature in pursuance of their general authority to appropriate money might, and did provide for the payment of the members of this Convention, but the Constitution conferred no such express authority upon them. The people voted in favor of the Convention and we are here in pursuance of their determination. Now, sir, I believe that it is conceded by the best lawyers in this Convention and certainly it is a point upon which I have no doubt, although I do not claim to be by any means, a profound lawyer, that this Convention has the power, by authority of the Constitution of 1846, to revise and amend the Constitution of this State, and that they may promulge such amendments, or such alterations of the Constitution or a new Constitution, as the supreme law of this State, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, without any submission to the people at all. Such I believe to be the force of the words employed in granting this authority in the Constitution of 1846. We are a Convention to do what? Not merely to propose amendments to the Constitution, but we are a Convention to "revise and amend the Constitution," and it seems to me that we have this power to promulge a new Constitution without submitting it to the people at all. To be sure there is no member of this Convention that I know of that proposes to exercise such power, but that we have the power, I believe to be a fact which is conceded, as I said before, by the best lawyers of this Convention. Now, sir, I insist that this is too much power to confer upon a Constitutional Convention. That no one in this Convention proposes to exercise any such power is, perhaps, a matter of congratulation, but of no great consequence as to the question whether it is proper that we should have such a power. A new Convention may assemble at some future time which will be less scrupulous, and they may take it into their heads in a political excitement, to adopt important amendments, and to declare them valid, without submitting them to a vote of the people of the State. If we do not expect the power to be exercised, it is certainly very imprudent to confer it, because it may be exercised; and if we do not desire it to be exercised, and if it is not a proper power for a Convention to have, then let us prohibit it. Now, the article adopted by this Convention is in that respect precisely like the corresponding provision of the Constitution of 1846. It only provides for the election of delegates to the Convention, which is to be a Convention to "revise and amend" the Constitution—not merely to propose amendments. This resolution which I have offered is designed to instruct the Committee on Revision to add to that article as adopted, a provision that no amendment or new Constitution agreed to by the Convention shall be of force or valid until it is submitted to the people and sanctioned by them. I deem such a provision necessary and proper, and, indeed, several of my constituents, with whom I have spoken on the subject have insisted that this matter should not be left in its present loose form, and that this was too great a power to be conferred upon any body of citizens, however respectable, intelligent, or enlightened they might be. Once, already, in our history, an amendment has been adopted without submission to the people. The amendment to the Constitution which was made in 1801 was adopted in that way. However, it is to be borne in mind that the amendment then adopted was only an interpretation of the existing Constitution. It did not profess, in its terms, to vary the Constitution, but only to interpret one of its provisions. It was a disputed question whether the Governor had the sole power of nomination of officers to be appointed by the council of appointment, or whether such power existed in all the members of the council of appointment as well as in the Governor; and the Convention of 1801 decided that question in a judicial manner. But as that amendment then adopted was merely an interpretation of the Constitution, I apprehend that it cannot be cited as a precedent in favor of retaining the present provision. I insist, sir, that this is a dangerous power to confer upon a Constitutional Convention, and that we should expressly prohibit it.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I have listened with a great deal of satisfaction to that portion of the gentleman's remarks which I was able to hear, [laughter] (as I came in after he had commenced his remarks) and I hope that this resolution will lead to another practical provision, and that this Convention will do what the Convention of 1846 did, that is, enact a provision that no Convention can be called at twenty years hence, or at any other period, to revise and alter the Constitution on what I have styled a mere fragmentary vote. Under the provision as it has passed this Convention, theoretically a vote of ten men, if the others chose to stay away from the polls, could call a Convention to revise the Constitution. Now I think it is the duty of this Convention to instruct the Committee on Revision, to amend that article, so that nothing less than at least a moiety of the grand popular vote of the State shall call a Convention. It is too important a matter, sir, this calling of a Constitutional Convention, to leave it open to be done by a trivial vote. Unless some such provision is adopted you leave it open for a small number of people affected by any particular monomania, if I may use the expression, to call a Convention to revise the Constitution of the State, and it might be that at some not far distant time we should have a Constitutional Convention called without the sanction of the great body of the people, and merely to carry out the whim of a small number of persons attached to some of the isms of the day. I hope, therefore, that this part of our action will be conformed more nearly to the provision of the Constitution of 1846, so that nothing but a vote of half or more than half of the electors of this State shall suffice to call a Convention. With reference to the powers of the Convention I fully concur with the remarks of the gentleman who has just spoken. I have, from the very beginning, thought that members of this Convention were unmindful of its powers when they raised questions about how long we should sit, and when the submission of the Constitution should be made, because the Legislature had attempted, I will not say presumptuously, but illegally, to prescribe when we should submit it, and as to compensation of members, etc. I have already said, and I now say again, that this body possesses more constitutional power than any other that was ever assembled in the United States for its purposes. As to our ability to declare any portion of our doings by ordinance, I hold that we have that power. We have a precedent in the action of the Convention of 1801, and although the gentleman in speaking of that Convention said that it only had one object, I think that if he will refer to data he will find that it had two objects. However, the second was a matter of little importance, and I shall not dwell upon it now. But we have the still greater precedent of the Convention of 1777 which we have always been taught to respect. Many persons thought that the Constitution of 1821 was no improvement upon that of 1777, and some think that there has been no improvement upon it since. The Constitution of 1777 was declared by ordinance; and I say that we have a right to declare our Constitution or any portion of it by ordinance. I am not proposing that we shall exercise that power, but I mention it as a reason why a body with such powers should not be left open to be convened on an insufficient vote. I see that Jamieson, who, I believe, is the best authority upon that subject at present, says that of the various Constitutions adopted by the different States of this Union, more than half of them have been declared by ordinance. Now, thus understanding and recognizing the amplitude of our powers, how absurd it is to suppose that we are subject to the Legislature or under their control in the inferior matters of salary, and how unreasonable that the warrant of the president of this body, properly attested, for the pay of a member of this Convention, must not be respected by the Comptroller of the State as an ordinance of this Convention should be. I shall vote for the gentleman's resolution, and I hope that he will couple with it this other provision, that a vote of the majority of the people of the State shall be required to call any Convention.

Mr. BICKFORD—That is another branch of the subject which will come up at another time.

The question was put on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I offer the following resolution, and ask that it lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to amend the article on corporations so that the creation of corporations for literary, scientific, charitable and benevolent purposes, by special charter, shall not be prohibited.

Mr. A. LAWRENCE—I offer the following resolution, and ask that it lie on the table.

"That the Committee on Revision be instructed to amend the article on education and the funds relating thereto, which has been referred to them by the Convention, by striking out the words 'to the support of the Cornell University,' in the twelfth and thirteen lines, and the words 'so long as said university shall fully comply with and perform the conditions of the act of the Legislature establishing said university,' in the fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth lines; so that it shall read: "The revenues of the college land scrip fund shall each year be appropriated and applied in the mode and for the purposes defined by the act of Congress donating public lands to the several States and Territories, approved July 2, 1862.'"

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ALVORD—It is that the gentleman from Schuyler cannot in this matter reach a reconsideration of the vote of this Convention refusing to do what he now proposes to do in this way.

The PRESIDENT—When this resolution shall be up for consideration the Chair will rule that the point of order is well taken. For the present the resolution lies on the table.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on Cities, Mr. CORBETT, of Onondaga (in the absence of Mr. Rumsey), in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Spencer, to strike out the first section.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The motion is to strike out the first section. According to the avowed intention of the mover and the general understanding of the committee, I believe that that motion if it prevails will be understood to dispose of the whole subject. It amounts to saying that we ignore this subject altogether, and that the whole article falls to the ground. I wish we could consistently with our duties as members of this Convention get rid of this subject in that summary manner. It would greatly shorten our labors, for I believe that except this there is nothing remaining before us calculated to protract our session for many days longer. But I think the question is so situated that we cannot altogether ignore it. We are obliged to give it some attention. To show this, I will make a few observations. Without indicating what my own particular views are in regard to the subject of cities, I only insist that this subject must be taken up and disposed of. Let me call the attention of the committee, in the first place, to the constitutional article which we have adopted and which is now in the hands of the Committee on Revision, on the subject of town and county officers, etc. The first section of it provides that sheriffs, clerks of counties, treasurers, registers of deeds and district attorneys shall be chosen by the electors of the county. The second section provides that all the county officers not provided for in this Constitution shall be chosen by the electors of the counties or appointed by the boards of supervisors or other county authorities, as the Legislature shall direct. Then follows this clause, to which I call the particular attention of the committee:

"All town officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution shall be chosen by the electors of the towns or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate. All other officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers whose offices may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected or appointed as the Legislature may direct."

It will be seen by the committee at a glance that we have adopted an article by which all county officers are to be elected by the people of the county or appointed by some county authority; also, that all town officers are to be elected by the people of the towns or appointed by some authority of the towns. Our article is absolutely silent as to the government of cities and villages. We have done nothing on that great subject. So far as the work of this Convention has proceeded, we have said not one word upon it. Now, this omission will appear the more remarkable when we come to consider the corresponding article in the Constitution of 1846. That article provided, also, that all the officers of the counties shall be elected by the people of the county or appointed by some county authority; and then it proceeds, in the second section of the article, "all city, town and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose." The Constitution under which we now live, therefore, takes up and provides for this subject by declaring that, not only all the county and town officers shall be chosen by the people of the counties or towns, or appointed by county or town authority, but also that all city and village officers shall be chosen in the same manner. Now, so far as the Convention has proceeded, we have adopted the Constitution of 1846 in respect to counties and towns, but we have said and done nothing in regard to cities and villages. I suppose there is an obvious reason why our work is now in that situation.

Mr. HARRIS—Will the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] allow me to suggest that a resolution has been adopted connecting the provisions of the first article adopted in relation to villages with towns, so that that provision is applicable to towns and villages, but not to cities.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That would provide very well for the villages, still leaving the infinitely more important subject of the cities of the State entirely unprovided for, unless we take up the report of the committee now before us, and dispose in some way of the subject. I suppose this subject was not disposed of and not provided for when we had the article on counties and towns under consideration, because there was a large and able committee to which the government of the cities was committed for examination and report. Now, sir, we have that report before us, we have the majority report and a minority report. They have some material points of difference, but they have more points of resemblance than they have of difference. I repeat, we are obliged to act upon this subject. Whether we take the minority or the majority report is not the present question. I desire to bring the deliberations and the judgment of the Convention to the real question, to the end that it may be disposed of. On looking at these reports, Mr. Chairman, I find that the first nine sections of the report of the majority propose the outlines of a city charter. The minority report does the same—it proposes an outline for a city charter differing in some material respects from the other. The fundamental question before the Convention will be found to be contained in the tenth section of each report, and that is that the State for the purposes of local government shall be divided into towns, cities and villages, and that no other local provision for districts shall be made, nor shall any territory be annexed to a city, except for the purpose of changing its boundaries. There is a great and fundamental question involved in that section, which must receive the attention of this Convention. This Convention will fail in its duty if it omits to declare what the fundamental political divisions of the State are and are to be hereafter. There is no duty of this Convention plainer than that of reaching the evasion of the Constitution under which the present government of cities has grown up. It must be reached and disposed of in one way or the other. Now, as I said before. I have not risen for the purpose of indicating precisely what my own views are of the frame-work of the government of the cities, but I find that all the arguments tend in two opposite directions. On one side it is claimed and insisted that all control of the cities shall be left in the Legislature, that the Legislature shall have supreme control of the municipalities of the State. On the other side it is claimed that the control shall be vested in the people of the municipalities, and not in the Legislature. If I have correctly understood the arguments of those who favor concentration of that control in the Legislature, they are founded mainly on the idea that the State is sovereign and the cities are not, that the State wields all the sovereignty there is within its borders, and that the cities wield none of it. It is therefore said to be an abdication of some portion of the sovereignty of the State if the municipalities are left to their own self-control. I have in my hand the minority report upon this subject, submitted by Mr. Francis, in which I find the doctrine to which I have referred. He says: "As one of the Committee on Cities, I wish to say that I disagree with the report of the majority in this, that it proposes the establishment within the State, under the name of city governments, of local sovereignties superior to and above and beyond the control of the State itself, thus applying to the State of New York the same obnoxious doctrine which the rebels of the South sought to enforce for their States with respect to the Union. This whole idea of city independence from the State control is the same in principle as the old southern idea of State independence of federal authority." Now, the sum and substance of this argument has been reiterated again and again in the course of this discussion, and my friend from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] submitted several maxims, or axioms as he called them, of which this argument formed the central idea, to wit: That by remitting the people of the municipalities essentially to self-government and self-control we abdicate the sovereignty of the State, or at least that it amounts in some degree to an abdication of the sovereignty of the State. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an observation or two to relieve the subject from that difficulty. Whatever it is wise and expedient to do in regard to the government of cities, that argument in my humble judgment is wholly foreign to the subject. I accept the idea without reservation that the State is sovereign over every part of it. The sovereignty of the State is a unit. The State itself is a political unit. All the counties, towns, cities and villages of the State are but parts, but fractions of that unit. Every county, every, town, every city in the State is within the State in a political not less than in a geographical sense. But, sir, what is the State? That is the question. The State is not the Legislature; the State is not the judiciary; the State is not the executive; nor is it all of them together. With us the people are the State. A great monarch once said, "I am the State," by which he meant that he was the source of all authority within his own dominions. And that is the simplest idea of sovereignty, where the will of the monarch is the law, and the only law, throughout his dominions. According to our institutions the people, and the people alone, are sovereign. It is their will, and their will alone, which is the supreme law of the State. Every branch of the government exercises only delegated powers, powers which the people delegate to them when they make their Constitution. Your Legislature cannot step outside that delegation, nor can your judiciary, nor can your executive. Therefore, when we say the State is a sovereignty, we mean that the people are the sovereigns, and that they ultimately govern the State. Now, the only way in which the people exercise any immediate act of sovereignty is when they ordain and proclaim their written Constitution. That is the only mode in which the people act upon any individual or upon any particular class of the population of the State. They make their Constitution, and delegate certain powers to the Legislature, or rather with us they delegate all legislative powers, subject to the restrictions which the Constitution contains. It is, therefore, exceedingly evident that there is here no question of the abdication of State sovereignty. It is a question of what power we will by our Constitution delegate to the Legislature and what power to the people of localities or to the government of the cities.

Mr. BICKFORD—Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. COMSTOCK—Yes, sir.

Mr. BICKFORD—I, for one, said nothing about the abdication of State sovereignty. I admitted that State sovereignty would still exist, in the sense in which the gentleman claims; but I contended that it was an abdication of government, not of State sovereignty.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The people will govern all parts of the State. They will govern every individual of the State. They will govern the cities; but whether the people will govern them through the Legislature or through some other instrumentality is the question before this Convention. It is not a question whether the State is or is not sovereign over every municipality, but whether the people of the State shall make the Legislature sovereign over it. The Legislature is not the people, nor is it the sovereignty of the State. Now, suppose that our Constitution, whatever it may be, shall be approved by the people. If we leave the cities under the control of the Legislature, that will then be the will of the people in the exercise of their supreme sovereignty. If we leave the people of the cities to govern themselves, that will be equally the will of the people, and in either case it will be the sovereignty of the State, exercised in the one mode, or in the other mode, which will govern the municipalities of the State. I accept, also, Mr. Chairman, the doctrine which was laid down with so much emphasis by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], that where allegiance is due, protection is due. He said that he owed allegiance to the State, and I know that as well as he knows it. He said that he therefore should come to the State for protection, and he insisted that allegiance and protection are mutual obligations. They are, sir, mutual obligations, and they are perpetual obligations. As no man, short of expatriation, can throw off his allegiance to the State, or to the federal government, so no man short of expatriation, can withdraw himself from or lose the Constitutional protection which is due to him, as the consequence of that allegiance. But, sir, the gentleman was mistaken if he supposed that his allegiance was due to the Legislature. He owes no allegiance to the Legislature. I owe no allegiance to the Legislature. There is no man in this Convention or elsewhere that owes any allegiance to the Legistature of this State. We owe obedience to their laws, when they are enacted, in accordance with the Constitution. Outside of that we do not even owe them obedience, much less allegiance. The doctrine of allegiance and protection, therefore, is not invaded, whether we adopt one mode or the other of governing the municipalities of the State. The allegiance of each individual is due to the people of the State in their mass, in their sovereignty, and the people in their collective sovereignty will protect every man, whether he lives in a city, or elsewhere, and they will do it through legislative action, or through such other instrumentality as they shall think wise when they adopt and proclaim their organic law. There are some lighter arguments which have been advanced on this subject, arguments of far less significance, and to which I will allude only for a moment. I have regretted very much to hear partisan appeals made upon a question of this nature and import. My honorable friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] did appeal to party allegiance, to maintain a certain view upon this question in this Convention. Now, I have but a word to say on that subject, and I will say it just as I would say it if I were one of that political majority to which he addressed himself. I say you cannot afford to frame your Constitution upon any such view as that. You cannot afford to dispose of this subject upon any such grounds. Why not? Why, I say, just as I would say if I belonged to his party—you cannot do it, because you are not the masters of the situation. Whatever effect your appeal to the party may have here, it will have no effect outside of this hall. When you go beyond these walls, I repeat, you are not the masters of the situation. Your work is to be approved or condemned by a great people, to whom it is to be submitted, and you cannot afford to make a disposition of this or any other subject which will alienate from your Constitution great masses and numbers of the people. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we are making a Constitution which upon the whole, will be a great improvement upon the one we are now revising; and I yield to no man in my anxiety to put it before the people in the best form, and in the most acceptable way we can. Look over the cities of this State, and you will find that they embrace about one million and three-quarters of souls much nearer half than one-fourth the population of the State. Your Constitution is to be submitted to the people of those cities, as well as to the people of the residue of the State, and, if you array the solid vote of those great municipalities, or any considerable part of that vote against your work, there is no hope whatever of its acceptance. I do not wish to pursue this discussion. It has been my object simply and briefly to show to the committee as well as I could, that the subject is in a situation where we cannot omit it, where we cannot ignore it, where we must act upon it in some form or other; and also to relieve the question of some of those inconsequential arguments which have attended the discussion. Before I sit down, however, I wish to draw the attention of the committee again, for a few moments, to the Constitution of 1846, and the consequences which have grown out of it in the way of interpretation. The article which I have already read provides, in exact terms, that all city, town and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns and villages, or some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a plain provision that all such officers of cities shall be elected by the people of the cities, or appointed by some city authority. There is the Constitution; its meaning is plain—no man can mistake it. Every officer concerned in the government of the city is to be elected by the people of the city, or appointed by some authority thereof. That is your Constitution. And now look at the cities—look particularly at the city of New York. I suppose it is true that the majority of the officers concerned in the government of that city to-day are not elected by the people of the city, and are not appointed by any authority thereof. How has that come about? I repeat, there is your Constitution requiring that your city officers shall be elected, or appointed by the city authorities, and there is the fact that in several of the great cities of the State the majority of the city officers are not elected by the people of the city, or appointed by any authority thereof. How has that come about? Why, Mr. Chairman, it has been done by the mere subterfuge of adding some adjacent territory to a city, and making it a new political division of the State, a political division which had never been thought of before. We have existed as a sovereign State for almost a century, and until after the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, no man in this State had ever heard, no man in this State had ever dreamed, of any other political division than the county, the town, the city, and the village. The government of cities, therefore, has been usurped by the Legislature, under the mere transparent subterfuge of adding adjacent territory, and thus creating a new political division of the State. These political divisions of the State were regarded, when that Constitution was made, as fixed, as much so as any thing else which that Constitution contains, entirely fixed and settled as the very pillars of constitutional law in this State. Now, sir, it becomes me to speak with entire respect of the decision of the court of last resort which sustained the constitutionality of these commissions. I had, and I still have my own convictions about it. But all that the court said, all that the court decided, was that this legislative evasion of the Constitution was successful—that it was simply a successful evasion of the plain intent of the Constitution.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman what he means by an evasion of the Constitution? How can the Constitution be evaded?

Mr. COMSTOCK—I mean, sir that the act of the Legislature in creating this new political division of the State, was an evasion of the Constitution. The Constitution can be evaded; and the gentleman has been a lawyer long enough to know that the Constitution can be evaded, and has been evaded by a mere subterfuge. When I speak of the evasion of the Constitution, I have reference to what its plain intention is, and a legislative act which gets around that intention, because it is not expressed in any literal direct provision, is what I mean by an evasion of the Constitution; and I repeat there never was a more transparent evasion of it, than the one of which I have just spoken. I do not choose to dwell longer upon that branch of the subject. What I want to say to this Convention is simply this: Let us put what we mean in the Constitution. If we mean that the cities shall be to a greater or a lesser extent under the control of the Legislature, why let us say what we mean, and leave not only no necessity, but no possibility, of a resort hereafter to a similar evasion. Why do you want to create new political districts in the State? Do we need in our organic law any other political divisions, than the town, the county, the city and the village? Not at all. If you only make the Constitution as you want it in respect to the county, town, city and village, you want no other political division. Therefore, I say, whatever power you think best to give to the Legislature, give it to the Legislature in terms, over cities and towns, and leave out of your Constitution this possibility of creating new political divisions of the State. You cannot leave in the Legislature this power of manipulating the organic divisions of the State, without danger to the principles of your Constitution, without leaving in your Constitution the seeds of its own subversion. It has turned out that the Constitution of 1846 contained the seeds of its own overthrow, because if the Legislature could thus overthrow essentially the government of cities, it can equally overthrow the government of your counties to-day. To effect this, the Legislature have nothing in the world to do except to put together two counties or parts of counties, or more, making a new district, which, instead of being governed by your board of supervisors and the officers named in your Constitution, may thus be erected by the Legislature into a department and governed by a pro-consul or prefect. I repeat, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that whatever it shall be the conclusion of this Convention to do in regard to the government of cities, let us do it plainly and not leave it to indirection. If it is the desire and purpose to give to the Legislature power to place commissions over cities, let it be so stated in terms instead of leaving it to a legislative evasion, for if you leave this power in the Legislature there is danger of greater usurpations hereafter than we have yet experienced. Therefore, I am in favor of the tenth section embraced in this report, or, if it shall not be accepted by this Convention, then I am in favor of the corresponding section embraced in the minority report, for they, each of them, prohibit the power of creating new political divisions in the State, except, as the minority report reads, "for sanitary and police purposes." Let me say on this subject, further, that you do not want to leave in this Constitution power to create new divisions for sanitary or police purposes. If you wish that the Legislature shall control the police and the health of the cities, say so. You do not want any new political division for this purpose. Say it directly in regard to cities. It may be wise to say that, I express no opinion about that, but let us make our Constitution so plain that it cannot again be invaded in the manner it has been.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I have one word which I wish to say in answer to the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. He says about the remarks I previously made, that I claimed that allegiance and protection were corresponding duties, and that as I owed allegiance to the State it was the duty of the State as such, to protect me. The gentleman says, in addition to my remark, that it could not be that I owed allegiance to the Legislature, and that therefore, I have no right, as the argument runs, to claim that the Legislature should have the power and the duty imposed upon them of furnishing me personal protection. Is not the argument of the learned gentleman sophistical? I ask it respectfully, for I have great respect for every thing that falls from that gentleman—is it not sophistical? I owe allegiance to the people of the State. After our Constitution is established and is working, I know of but one mode through which I can reach the people of this State (for the people are the State just as much here as Louis XIV. supposed that he was the State in France), except through the Legislature. And for this purpose the Legislature is the State, for it is in the legislation of the Senate and the House of Assembly that the people energise. Is there any other way in which the people of the State can energise for my protection? Then, sir, if you should tie up the hands of your Legislature so that the Legislature cannot energise for my protection, then the Constitution has decided that the people of the State shall not energise for my protection. If that be not good political philosophy, I would like to hear some gentleman—the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] or some other gentleman upon this floor—explain to me why this is not good. If the Constitution says that I, for my own protection, shall depend upon the people of the eighth ward in the city of Troy, in which my home happens to be, for protection, then the people of the State of New York have, by their Constitution, provided that they will not furnish me protection, but that I must look for protection to the people of the locality in which I have my abode. And under that very view that men owe allegiance to the power that furnishes them protection, as my colleague [Mr. Francis] has well said in his report, the people of the Southern States were not protected and could not be protected by the general government, and they lent themselves to the damnable service of the rebellion. I think the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is answered upon that point. If he be not, I hope some one else will show wherein the fallacy of my position consists. But, sir, the gentleman from Onondaga very properly and in a manner worthy of himself has deprecated the introduction of any political feeling into questions of this kind. Now, sir, for myself, I believe I do right in consulting political feeling when I believe that the doctrines of the great party with which I act are more consonant with the well-being of the State, with the well-being of society, and with the well-being of the world, than the doctrines of the party acting in opposition to it. And, sir, as the people of this State, if they shall ever take the trouble to read the debates of this Convention, may not understand some things that are visible to my eyes, and as perhaps my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris], whom I do not now see in his seat, and my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], whom I do now see in his seat, may be inclined to run away with the notion that the political feeling is all on one side here, and perhaps confined to a few rash spirits like the gentleman from Rensselaer who now occupies the floor, I wish through you, who have eyes, to ask what is the meaning of certain men flocking into this hall on this occasion "like clouds and as doves to their windows?" Why is it that we see men here for the first time during this session of the Convention since the recess? Why is it that the benches of so many courts in the city of New York and of other distant cities of the State that perhaps really need those who have been elected to occupy and fill them, are vacated for the purpose of enabling the gentlemen who sit upon those benches to come here and occupy their seats in this hall? It is perfectly delightful to see their faces. [Laughter.] It is very pleasant to have them here; but how happens it that, in the providence of God, they come just at this time, and that other gentleman who have not been present during this session, and who have not entered the hall during the last session previous, appear in full proportions in this Convention to-day? Certainly there is no political feeling about it! The lamb is lying down with the lion and the leopard with the kid. [Laughter.] My friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord and my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] are lying down in pretty much the same company that the lamb lay down in [laughter], and if they get up safely, and do not change their nature, I shall feel that the millenium has come and that such things can be done with impunity. [Great laughter.] It is very well understood, as I said the other day, that the gentlemen upon the other side of politics in this hall act as a unit—act together. They have no sort of difficulty in satisfying their own minds on the political rights and duties of the Constitution. Now, sir, I do not propose myself to lie down with either the lion or the leopard, and just now, if I know myself, I shall not put my hand over the cockatrice's den. [Laughter.] My friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] and my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] may do it, and so may any other gentleman in this hall who wishes to go with them. I am a republican voter, and I believe that the republican party have the most correct notions of government at the present time. There are some heresies in the republican party which I cannot adopt. I believe there are individuals in the republican party who hold sentiments that I cannot adopt, but I do not believe those sentiments are the sentiments of the great party with which I act. Sir, if a measure arose in which I believed that the views of the republican party were not for the best interests of the State I should act upon my conscience and not upon my politics; but I believe in this matter that the republican party in their action in protecting the good people in cities of all parties, have acted for the best, for the interests of the State and more in accordance with political philosophy than any other party would have acted. And, now, while I am on the floor, I take leave to refer to two facts in regard to the working of the capital police in this district that I did not mention the other day. In 1864 when the great presidential election that was exciting the whole country was about to occur, the general government felt it to be its duty to itself to send two regiments of infantry and eight pieces of artillery, and locate them between the cities of Troy and Albany for the purpose of preserving the public peace and for the purpose of preserving intact the public property, in what is now called the capital police district, at the arsenal in Watervliet. Bear in mind, we then had not the capital police; and for more than six weeks the exigencies of the general government required, in the opinion of those who administered its affairs, that this military force should be there. And I should like in this connection to appeal to my friend from Albany [Mr. Harris] to know whether, at that time, he did not believe it to be necessary to withdraw from the fields in the front where our armies were battling with the enemies of the republic two regiments of infantry and a park of eight pieces of artillery for the preservation of order and the preservation of the public property in this very district which the gentleman now proposes to deliver over to the accidents that shall arise when there is no control over the popular passions of the mob in these two cities.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Does not the gentleman know that the bloody July riots to which he refers, occurred after the introduction of the metropolitan police system, and at a time when the people had no voice in the choice or selection of their police force?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Yes, sir; and that gentleman well knows, as I have already stated in this Convention, that, had not the police in the city of New York been in more loyal hands than those of Fernando Wood, what was then a mob, costing but a thousand lives and the destruction of some million and a half of property in the city of New York, would have been a revolution. Now, sir, that other circumstance to which I wished to refer is this—and I state it in answer to the cry that the people in this district are heavily taxed and burdened for a political purpose, without any corresponding benefit. In the city of Albany, I see it stated in the press that, for the last three months, there has not occurred a single fire which called for the services of the fire department. Now, sir, if there is a gentleman upon this floor who believes this a burden, "an intolerable burden," to save the people from the ravages of fires that have hitherto prevailed in this district, to impose upon them the very small sum that is paid to support these police, certainly I cannot interfere with the workings of gentlemen's minds. But I present these facts that gentlemen in this Convention may judge for themselves of the working of the system here where it is adopted. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] says that probably a majority of the officers holding power, and who exercise influence in the city of New York, do not owe their election or appointment to the people directly. I think the gentleman will find upon looking at the interior facts in the case that, the whole number of commissioners holding commissions in every form in the city of New York does not reach thirty, and that the minor officers holding positions under those commissioners do not reach any more, at all events do not greatly exceed the additional number. Why, sir, New York swarms with men, properly, I admit, holding office under the common council and under the board of supervisors and other local authorities. I did not rise for the purpose of making any extended remarks, but mainly to present what I have stated on this occasion.

Mr. MORRIS—The question before the committee is one of so much importance that it should be most fully debated. It is, therefore, for this reason that I rise to express the views which I have upon the subject. In reading over the first section of the article, I am at a loss to find any fault with it. It seemed to me to provide every thing that is necessary in order to empower the mayor to fulfill the duties with which he must necessarily be intrusted. He should be the responsible official in the city. I hold to the military principle that the power to praise should have the power to punish; and we know that no servant is so faithful as when the eye of the master is upon him, that eye being accompanied with the power to punish. In looking over the minority report of the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis], I find he proposes that the superintendent of police shall be appointed at the capital of the State. He contemplates making a system which shall extend throughout the State. This, for one, I seriously object to. It would be, in point of fact, establishing a standing army throughout the State under another name. I believe that no persons can govern themselves so well as those who have interests at stake. The people are tired of being governed from remote localities—from Albany by the Legislature. The two prominent ideas throughout the State seem to be that the Constitutional Convention should give us a good judiciary and would deprive the Legislature of power over localities which are remote from the seat of State government. The gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] has so admirably defined the position I occupy that, I have only to refer to his remarks in order to express my own ideas; for I agree with them. I regard him as one of the most intelligent and learned gentlemen of the party to which he belongs, and his remarks show that, although this system of central government was a creation of the republican party, they are becoming dissatisfied with it, and it is more so with the people throughout the State. I do not have any apprehension that we shall ever again be troubled with mobs or riots. The history of past riots shows conclusively that our national guard can be relied upon in addition to the police, and I will say, by way of parenthesis, that no one doubts for a moment the efficiency and excellence of the police as it now exists. The only thing which is susceptible of criticism is the way in which the police are appointed. That way is contrary to the spirit of republican government; but should we find in the case of an outbreak or mob or riot, that the police were not sufficient to maintain order and put down the disturbances, we have only to call upon the national guard, of which we have ten thousand men in the city of New York, well armed and equipped and disciplined, who will fire upon the populace composed of their own relatives and friends, as the past will show, if need be, and should these be not sufficient and this Constitution is adopted, the reserve militia throughout the State, officered by reserve officers, could be in a few days armed and equipped and ready for any emergency. They will come along singing the words of that popular song during the last war, with a slight alteration,

"We are coming, father Governor, three hundred thousand more."

I cannot see, Mr. Chairman, that any better substitute can be offered for this section that is now moved to be stricken out, and for one therefore, I hope the section reported by the committee will remain.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I for one feel compelled, Mr. Chairman, from a sense of duty, to dissent entirely from most of the provisions contained in the report under consideration. To three of the sections—and to which I will refer—I see no objection. It seems to me, however, that we should be guilty of doing a very unwise thing, to insert the other sections contained in the report in the fundamental law of the State. The provision abolishing the board of supervisors in the city and county of New York, I believe we all agree to, and for this reason: that there is already a board of aldermen in existence in the city which could discharge the duties now performed by the board of supervisors, with equal fidelity, care and protection of the city's interests, and with much less expense, taking the salaries of the board of supervisors, and the officials connected therewith into account. Sir, there is another provision in the article which I would save, and considering the assertion made by the able and eloquent chairman of the Committee on Cities [Mr. Harris], I will say it was a most extraordinary thing that that section should have found its way into the report. If I recollect aright, he said that this whole business of commissions was ruinous in theory, ruinous in policy, and ruinous in practice, and would be destructive to the State if persisted in. I believe I quote his words, and yet in the very article under consideration, before he closes it, he provides for the appointment of a commissioner by the Legislature to do a particular work; that work is to revise and collate the laws relative to the city of New York and report them to the Legislature with such recommendations as the commissioners might suggest for the action of the Legislature, in order to give good government to the cities. Another section, sir—and it is the last reported—I do not see how the gentleman can regard as in consonance with his theory upon the idea that to have a commission to do any thing in a locality, is in direct conflict with the theory of self-government. Section 16 reads thus:

SEC. 16. Nothing in this article contained shall effect the power of the Legislature in matters of quarantine, or relating to the port of New York, or the interest of the State in the lands under water and within the jurisdiction or boundaries of any city, or to regulate the wharves, piers, or slips in any city.

Why allow a commission to be appointed in the city of New York to take charge of the wharves, piers and slips? Does not that concede the argument for which we are contending? Does it not concede that in certain cases commissions may be necessary and authorized by law. The question of what is to be considered indispensable to the existence of a really effective government of the city of New York is one that may well challenge our best and most disinterested efforts. A city in its strong contrasts unlike other great cities of the world. Crowded together upon a narrow strip of land, some ten miles in length and an average breadth of one mile, are the people of all climes and nationalities; the cool, calculating New Englander, the phlegmatic German and the fiery Celt. The last census of the city of New York disclosed the fact that there were 77,475 voters of foreign birth, to 51,500 native voters, and 151,838 aliens. The increase in the naturalized vote since the census was taken, is I think at least 20,000, whereas I very much doubt whether the native vote has increased 5,000, the tendency being for men of moderate means and native birth to leave the city and find homes for their families in the quiet of the country adjacent to the city. If I am right, the vote of the city of New York is in the proportion of two to one in favor of voters of foreign birth. New York is in population the largest American, Irish, German, and Jew city in the world. I may add, without exaggeration, that it contains within its boundaries representatives from every nationality on the globe. Here congregate, also, the depraved, the vicious, those who are notoriously restive under any legal restraint. This great cosmopolitan city, the commercial metropolis of the continent, its port filled with shipping from every clime, its streets crowded with residents and sojourners intent on business, pleasure and crime, and through whose gates come swarming myriads of immigrants, must have some effective form of city government. What that shall be presents a field for most careful consideration and enlightened statesmanship. The idea prevails to some extent that localities, whether cities, towns or villages, have a natural right to self-government, and that the interference of the State is a sort of usurpation. We hear a great deal about independence of municipalities, unjust and tyrannical legislation at Albany, unjust interference with chartered rights, etc. No political term has been more abused than this cry of municipal independence. Our political unit in the State, the State sovereignty, lies in the people of the whole State and nowhere else. It has never been and never can be parceled out among towns, counties and cities. The position for which I contend, in reference to the question which we are considering, commences just where the argument of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] ends. Shall the State sovereignty be given up to any locality so that the people, speaking through this Convention, which provides for a Legislature, shall have no further control over the matter?—a thing which has never been done in the history of this State, sir, and which has never been done in the history of any State of the United States, or by the government of the United States, is proposed to be done here to-day, to abdicate the State government and State authority, and place it in the hands of a locality, where it is beyond the reach and power of the State for all time to come. Now, sir, pardon me for one moment while I refer to the reasons which are given by the various gentlemen for their advocacy of the majority report of the committee, for that is what I am considering now. That report proposes to do two things: first, to give the mayor of the city of New York, for the time being, the full and unqualified power to appoint every officer and every official within the city limits, and to remove him at his pleasure. It proposes to go further, and to provide that from this time there shall be no other territorial division in this State than cities, counties and towns, as prescribed in the Constitution, so as to prevent any other territorial division of the State for any purpose for all time to come. My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Cities [Mr. Harris], says this is necessary to secure to the cities of the State local self-government. He says that the commissions controlled by State authority are false in principle, ruinous in policy, and deprive the cities of a right always exercised by them. Third, that they are an effective party organization, contrary to the spirit of our institutions, is the language of my friend from Erie [Mr. Verplanck]. But the question immediately occurs, how less effective a party organization will they be when appointed by the mayor or elected by a party in the city? Fourth, that the police commission is a great departure from the principles of republican government. Fifth, that the State commissions are the most expensive form of government for the cities, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. Harris] alleges that seven-eighths of the amount raised by taxation in the city of New York is expended by the State commissions; and another member of the committee, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], stated that three-fourths of the amount raised by taxation was expended in the city of New York by State commissions. Sixth, that this Convention was called, among other reasons, for the purpose of relieving the cities of the State from the burden of commissions. Let me state, in reply to this assertion, that in the city of New York there were only about twenty thousand votes cast in favor of this Convention, in a total vote of about 115,000, and that there was a clear majority of ten thousand cast against the calling of the Convention. If there was this cry for relief for the city—if this Convention was called for the purpose of relieving the city of New York, "groaning under the burdens of these commissions" which we have heard so much of here—how comes it that with 49,000 majority against the republican ticket in that city, when the vote was taken on the question of calling a Constitutional Convention there were but 19,000 votes cast in favor of it out of a total vote of 115,000? I think the matter of government of cities had little to do with the calling of this Convention. The cities, as a general thing, cast their votes against it, whereas the rural districts voted with substantial unanimity in favor of it. I think, sir, that two considerations led to the calling of this Convention; one was a reform in the judiciary, and the other was a reform in the management of the canals. I have given the arguments of those who are in favor of the report under consideration. I have referred briefly to what is proposed to be done to remedy the evils alleged to exist, namely, to give the power of appointment to the mayor, and to provide that no territorial division of the State shall hereafter be made which shall enable commissioners to be appointed by State authority. Now, let us in the first place (as I wish some landmark to guide us) ascertain what are the legal rights of the State over cities, what power the State possesses over the subject. I will not use my own language here, but will quote the language as it is laid down in our books. I quote in the first place Angell & Ames' elementary law upon this subject. I think it is as good law on the subject as that which has been laid down by the chairman of the Committee on Cities [Mr. Harris].

Mr. COMSTOCK—I have no doubt whatever of the supreme power of the Legislature over cities, unless the Legislature is restrained by the Constitution. That is the only doubt there is, and the question is how we shall make our Constitution in that regard.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I heard the gentleman claim that there was an evasion of the Constitution in the decision of the court of appeals upon the police law.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Not in the decision, but in the act of the Legislature. That is the way I stated it.

Mr. HUTCHINS—Angell & Ames use this language:

"SEC. 31. The main distinction between public and private corporations is, that over the former the Legislature, as the trustee or guardian of the public interests, has the exclusive and unrestrained control, and acting as such, as it may create, so it may modify or destroy, as public exigency requires or recommends, or the public interest will be best subserved. The right to establish, alter, or abolish such corporations, seems to be a principle inherent in the very nature of the institutions themselves; since all mere municipal regulations must, from the nature of things, be subject to the absolute control of the government. Such institutions are the auxiliaries of the government in the important business of municipal rule, and cannot have the least pretension to sustain their privileges or their existence upon any thing like a contract between them and the Legislature, because there can be no reciprocity of stipulation, and because their objects and duties are incompatible with every thing of the nature of a contract."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] was upon the bench when the case of the People v. Draper, which involved the constitutionality of the police law, was decided, and he dissented from the judgment of the court on that occasion. He undoubtedly has read the opinion of the court delivered by that able jurist, Judge Denio. I quote from that decision to show that Judge Denio's opinion does not correspond with the opinion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], that this law of the Legislature was an evasion of the Constitution, and also to show that, in Judge Denio's opinion, a provision like that which is now sought to be inserted would be of all things most injudicious and impracticable. He says:

"Nor can I perceive that any arrangement of the Constitution which looks to the existence of counties or cities, or the co-operation of county or city authorities, is broken in upon or in any respect interfered with by the bill. It may be said that, as matters of police have generally been of local cognizance, an act which shall unite for police purposes several counties and cities causes the local divisions to be less distinctly defined, and this is true. But this, if it proves any thing, proves too much. The argument would stamp the distribution of administrative authority among the local divisions with the attribute of absolute permanency. Every change in this respect would intensify or detract from the distinctness with which these divisions were marked when the Constitution was framed. Within our recollection, the arrangements for the support of the poor have been the subject of changes which have taken power from the county authority and given it to the towns, and the reverse. District attorneys were once appointed for several counties. Afterward, one was appointed for each county. The same features are found in respect to common schools. In the administration of this system, both town and county agencies are employed; but changes are often made by which the power is taken from the one and given to the other. If we were to establish the principle that the Legislature can never reduce the administrative authority of counties, cities or towns; can never resume in favor of the central power any portion of the jurisdiction of those local divisions, or change the partition of it among them, as it existed when the Constitution was adopted, we should, I think, make an impracticable government."

I cannot state the proposition plainer and more strongly than it has been stated by Judge Denio. Now one word in relation to this great power which it is proposed to put into the hands of a single individual if this section is adopted. The amount expended in the city of New York for the year 1867 for city and county purposes was twenty-four millions of dollars. Now, sir, if this provision is adopted, the mayor of the city of New York would have under his control and at his absolute disposal, through officers employed by him, this vast amount of money, twenty-four millions of dollars in one year; and, sir, it would not stop there, for the amount will undoubtedly increase from year to year, and in a short time that sum will be doubled. And, sir, there is to be added to this, an amount counted by millions annually, which is expended by officials in what are called local improvements, street openings, flagging and curbing streets, building sewers, and improvements of that description. This sum must also be added to the amount of twenty-four millions. Now, sir, we have had on one occasion a question before us which excited some discussion; it was as to the policy of allowing the consolidation of railroad corporations. When the report of the Committee on Corporations other than municipal was under consideration, the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] offered an amendment which was in the following words:

"No consolidation of railroad corporations shall be authorized when the aggregate capital shall exceed fifteen millions of dollars."

Afterward, the amount was changed to twenty millions, and in that shape the amendment was adopted by this Convention. And what was the argument in favor of it? It was that by the consolidation of these great companies, you thereby put in their hands, and in the hands of one man, the president of the corporation, the power of controlling its expenditures, and that thus consolidated these coporations would be dangerous to the liberties of the State. But, sir, take all the railroad corporations that could have been consolidated in this State, if this section had not been passed, their aggregate capital stock and bonds, would have amounted to only one hundred and fourteen millions of dollars. But here it is proposed to put into the hands of a single officer of a municipal corporation, a corporation created for the same purpose that railroad corporations are created in one sense, viz. (as to the financial matters of the corporation), the power of expending twenty-four millions of dollars a year, when this Convention is afraid to allow the consolidation of railroad corporations having capital exceeding twenty millions of dollars. If I am right, then the arguments which applied in that case apply with equal force to this. My friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] spoke in favor of that measure with great force, being fearful that the best interests of the State would be injured if such a clause was not adopted. He used this language:

"Now, sir, in this State of New York, while I would open a broad field for enterprise, while I would give every enterprise that deserves it, the benefit of the accumulation of capital necessary for the purpose of carrying commerce throughout the State, I would so guard it that they could not produce that concentration and consolidation of property, which from time to time, as these monopolies should grow up, would put it in their power to take into their own hands the entire destiny of the people of the State."

The gentleman from Schenectady [Mr. Paige] was even more emphatic in his statement upon this subject. After speaking of the amount of capital that might be consolidated if the amendment should not be adopted, namely, $114,000,000, he says:

"The aggregate of the capitals of the New York Central, Hudson River and Harlem Railroad companies, including Buffalo and Erie, controlled by the Central, and the Canandaigua, owned by it, is $44,543,891. Add to this the funded debt of these four companies ($28,621,354), which represents their property, which is their actual capital of these companies, will be $73,175,245. The capital and the funded debt of the Erie railway is $41,050,700. Add this sum to the capitals and funded debt of the New York Central and Buffalo and Erie and the Hudson River, and Harlem, and the aggregate is $114,226,945. This statement shows what combinations of railroad capital can be made in the form of consolidation, unless a restriction is imposed upon the power of the Legislature. A consolidation of a capital of $73,175,245, or one of $114,226,045—can any delegate look at this startling exhibit without alarm? Can he feel no apprehension of danger to public liberty and private rights from such mammoth corporations and gigantic capitals, under the exclusive control and direction of one head, one mind, one will? I do not believe it is possible. The power which would be centralized by either of these consolidations, or the power of one board of directors may, in the hands of one man, who controls the board, be irresistible. The people of the State could not cope with it. The Legislature could not stand up against it—its easy virtue would be surrendered upon the first demand, and the question is, whether it is not wise and judicious, and whether precautionary measures should not prevail with this Convention to interpose some restrictions upon legislative power which will deliver us from the malign influence and oppression of such an overgrown money power as that to which I have referred."

If this state of things might arise from allowing the consolidation of railroad companies to the extent of $114,000,000, what may we not expect if we were to deprive the people of the State of New York of all power over municipal corporations, and give them an unlimited power of expenditure which, in the city of New York alone amounts to $24,000,000 annually. How that money would be expended, and what means would be used, if that power was left in the hands of the mayor of the city of New York, I will state on authority. I will not give my own opinion, because I know but little on the subject, but I will read from a speech made by a distinguished democrat in the Cooper Institute on the thirteenth of November last, and there has been no denial of the statements he made from that day to this. If there has been I have never heard of it. He says:

"The only requisite or qualification demanded of an official looking for place is how he can contribute toward the maintenance and continuance of the party, how adroit he may be in manipulating nominating conventions, how many votes he can control, and whether he is true to the party organization. How they are disposed or qualified to serve citizens, and how they will discharge their duties as public servants, is never asked of them. Within the last ninety days the employees of two departments of the city government had taken from them the whole of two months' salaries for an unknown and unexplained object. Should this glaring wrong be doubted I am prepared to name the departments that have made these exactions upon their subordinates."

Two months' wages of the employees of two departments under the control of the local government, taken just previous to our last election! And for what purpose? Now, sir, put the whole of the expenditures of the city under the control of one man, and allow similar exactions to be made by those holding office under him, and you will perceive what a vast sum may be raised at each election and placed at the disposal of a single individual to influence the result. But, sir, I will quote again from this speech, and I will add that I have not had any denial of this statement. I read from the speech as it was published in the press, and as delivered before a public assembly, and if it was not true, those who were charged, I think, should have indignantly repelled the slander.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Will the gentleman inform me if he reads from the speech of Fernando Wood?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I do. His language was as follows:

"What I say here now, I say upon my own personal responsibility, and I am personally responsible to any man who may feel aggrieved at what I say. I charge that at the late election the Tammany Hall organization imported thieves from Philadelphia to vote their ticket; that these thieves were organized in different wards of the city, and that bands of them voted in more than sixteen wards and in more than one hundred and twenty-five electoral districts. [Cheers]. More than that, it is known that several of the inspectors of election, after receiving the ballot from the voter, substituted another ballot and deposited it in the box."

Two years ago a law was passed by the Legislature authorizing the Governor of the State to appoint a referee to take the examination of witnesses in all cases in the city of New York, or elsewhere, where charges were made for malfeasance, or misdemeanor in office against city officials. Shortly after that law was passed charges were made against one of the officials of the city of New York, the head of a department. I hold in my hand a copy of the charges. I am not going to read them. They are a part of the public records of the State. They are sworn to by responsible parties. He was an official appointed by the mayor, and confirmed by the board of aldermen, and it was in the power of the mayor of the city of New York, to have removed him from office. These charges were presented to the Governor, and notice was given that an examination would be had of the witnesses, merely to take testimony and report to the Governor. Now, Mr. Chairman, this referee had no other duty to perform but to take the testimony; he had no other power in the premises. All that he had to do was to take the testimony, every thing offered on the examination, and transmit it to the Governor. Notice was served upon the gentleman against whom the charges were made, and he was asked to attend the examination of witnesses. What did he do? He refused to do so, and gave as his reasons for refusing to attend, that the referee was so prejudiced against him that he could not get justice done him, and therefore he would not attend. But what did he do? He resigned. He quit the field. He gave up his position, when the referee had no other power and could perform no other duty than that of simply writing down testimony. If he had been entirely innocent of the charges, it seems to me he never would have taken that course. Was it not his duty as an honest officer, to have stood solid as the rock of ages, and met the charges? And, sir, these charges would have rebounded as harmlessly as the gentle rippling of the wave against the solid rock, had his official action been as pure and as free from taint as it should have been, and as I fain would believe it to have been. What was the nature of these charges? And here I wish in a few words to give a little insight into the mode in which it is alleged the people of the city of New York are deprived of their hard earnings by taxation. It is not, Mr. Chairman, through moneys expended by commissions. I defy gentlemen here to name one solitary instance in which one cent has been taken from the public treasury wrongfully or unjustly by any one of the commissions in the city of New York existing under State control. No, sir. No charge of that kind is made. It is admitted on all sides that the administration of these commissions is honest and well conducted. The trouble is, as has been well said, not that they neglect their duty; not that they steal; not that they have defrauded the citizens of any of their rights. It is because they execute the laws too rigidly, that they perform their duty with too great integrity; that they have, in other words, too much at heart the best interests of the people of the city. What was the first charge that was made in this list of charges that I hold in my hand? Here allow me to say that I have always held in high esteem the gentleman against whom the charges were made. He is a clever man, a genial companion and I prefer now to believe that his resignation was caused by some other reason than that he did not dare to have the charges investigated. I prefer to give that interpretation so far as I can individually; but I am bound to give you a specimen of the charges (and when you have heard one you will have a specimen of all) to show you how these alleged wrongs were perpetrated if the allegations of the complaint are true. They are sworn to, and as they are matters of measurement, of mathematical calculation, if there is any error it is very easy to correct it. The Citizens' Association of New York, a volunteer society, composed of citizens of the city of New York being tax payers and voters, presented the charges. The first charge was that in working a road in the city of New York some fifty-two thousand cubic yards of earth filling had been placed upon Eighth avenue, and a warrant was drawn by the comptroller, and countersigned by the mayor, for some $44,000, and given to the official as the price of the work that was alleged to be done. The charge here is that upon measurement it was ascertained that in place of that amount of filling less than half the amount was in reality made; and instead of the work being worth under the contract something like $40,000 it was only worth the sum of $21,000, leaving a net profit of fifty per cent on the amount paid out of the city treasury to somebody if this state of facts is true. And eighteen charges that were filed were all of a similar description. There is no opportunity, so far as the commissions are concerned, for any peculation. All the money that is expended by them is expended for salaries of officers; and the only mode in which there could be any wrong would be to deduct something from the amount of the salaries of the officials, but that salary is fixed by law, and so far as the public treasury is concerned, the public are bound by that law to pay the amount so fixed. But when you come to these departments—take, for instance, the street department—what does it have control of? Your streets, your wharves, your piers, and your public buildings. Now, it is in the working of the streets, it is in the dredging of your slips, in the care of your public buildings, and the supplies that you furnish for your public buildings, that these defalcations take place, if they take place anywhere. Take your Croton aqueduct board. They build your sewers, pave your streets, flag your sidewalks. They expend money for a certain amount of work alleged to have been done. If that work has not been done when it is certified to as having been done, there is where the city may be defrauded But no one of these warrants can be paid unless it is countersigned by the mayor; and to-day the mayor of the city of New York, in the discharge of his duty, holds this important position: that if he chooses he may refuse to sign any warrant; and if he has reason to suppose there is fraud in the contract, that the work is not properly done, it is his duty to refuse to sign the warrant for payment. The charter makes it his duty to have constant care and supervision over all heads of departments and the work performed under them. It is his duty to see that these parties perform it. If he has reason to suppose there is a fraud in any transaction he should refuse the payment of the money therefor by refusing to countersign the warrants, and leave the parties claiming compensation to their remedy in the courts. Now, in relation to the population of cities, I will make this remark here. My friend from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] alleged that there were no more arrests in the city of New York last year than in any other portion of the State in proportion to the population. I would ask the gentleman from Herkimer if he will inform me how many arrests were made in the city of New York last year?

Mr. GRAVES—I am not able to say from memorandums I have here.

Mr. HUTCHINS—If the gentleman is not able to say, how can he make the statement that there were no more arrests in the city of New York last year than in any other portion of the State? Now, as near as I can come to it (I have taken the report of the commissioners of charities, etc., and the report of the police commissioners in the city of New York for my guide), there were about eighty thousand arrests in the city of New York last year—the year 1867. If that was so, sir, there was an arrest of one person in ten of the population in that city during that year. I do not know how many were arrested in Herkimer county last year. Perhaps the gentleman can tell me. But I will venture to say that not one in a hundred of the population of that county were arrested.

Mr. GRAVES—Will the gentleman allow me a question? Were there any more arrests in the city of NewYork last year in proportion to the population than there were in the city of Buffalo?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I do not know, sir. I have not ascertained the number of arrests in the city of Buffalo. I am speaking of the city of New York. Again, the gentleman from Richmond county [Mr. E Brooks] informed us that there were about one hundred thousand people in the city of New York living upon charity, in-door and out-door relief and in your public institutions. Look at it. Here is a population, nearly two hundred thousand of whom are committed for crime and supported by charity—nearly one-fourth of the entire population, and that in time of peace. And let me explain one other fact that seems to have been overlooked in this Convention—a state of things peculiar to the city of New York, peculiar to its geographical position, and which must be the same in all time to come. I think I do not exaggerate when I say that there are seventy thousand men doing business in the city of New York daily, whose goods are there, whose stores are there, whose interests are there, but who live elsewhere. They reside in New Jersey, on Staten Island, in Kings county, Queens county and Westchester county, or in Connecticut. They leave the city for the benefit of their families, who desire to live in the country. They can live cheaper there. The means of communication are such (and they are constantly increasing) that they can live fifty miles from the city of New York and do business there. Their whole property is in the city of New York; their interests are in the city of New York; every thing they have at stake depends upon the good goverpment of the city of New York. Ought not that population of seventy thousand to be represented in some way? And how do you propose to have it represented? The city of New York is constantly becoming a city of very rich and very poor people; the poor who are compelled by their poverty to remain there, and the rich, who in consequence of great means are able to sustain the enormous expenses of living. But your middle man, the bone and sinew of the land, the honest tradesman, the clerk, the book-keeper, these men are all driven from the city, and are compelled to reside outside of the city limits. I have one instance in my mind, of one bank in the city of New York, in which are employed eleven clerks, and every one of these clerks resides outside of the city of New York. I have in my mind a hotel in the city of New York where its head waiter, its head porter, and two other employees, men of little means, have within the last eighteen months taken up their residences outside the city of New York. Are not these men to be represented in some way? They are represented by their vote when they vote for members of the Legislature who may have some control over the city of New York, and that is the only way it can be done. If they were permitted to cast their vote in the city of New York, you would, in my opinion, see an entire change of things. You would see there to-day a majority for the party which is now in a minority of some fifty thousand. But the trouble is, as I have said, that owing to the location of that island, the peculiar kind of business carried on, the limited means for the accommodation of the people, that the class of men to which I have referred are compelled to move away, and the city is left, as I have said, to the great mass of ignorant, vicious, depraved population, together with, I will admit, a large number constituting a worthy, honest voting population; and this large element of worthy voting population, includes among its numbers many men of foreign birth. And let me tell my friend from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], when he says that the business men in the city of New York pay no attention to public affairs, he makes an erroneous statement. There is no locality anywhere within the State, where the business men pay more attention to public affairs and strive for good government than they do in the city of New York.

Mr. GRAVES—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do the business men in the city of New York attend primary meetings for the selection of officers?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I will answer the gentleman. They do attend primary meetings; and we have as large a number, so far as the union republican party is concerned, in the city of New York, men of wealth and of standing in the community, in proportion to the population who vote that ticket, and who attend primary meetings, as there are in the gentleman's district; and these men gave their time, and their means, and their efforts, as liberally, as unremittingly and as unselfishly during the whole term of the rebellion, as did the loyal men of any other portion of the State; and it is a mistake for the gentleman or any one who thinks with him, to believe that the evils which exist in the city of New York, and which call for the interference of State aid exist in consequence of laxity, want of effort, or want of attention to public matters on the part of men of wealth. I cannot recall to mind a single man in that city, of means and influence, who does not take an active, an open and an earnest part in public affairs. Now, one word as to the expense of commissions which are controlled by State authority. It was asserted by the chairman of the committee that seven-eighths of the expense of the government of the city of New York was occasioned by State commissions. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] asserted that it was three-fourths. I hold that when gentlemen occupy a position so responsible as those gentlemen do, in uniting in the report we are considering, it was their duty to inform themselves upon this subject, and not have made statements at random. This is a grave question, and it must be decided upon facts, not theories; upon arguments, not clamor; upon truth, not assertion. When that assertion was made, it struck me as a most singular one. It was calculated to produce an impression, or it would not have been made, and therefore the allegation should have been carefully considered before it was made; but it was given as one reason by the chairman of the committee, why he united in the report, and why he proposed to place this large power in the hands of the mayors of cities.

Mr. HARRIS—Will the gentleman from New York indulge me a moment. All I said on that subject was this, that a large amount of the expenses—seven-eighths, it has been said—were chargeable to this commission.

Mr. HUTCHINS—This is his precise language; and when he said "seven-eighths, as has been said," he said seven-eighths; and I appeal to every member of this Convention that the impression left upon his mind was that the expenses of those commissions was seven-eighths of the entire annual expenditure of the city government in New York. I hold in my hands a communication from the comptroller of the city of New York to the board of supervisors for the year 1867. It is a small document. The gentleman could have it by simply sending to the comptroller's office for it; and in it will be found every dollar of expenditure by the city authorities of New York for the year 1867, and for all purposes; and he would have found, by examining that document, that so far as seven-eighths of the expenditure being caused by commissions controlled by State authority, that not one-sixth of that expenditure was for such purpose. He would have found that, at the outside, $3,600,000 would have covered that expense, and a little further examination would have brought him to a knowledge of the further fact that one of these commissions, which is included in this expenditure of $3,600,000 (I refer to the police commission), collected for that year and paid into the city treasury the sum of nearly $900,000, where, before, from the same field of operation, the excise commission of the year before collected but $12,000, and the year before that $9,000. In fact, so far as the city treasury is concerned, reducing the amount of expense of these city commissions to the sum of something like $2,700,000 a year. I am not going to detain the Convention by going through this list, but I make the assertion—and, if I am wrong in my statement, I hope some gentleman will point it out—that the expense of the police commissions is something like $2,500,000, the fire commission $780,000, health commission $145,000, Central Park commission $200,000. Put them together, and you have the sum total of the expenditures for commissions where they are controlled by the State authorities. The total city and county expenditure for that year was $24,009,535. The amount raised by taxation was $32,000,000, but added to that is a sum of $2,120,000, drawn from the general fund, to make up the sum total of the amount of expenditure. Here we have a government—a local government—expending something like $21,000,000, deducting there from the amount of State tax. It is done by local authority, by the vote of the people of the city. And still I am gravely told that when there is but $2,500,000 expended by the city commissioners, we have by reason thereof, revolutionized the State, politically; that the people are contented and satisfied with this twenty-one or twenty-two millions expenditure, but that they are terribly dissatisfied with the two and a half millions of expenditures for the commissions, which I aver gives them the best city government, and in fact, pretty much all the good government they have! There is one item in the comptroller's report which recalled to my mind a circumstance which shows how quietly the citizens of New York submit to taxation, and that it is not the amount of money that is expended annually that troubles the people. I find an item of over a million of dollars for lamps and gas. It is for gas furnished the city for lighting street lamps. The city of New York had a contract with the Manhattan Gas company to supply the city for a term of years, I think twenty-five years—at any rate the contract did not expire until about the year 1871. During the war, some three years ago, when coal became high, this Manhattan Gas company, of which I have no doubt you have all heard, as one of the most lucrative and successful companies in the country, which had paid its twenty-five per cent dividends annually, for many years previous to this date, and which had this contract to supply the gas until the year 1871, at the rate of $25 a lamp, yearly—this company, of which I recollect Simeon Draper once remarked when selling its stock, "It pays a dividend every morning before breakfast, and you will wear your boots out running for it," found during the war, when coal became high, and when labor was high, that they could not make quite as much money as they had made, and they applied to the common council for relief. They applied to the board of aldermen and asked to have that contract canceled, and to have a new one made, giving them double the amount, $50 a year for each lamp, for lighting the street lamps. This board of aldermen granted the requested relief. They passed a resolution rescinding the contract. The stock of the company was selling at the time considerably above par, and was paying, I think, five per cent dividends semi-annually. The board of aldermen did it without any consideration, merely for the advantage of the gas company, and not for the good of the public. They canceled the contract, directed the comptroller and the street commissioner to enter into a new one, at double the cost to the city. To the credit of the comptroller and the street commissioner be it said that they refused to make the contract, and it has not been executed to this day. And what has been the result? This company turned around and said to the city "You have canceled the former contract, there is now no contract between us, and we shall hold you responsible for the value of the gas furnished."

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Did not the Legislature of this State authorize the same thing as to the Harlem bridge and canal contracts made before the war?

Mr. HUTCHINS—I am not aware of it.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—They did. You will find the law in the statutes, I think.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I am not aware of any such thing. If they did there were probably good reasons for it.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—Is the gentleman not aware that coal advanced to double the price?

Mr. HUTCHINS—Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. SCHUMAKER—That was the reason.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I stated the fact that coal had advanced in price, and also that the price of labor had increased; and at the same time I said that the stock was above par, and that they were making five per cent semi-annual dividends notwithstanding the increase in price of coal and labor. And that previoualy for years they had been dividing twenty per cent annually among their stockholders, a portion of which was made out of the contract with the city of New York. Having made these large sums all that time, when the time arrived that the city was to be benefited by the contract, and the company losing, then they asked for a rescission of it and obtained it. No new contract having been obtained, what is the result? They have given notice to the authorities of the city that they shall hold them responsible for the value of the gas furnished the city; and one company has already commenced a suit, and have recovered at the rate of fifty dollars a lamp for the value of the gas, and now the authorities of the city are paying this company at the rate of fifty dollars a lamp, although no contract has been entered into. And thus the city has been compelled by the action of its board of aldermen to pay many thousands of dollars annually over and above the contract price by this one operation; and still not a breath of complaint from the tax payers, so far as I am aware. The health commission expends but about $140,000 annually, and yet a portion of our citizens inveigh loudly against this commission, but when a wrong of the description I have referred to is perpetrated they do not utter one word of complaint. What is to be done to remedy the evils complained of? It is proposed by the one report, that of the chairman of the committee, to give the power of appointment to the mayor alone. It is proposed by Mr. Murphy, in his minority report, to give it to the mayor and common council. I have endeavored to show what kind of a common council we have and how far they are to be trusted with power. How is it in relation to the mayor? The gentleman [Mr. Harris] says this is the same power and authority that is exercised to-day by the President of the United States. Now I ask the gentleman where and how the President of the United States exercises a power like this which he proposes to devolve on the mayor of the city of New York for the time being? The time never was when the President of the United States could appoint any official (if I am wrong the gentleman can correct me) without the concurrence of the Senate. It may be that there are some classes of appointments that he can make, but the great majority of them, and, as far as I recollect, all, must be confirmed by the Senate. I believe the gentleman himself took part in the action of the Senate of the United States by which that power has been greatly restricted, viz., to this extent, preventing any removal by the President of any officer whose appointment has been confirmed by the Senate until the consent of the Senate has been obtained for such removal. Now, how, in the light of such a state of facts, can the gentleman say that the same power devolves upon the President of the United States as is devolved upon, or rather proposed to be given to, the mayors of cities? The chairman, in his remarks in support of his report, stated that when the police commission was passed, the rights of the citizens of New York were interfered with, their right of local self-government was for the first time taken away. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Cities if he will inform me how the police were appointed in the city of New York in 1857, just previous to the time that the police commission was created?

Mr. HARRIS—I am quite sure that my friend has some other motive than information in asking that question. If I understand it, they were appointed by the mayor or mayor and recorder.

Mr. HUTCHINS—I understood him in his remarks to say that they never had been appointed in the way that he proposed to appoint them, but if they were appointed by the mayor at that time (1857), then he proposes to go back and invest the appointing power where it was placed in 1857, when the police commission was formed. So, then, this is not a new thing which he proposes, according to his own statement, but a mode of appointment which has been tried and found to work so badly that my friend from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] says that when he was in the Senate he voted for the police commission, because every body in the city of New York demanded and asked for it, and says he presented one petition from his district in favor of it which was signed by over twelve thousand people; that meetings favoring it were held, in which all parties took part; and it was owing to this fact, he says, in conclusion, that he voted for it. Now, the gentleman is not strictly accurate when he says the policemen were appointed by the mayor. The law devolved the duty upon the mayor, the recorder and the city judge. But at that time, Fernando Wood being mayor, the power was thrown into his hands by the other commissioners, and he had practically the sole power of appointment. And what kind of a police did we have? Gentlemen forget the state of things that existed in the city of New York at that time, which called for and terminated in the change that was made—robberies, house-breaking, garroting, rowdyism, Sabbath-breaking, riots at the polls, so that in many districts no decent man would venture near the polls. If I recollect right, the year before this police act was passed some three men were killed at the polls, stabbed—two in one district. It is proposed by some gentlemen to go back to a system we have tried, and which worked so badly that some change was demanded by all citizens, irrespective of party. We may, it is true, have a good mayor, but we want so to frame our Constitution as to protect us if we happen to have a bad man for mayor. The majority report of the Committee on Cities proposes to place the executive power of the city of New York in the hands of a mayor who is to be elected by the voters of the city, and who is to hold his office for three years, is to appoint all heads of departments and officers charged with the administration of departments, all and each of whom may be removed by him at pleasure, and such vast power as was never before vested in the hands of a single man. Was it proposed by legislative enactment to vest such vast and varied powers in the hands of a single individual, the propositon would be truly alarming; but when it is proposed to accomplish it by constitutional enactment, we should pause long and consider well before com-
